HOTALING et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT,
CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10288.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1923.)

1. Contempt ⚡3—Contempt of court is criminal offense.

Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense.

2. Contempt ⚡40—Contempt proceeding not a civil action.

A contempt proceeding is not a civil action, either at law or in equity, though it may be ancillary thereto, but is a proceeding of criminal nature and summary character, in which the court exercises but a limited jurisdiction, and in which the people prosecute.

3. Contempt ⚡54(2), 58(1), 61(1)—Affidavits on which citation is issued constitute complaint, and defendant's affidavits the answer; hearing had on issues made by pleadings.

In a prosecution for constructive contempt, affidavits on which citation is issued constitute the complaint and affidavits of defendant the answer, and the issues of fact are framed by the respective affidavits serving as pleadings, and hearing must be had on these issues, at which competent evidence must be produced, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1218, 1220.

4. Contempt ⚡60(3) — Witnesses ⚡293½—In contempt proceeding mere preponderance of evidence insufficient, and defendant cannot be compelled to be sworn as witness.

A proceeding for constructive contempt is of such a distinctly criminal nature that a mere preponderance of evidence is insufficient, and defendant cannot be compelled to be sworn as a witness nor convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.

5. Certiorari ⚡64(1)—Writ extends to whole record of court below.

While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, it nevertheless extends to the whole of the record of the court below, and to evidence where necessary to determine jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Certiorari.]

6. Contempt ⚡67—In reviewing contempt proceeding, evidence, judgment, and findings construed in favor of accused.

In certiorari to review a contempt proceeding, the charge, evidence, findings, and judgment are strictly construed in accused's favor, and no intendments or presumptions can be indulged in in aid of their sufficiency.

7. Certiorari ⚡28(2) — Unwarranted order subject to review by direct attack on writ of certiorari.

An unwarranted order is subject to review by direct attack on a writ of certiorari where the court's power to make the order depends on existence of facts as to which there is no evidence; the question presented in such case being one of law.

8. Contempt ⚡21—Facts alleged held not to amount to contempt of court where order was not made in execution of final decree.

Where on going down of remittitur an order was made directing defendants to transfer shares of stock and issue new certificates therefor not in the name of the judgment plaintiff, but in the name of a trustee, a stranger to the action, all of which was claimed to be made in execution of the final decree, in refusing to cause transfer of stock to be made to the trustee, defendants cannot be guilty of contempt as violating the terms of the final decree.

9. Contempt ⚡21—To constitute constructive contempt for disobedience of court order, there must be omission to perform act required by order.

To constitute a constructive contempt for failure to obey an order carrying into effect a final decree after going down of remittitur, there must have been an omission to perform an act which was required by the terms of the original order.

10. Contempt ⚡2—Violation of law not per se contempt of court.

A violation of law does not per se constitute contempt of court.

11. Contempt ⚡20—Violation of rights of ownership, though declared by judgment, not per se contempt.

A violation of rights of ownership, even though they have been ascertained and declared by judgment, unless it consists in doing something which was prohibited or in failing to do something which was required by the terms of the judgment, is not contempt.

In Bank.

Original application for certiorari by Richard M. Hotaling and others against the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, and others, to review an order of that court. Order annulled.

Peter F. Dunne, W. H. Metson, R. G. Hudson, and I. P. Nieto, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Gavin McNab, Nat Schmulowitz and R. P. Henshall, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, J. Petitioners applied for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the court below, after the going down of the remittitur in the action in this court, wherein Lavinia J. Hotaling was plaintiff and Richard M. Hotaling and the Hotaling Estate Company were defendants (Hotaling v. Hotaling, 187 Cal. 695, 203 Pac. 745), adjudging petitioners in contempt of court, and directing said Hotaling Estate Company and Richard M. Hotaling, as its president, and C. N. Taylor, as its secretary, to cancel certificate No. 15 for 2,499 shares of its capital stock, standing in the name of Richard M. Hotaling and indorsed in blank by him, and delivered to Lavinia J. Hotaling, and also indorsed in blank by Lavinia J. Hotaling, upon presentation thereof by the Union Trust Company, and thereupon to reissue to and in the name of the said Union Trust Company a certificate for one share of said stock and 10 certificates for 125 shares each, and one certificate for 1,248 shares of said stock. Said demand for the cancellation and reissuance of said stock was made by said Union Trust Company and Lavinia J. Hotaling, as assignor of said Union Trust Company, accompanied by the necessary stamps required for said purpose, requesting that the president and secretary of said corporation do each make the proper indorsement and writing, to accomplish said transfers. It was claimed in connection with said transfers that legal assignments of said stock had been made from Lavinia J. Hotaling to said Union Trust Company. Said demand for transfer was in writing, signed by said Lavinia J. Hotaling and said Union Trust Company, for a transfer out of her name into that of the Union Trust Company. It was made in pursuance of a clause in the final decree in the said cause of Lavinia J. Hotaling v. Richard M. Hotaling and Hotaling Estate Company, as finally affirmed by this court, as follows, to wit:

"II. That the plaintiff, Lavinia J. Hotaling, be and she is hereby declared to be the owner and entitled to immediate possession of 2,499 shares of the capital stock of the Hotaling Estate Company represented by certificate No. 15, issued in the name of Richard M. Hotaling, free and clear of all claims on the part of said Richard M. Hotaling."

Richard M. Hotaling, personally and as president of the Hotaling Estate Company and the Hotaling Estate Company, were each a party to said decree and were bound by its terms. C. N. Taylor, as secretary of the Hotaling Estate Company, was also bound by the decree as fully as if he had been a formal party thereto. His functions as such secretary were confined to carrying out the directions of his principal, and in so doing he would be acting as the agent of his principal. All the parties to the present proceeding for review were therefore bound to obey the terms of the decree,

The rights of an owner of shares of stock in a corporation of the character of the Hotaling Estate Company, with respect to the possession and transfer of the same, are set forth in section 324 of the Civil Code. It provides that, when the capital stock is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued—

"such shares of stock * * * are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by signature of the proprietor, his agent, attorney, or legal representative, and the delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by whom and to whom transferred, the number of the certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer. * * * Whenever any officer of any corporation shall refuse to make entries upon the books thereof, or to transfer stock therein, or to issue a certificate or certificates therefor to the transferee as provided by this and the next preceding section, such officer shall be subject to a penalty of four hundred dollars, to be recovered as liquidated damages, in an action brought against him by the person aggrieved."

The preceding section (323) provides that the corporation must issue certificates for stock therein when fully paid up, signed by the president and secretary. There are special provisions directing the course to be taken when the stock is not fully paid up, but they do not apply in this case, for this stock was fully paid.

The order here under review presents two aspects: In one it adjudges the petitioners guilty of contempt, and imposes a penalty; in the other, it commands them to make the transfer of the stock upon the corporate books in accordance with the demand made as above recited.

[1, 2] Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 360, 33 Pac. 1112, 21 L. R. A. 751, 37 Am. St. Rep. 57; Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 408; Reymert v. Smith, 5 Cal. App. 380, 90 Pac. 470. A contempt proceeding is not a civil action, either at law or in equity (Gale v. Tuolumne Water Co., 169 Cal. 46, 145 Pac. 532; Ex parte Gould, supra), though it may be ancillary thereto (Mitchell v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 423, 125 Pac. 1061), but is a separate proceeding of a criminal nature and summary character (McClatchy v. Superior Court, supra; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 98 Pac. 540; Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580; Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404, 181 Pac. 652), in which the court exercises but a limited jurisdiction (In re McCarty, supra; Otis v. Superior Court, 148 Cal. 129, 82 Pac. 853; Reymert v. Smith, supra), and in which the people of the state prosecute the action (Ex parte Gould, supra).

[3, 4] In a prosecution for constructive contempt the affidavits on which the citation is issued constitute the complaint. Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 81 Pac. 409; Frowley v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 220, 110 Pac. 817; Selowsky v. Superior Court, supra. The affidavits of the defendant constitute the answer or plea (Mitchell v. Superior Court, supra), and the issues of fact are framed by the respective affidavits serving as pleadings (In re Buckley, 69 Cal. 1, 10 Pac. 69; Mitchell v. Superior Court, supra). A hearing must be had upon these issues (McClatchy v. Superior Court, supra; In re Buckley, supra; Code Civ. Proc. § 1217), at which competent evidence must be produced (In re Buckley, supra; Goodall v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 723, 174 Pac. 924; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1218, 1220). The proceeding is of such a distinctly criminal nature that a mere preponderance of evidence is insufficient (In re Buckley, supra); the defendant cannot be compelled to be sworn as a witness (Ex parte Gould, supra), and he cannot be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice (In re Buckley, supra).

The decision of this court in Ex parte Selowsky (Cal.) 208 Pac. 99, does not conflict with the foregoing rules. What was there decided was that the failure of the clerk to file the affidavit which constituted the complaint at the time it was presented to the court was a misprision of a ministerial officer, amounting merely to an irregularity; that the rights of the defendant were fully protected by the service upon him of a copy of the affidavit with the order to show cause, and that he could not have been prejudiced thereby. What was there said to the effect that a prosecution for contempt is a proceeding of a civil nature was wholly unnecessary to the decision, and therefore obiter, because whether it be of a civil or criminal nature, the procedural steps therein are undoubtedly those prescribed by sections 1209-1222, Code of Civil Procedure.

[5, 6] While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, it nevertheless extends to the whole of the record of the court below, and even to the evidence itself where necessary to determine jurisdiction. Schwarz v. Superior Court, supra; McClatchy v. Superior Court, supra; Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35. In reviewing this proceeding, the charge, the evidence, the findings and the judgment are all to be strictly construed in favor of the accused (Schwarz v. Superior Court, supra), and no intendments or presumptions can be indulged in aid of their sufficiency (Frowley v. Superior Court, supra). If the record of the proceedings, reviewed in the light of the foregoing rules, fails to show affirmatively upon its face the existence of all the necessary facts upon which jurisdiction depended, the order must be annulled. Frowley v. Superior Court, In re McCarty, and other cases above cited.

[7] The record here shows that many, if not most, of the material facts alleged in the affidavits which constituted the complaint are directly controverted by denials in the affidavits filed in behalf of the defendants. It not only fails to disclose any competent evidence in support of the allegations thus traversed, but it shows that no evidence whatever was received.

"Where * * * the power to make the order depends upon the existence of facts as to which, as here, there is no evidence whatever, the question presented is one of law and subject to review by direct attack on writ of certiorari," and such an order should be annulled. Goodall v. Superior Court, supra.

It is true that the defendants' affidavit were not filed on the return day of the citation. But the respondents' return herein shows that they were filed shortly thereafter, pursuant "to an order duly given and made," by which they "were ordered filed as of the 21st day of March, 1922 (the return day), and prior to the submission for decision upon the merits of the application on said date argued and submitted to the respondents herein;" therefore they must be here considered as having been on file at that time.

[8] But we think that, if all the facts alleged in the affidavits constituting the complaint had been proved by competent and conclusive evidence, this order should still be annulled because those facts do not amount to a contempt of court, and because the order goes beyond the terms of the original judgment of which it is claimed to be in execution.

The order here under review directed the petitioners herein to transfer upon the corporate books the shares of stock in question, and to issue new certificates therefor—not in the name of Mrs. Hotaling, the judgment plaintiff, but in the name of the Union Trust Company, trustee, a stranger to the action. It further adjudged the petitioners in contempt of court, and directed that, in the event of their failure to comply with its requirements within seven days thereafter, they should stand committed to the county jail until such compliance. This order is claimed to be, and recites that it is, "made in execution of the final decree," above referred to.

The court found that the petitioners "have willfully and persistently refused to comply with the directions of said final decree in not causing the transfer of the stock to be made to said Union Trust Company of San Francisco, as required by said final decree." (Italics ours.) Concededly, no such requirement, nor anything remotely approaching it, in express terms, is to be found in said decree. The decree contains six different injunctions, four of them prohibitory and two of them mandatory in character, but it is not claimed that any of these injunctive provisions has been violated in any respect. The provision solely relied upon by respondents is an adjudication "that the plaintiff, Lavinia J. Hotaling, be, and she is hereby, declared to be the owner of and entitled to the immediate possession of 2499 shares * * * free and clear of all claims on the part of the said Richard J. Hotaling." This provision is purely declaratory. A somewhat analogous and even stronger situation is found in Dewey v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. 64, 22 Pac. 333. In that case a decree had been entered expressly enjoining Dewey, the defendant therein, "from maintaining a certain dam or other obstructions in Mariposa creek, and from maintaining a certain ditch or canal of defendant in any condition that would interfere with the rights of plaintiff" as decreed in the judgment. Thereafter contempt proceedings were instituted against Dewey for the violation of this injunction in failing to remove the dam or to fill up the mouth of the ditch, and an order was made substantially analogous to the one here under review. Reviewing that order, this court said:

"But notwithstanding the omission of all words of a mandatory character in the original injunction, we find the court, in this proceeding for contempt, and upon the faith of the finding above quoted, 'ordered, adjudged, and decreed that he, the said Henry Dewey, be committed to the custody of the sheriff of Merced county, and that said sheriff confine him in the county jail of this county until all dams and obstructions placed in said Mariposa creek by said Dewey, or through his procurement, which will obstruct the flow of the water therein, be dug out and removed therefrom, and until the ditch leading from said creek be filled up substantially so that the waters of said creek cannot be diverted thereby.' This order we think was clearly in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. It is an order which can only be made upon and in consequence of a conviction for contempt, which 'consists in the omission to perform an act which is yet in the power of the person to perform,' and which has been required by the terms of the original order which the party is charged with having violated. Code Civ. Proc. § 1219. The original order or injunction did not require him to perform the act which is by this order enjoined upon him, and for the nonperformance of which it is now ordered that he be imprisoned." (Italics ours.)

[9] If, in the Dewey Case, a command to remove the dam could not be implied from a decree enjoining the further maintenance thereof, certainly in the instant case a command to transfer the stock on the books to the Union Trust Company is not to be implied from a purely declaratory adjudication that Mrs. Hotaling is the owner and entitled to the possession thereof. That case, which has never been overruled, stands as express authority for the rule that, to constitute a constructive contempt of the sort here claimed, there must have been an "omission to perform an act which has been required by the terms of the original order." The terms of the order here relied upon do not expressly require the performance of any act. They merely declare the fact of the ownership of the stock. There is a complete "omission of all words of a mandatory character." There is not even, as there was in the cited case, a prohibitory injunction which might be said to have a mandatory aspect. Assuming that a contempt can be predicated upon the non-performance of a requirement which is implied but not expressed by the terms of the original order, the most that can be fairly implied herein is that the defendants were required to transfer the stock upon the corporate books into the name of Mrs. Hotaling, so that she could have complete possession thereof. But they are not in default in this respect, because they have never been given an opportunity so to do. They aver that they have always been ready and willing to make this transfer, and there is no evidence to the contrary. If she had demanded the transfer into her own name and that demand had been complied with, then we think the decree would have been fully executed. Suppose, then, that five years later she had demanded another transfer from her own name to the name of the Union Trust Company, and her demand had been refused. Or suppose that five years later she had charged the defendants with misapplying corporate funds, or paying a dividend not earned. Would it be contended that under such circumstances the defendants could be imprisoned for contempt of court, on the theory that their acts were in violation of her rights of ownership as declared by the original decree? The suggested situations are identical, in legal effect, with the one now before the court.

[10, 11] Conceding that Mrs. Hotaling is entitled as of right to have the stock transferred on the books to the trust company, that right is predicated, not upon the judgment, but upon the fact of her ownership, together with the provisions of section 324 of the Civil Code. A refusal to make the transfer may be in violation of her rights of ownership and in violation of the law as there expressed. But a violation of law does not per se constitute contempt of court. Neither does a violation of rights of ownership, even though they have been ascertained and declared by a judgment, unless it consists in doing something which was prohibited, or in failing to do something which was required, by the terms of the judgment.

The same considerations apply with equal force to the Union Trust Company, whether it be regarded as transferee of the shares of stock or as assignee of an interest in the judgment. Conceding that an assignee of a judgment, or of an interest therein, succeeds to all the rights, or to the rights pro tanto, of the judgment creditor, certainly he acquires no greater rights therein or thereunder than were possessed by his assignor. Assuming the validity of the transfer from Mrs. Hotaling to the trust company (which petitioners do not concede), and conceding that the trust company is therefore an assignee pro tanto of the judgment, the fact still remains that the order here under review commands the petitioners to do that which is not required of them by the terms of the original judgment.

The order is annulled.

BISPO v. SURABIAN et al. (Civ. 4553.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error — 1010(1) — Evidence raising mere inference to support finding of malice held sufficient on appeal.

In an action for assault and battery, where the appellate court cannot say there was no evidence to draw an inference of malice in support of the finding, no relief can be granted.

2. Appeal and error — 1004(1)—Showing held insufficient to set aside or reduce judgment.

In an action for assault and battery where the evidence clearly shows that a very minor injury was suffered, in the absence of any showing as to what part of the damages is exemplary and what part actual, the award cannot be disturbed unless it resulted from passion and prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Tony Bispo against Jack Surabian and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. D. Crichton and K. Ohanian, both of Fresno, for appellants.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for assault and battery. The defendants Sumpat Surabian and Jack Surabian, brothers, were living upon an 80-acre tract of land belonging to them, part of which was planted in melons. About 10 o'clock of the evening of August 27, 1921, they were disturbed by the barking of their dogs on the premises, and one of the defendants, Sumpat Surabian, took his automobile and drove to the county road, where he saw a car parked by his ranch. He then returned to the house and told his brother, Jack Surabian, and his cousin, K. Surabian, what he had discovered, and all three returned to the place, where they discovered a Mexican named Cardenas in their melon patch. Cardenas informed them that he had a partner with him. While they were questioning him, the plaintiff came up and jumped into his car, the one parked along the highway, and endeavored to drive off. He was unable to do so, because one of the defendants had removed the key to the machine. The defendants then questioned the plaintiff as to what he was doing upon their property, but he refused to answer, and after a heated controversy between the parties the defendant K. Surabian struck the plaintiff over the head with a stick. For the injuries resulting the trial court, sitting without a jury, awarded the plaintiff a judgment in the sum of $1,500, rejecting defendants' request that the findings designate the amount thereof allowed as actual damages and the amount allowed for exemplary damages.

The appeal is taken under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure and is based upon four grounds: The insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings; that the decision is against law; that the judgment allowed is excessive; and errors in law occurring at the trial. Reliance, however, is placed upon the claim of the insufficiency of the evidence and excessive damages.

[1] The argument in support of the first point is that there is no evidence of any nature to support the finding that the attack upon the respondent was malicious. There is much reason in the position taken by the appellants in this regard, but it cannot be said that there is not some evidence from which the trial court could draw the inference of malice in support of this finding. Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court, this is sufficient to prevent this court from granting the appellants any relief.

[2] On this question of damages, this too, was a matter which the trial court was called upon to determine. The evidence plainly shows that the respondent suffered a very minor injury, so far as actual damages were concerned; but we are unable to say how much of the judgment covers actual damages, and how much covers exemplary damages. It is only in cases where the judgment appears to be the result of passion or prejudice that the appellate court may reduce or set aside the award of damages by the trial court. Though the record discloses a high state of feeling on the part of respondent's counsel against the appellants, and an endeavor in their brief filed in this court to create a state of prejudice against the appellants on account of their race, we cannot say that this was reflected in the trial court, when it fixed the amount of damages to be awarded.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COHEN. (Cr. 974.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 15, 1923.)

1. Infants ⇐20—Information charging acts tending to cause female infant to lead immoral life need not allege that she is not defendant's wife.

An information charging violation of Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 21 (as amended by St. 1921, p. 773), by acts tending to cause a female under 21 to lead an idle, dissolute, and immoral life, need not allege that such female is not defendant's wife.

2. Infants ⇐20—Female under 21 held sufficiently described as in danger of leading immoral life in information charging acts tending to cause her to so do.

An information charging violation of Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 21, which alleged that complaining witness was a female under 21, "to wit, of the age of 16 years, * * * and was then and there in danger of leading an idle, dissolute, lewd, and immoral life by reason of the acts hereinafter alleged," held not defective as failing to set forth facts showing her within section 1, subdivision 11 of which enumerates, as one class to whom the law applies, any one under 21 "who is leading or * * * in danger of leading" such a life.

3. Infants ⇐20—Unnecessary, in prosecution for improper conduct toward female infant, that she be dependent or delinquent child.

In a prosecution for violating Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 21, by acts tending to cause a female under 21 to lead an idle, dissolute, and immoral life, it is not necessary to allege or prove that complaining witness was a dependent or delinquent person within Juvenile Court Law 1909, § 26, or the law of 1911; it being necessary to show only that she is under 21.

4. Infants ⇐20—Acts tending to cause infant female to lead immoral life violates statute, irrespective of success of defendant's efforts.

One committing acts causing, or manifestly tending to cause, a female under 21 to come within the provisions of Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 1, subds. 1-13, violates section 21, penalizing the commission of acts tending to cause such a person to lead an idle, dissolute, or immoral life, irrespective of the success of his efforts or their effect on her.

5. Infants ⇐20—Evidence held to warrant conviction for tending to cause infant to become in danger of leading immoral life.

That one charged with violating Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 21, by acts tending to cause a female under 21 to lead an idle, dissolute, and immoral life, was assuming to act as a spiritualistic medium and was called on and consulted by complaining witness in such capacity, did not render her testimony as to his acts during the reading insufficient to warrant a conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Harry Y. Cohen was convicted of acts tending to cause a female under 21 to lead an idle, dissolute or immoral life, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Lucas F. Smith, of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was convicted of a violation of section 21 (as amended, Stats. 1921, p. 773), of the Juvenile Court Law, approved June 15, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1246). He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, mainly upon two grounds: First, that the information does not state any public offense; secondly, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The information, omitting the formal parts, is as follows:

"The said Harry Y. Cohen is accused by the district attorney of and for the county of Los Angeles, state of California, by this information, of the crime of a misdemeanor; that the said Harry Y. Cohen, on or about the 11th day of September, 1922, and prior to the filing of this information, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully commit acts and omit duties hereinafter more particularly set forth, to wit: That at the said time and place one Lillian Alleen Hildreth was then and there in the county of Los Angeles, and was then and there a female person under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 16 years, and was then and there easily coaxed, influenced, and controlled by artful and designing persons, and was then and there in danger of leading an idle, dissolute, and immoral life by reason of the acts hereinafter alleged, and by reason of the personal depravity of the said defendant, Harry Y. Cohen; that at all the times herein mentioned the said Harry Y. Cohen was and is an artful and designing person, and did then and there endeavor and attempt to influence, cause, allow, and to persuade and cause the said Lillian Alleen Hildreth to come within the influence, persuasion, and control of the said defendant, Harry Y. Cohen, and the said defendant, Harry Y. Cohen, at the times and places last aforesaid, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, on or about the 11th day of September, 1922, feel, fondle, and handle the limbs and private parts of the said Lillian Alleen Hildreth, with the intent and purpose of arousing and gratifying the passions of the said defendant, Harry Y. Cohen, and of the said Lillian Alleen Hildreth, a minor child under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 16 years."

[1] The first objection to the information is that it fails to state that the complaining witness is not the wife of the defendant. This allegation is not made necessary by the statute, and the attention of the court has not been called to any authority, nor has any good reason been advanced, why such a statement is a necessary part of a charge of this nature. We are not able to agree with the appellant that the information is defective in this respect. No doubt, in certain proceedings under this statute, depending largely upon the nature of the charge, proof of the fact that the complaining witness is the wife of the defendant would be a complete defense in the action, but no such evidence was offered in this case. On the contrary, the testimony clearly shows that such was not the fact.

[2] It is next contended that the information is fatally defective, in that it fails to set forth facts showing that the complaining witness, Lillian Alleen Hildreth, came within the provisions of section 1 of the Juvenile Law. Subdivision 11 of said section 1 enumerates, as one class of persons to whom said law applies, any person under the age of 21 years "who is leading, or for any cause is in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd, or immoral life." The information alleges:

"That at the said time and place one Lillian Alleen Hildreth was then and there * * * a female person under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 16 years, * * * and was then and there in danger of leading an idle, dissolute, and immoral life by reason of the acts hereinafter alleged."

We can hardly see how an allegation could be any more explicit than this, nor how it could more definitely describe the person and condition mentioned in the statute than does this allegation of the information.

[3] It is contended, however, that the information fails to state that Mrs. Hildreth was a delinquent person within the purview of the Juvenile Court Law. The words "delinquent" or "delinquent person" are not found in sections 1 or 21 of the Juvenile Court Law of 1915. In the Juvenile Court Law of 1909 certain persons were designated as "delinquent children," and in the law of 1911 the words "delinquent persons" are used to designate a certain class of persons. And in the cases of People v. Pierro, 17 Cal. App. 741, 121 Pac. 689, and People v. Cruse, 24 Cal. App. 497, 141 Pac. 936, cited by appellant, but each decided before the passage of the law of 1915, reference is made to "delinquent and dependent persons," but neither of these statutes nor of these decisions can have any bearing upon the law as it now stands and has stood since 1915. [The information meets all of the requirements of the statute in force at the time the offense was alleged to have been committed.]

Appellant contends that there is no evidence to justify the verdict, in that it fails to show that the complaining witness is, or was at the time of the alleged crime, a person within any of the subdivisions 1 to 13 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law, and, furthermore, that the acts of the defendant were not such as "would cause, or manifestly tend to cause," the complaining witness to become or remain a person within any of said subdivisions 1 to 13.

Regarding the objection that there is no evidence that the complaining witness is such a person as is enumerated in any of the subdivisions 1 to 13 of said section 1, we are of the opinion that no such evidence is necessary as the law now stands. Under former enactments of the Juvenile Court Law, as, for instance, under the law of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 225), section 26 thereof, which corresponds to section 21 of the law of 1915, provided, in substance, that any person who should, by act or omission, contribute to the dependency or delinquency of any dependent or delinquent children, was guilty of a misdemeanor. Section 21 of the present law provides, in substance, that any person who shall commit any act, or omit the performance of any duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause or encourage any person under the age of 21 years to come within the provisions of subdivisions 1 to 13 of said section 1, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Under the former acts it was necessary to allege and prove that the complaining witness was either a dependent or a delinquent person before the defendant could be found guilty of improper conduct toward such person, but under the present law it is only necessary to show that the complaining witness is under the age of 21 years. The former act was designed to protect only delinquent and dependent children. The purpose of the present law is manifestly to protect all persons under the age of 21 years. The evidence showed, without any conflict, that the complaining witness was only 16 years of age at the time the offense was alleged to have been committed, and in our opinion this is all that is required under the present statute.

[4] The further objection is made that the evidence fails to show that the acts of the defendant were such as would cause, or manifestly tend to cause, the complaining witness to become or remain a person within any of subdivisions 1 to 13 of said section 1. The complaining witness testified to facts which, beyond question, tended to prove the following allegation of the information:

"That at all the times herein mentioned the said Harry Y. Cohen was and is an artful and designing person, and did then and there endeavor and attempt to influence, cause, allow, and to persuade and cause the said Lillian Alleen Hildreth to come within the influence, persuasion, and control of the said defendant, Harry Y. Cohen, at the times and places last aforesaid, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, on or about the 11th day of September, 1922, feel, fondle, and handle the limbs and private parts of the said Lillian Alleen Hildreth with the intent and purpose of arousing and gratifying the passions of the said defendant, Harry Y. Cohen, and of the said Lillian Alleen Hildreth, a minor child under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 16 years."

Appellant does not contend that such testimony was not given by the complaining witness, but he contends that the testimony further shows that the complaining witness was a strong-minded person and was very determined and decided in her stand against the advances of the defendant, and refused to yield in the least to his solicitations, and therefore that the acts of the defendant did not "cause or manifestly tend to cause" her to lead, or be in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, or immoral life. Conceding that the testimony established all that the appellant claims for it, still we would seriously question whether the defendant is exculpated thereby. To so hold would be to make the guilt of the defendant depend, not upon his own acts or conduct, no matter how censurable, but upon the character of the minor and her ability to resist his importunities. In the one case, if she accepted his proposal, then he would be amenable to the penal provisions of the statute, but in another case, if she rejected his advances and maintained her uprightness, then he has committed no crime, although his conduct in each case might be identical. We do not believe that the law can be so construed. On the other hand, we are of the opinion that the law, in providing that a person shall be deemed guilty of violating the statute when he commits any act which causes, or manifestly tends to cause, a person under the age of 21 years to come within the provisions of section 1 thereof, means that his guilt attaches whenever he commits such an act, independent of the success of his efforts or its effect upon the minor.

The purpose of the juvenile law as now framed, as we have already seen, is to protect the youth of our state from those evil and designing persons who would lead them astray, and we are not disposed to in any way impair its usefulness by giving any narrow or strained construction to any of its plain and obvious provisions.

In the case of People v. De Leon, 35 Cal. App. 467, 170 Pac. 173, while the identical question was not before the court, yet one very similar to that presented in the present case was under consideration, and the court used the following language:

"To require the prosecution to allege and prove that the defendant's breach of duty had resulted in the minor's actual entry upon an idle, dissolute, or immoral life would be to practically nullify the beneficial objects of the law. We find no merit, therefore, in the contention of the appellant that the information fails to state a public offense."

We are unable to agree with appellant in this contention and feel satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict.

[5] The further contention is made by appellant that the testimony of the complaining witness shows that the defendant did nothing to her other than during the ceremony of a spiritualistic reading. The evidence tends to show that the defendant was assuming to act as a medium, and in this capacity he was called upon and consulted by the complaining witness; but it is clear to us that this assumption upon his part was a mere pretext in order that he might the more easily gain control over the complaining witness. The point is entitled to no further consideration by this court.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

FREEMAN v. WALLACE et al. (Civ. 4550.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.)

1. Cancellation of instruments ⇨38—Counterclaim held to state cause of action of rescission.

A counterclaim alleging that defendants gave plaintiff $3,000 and certain notes for an assignment of a lease, certain personalty and fixtures on the premises, and the agency to handle plaintiff's wares, all of which was part of the same transaction and depended on securing landlord's consent to an assignment of the lease, and on plaintiff's failure to secure such consent defendant surrendered to plaintiff possession of the premises and every other thing or right accruing to them, held to state a cause of action for rescission.

2. Pleading ⇨126—Negative pregnant raises no issue.

An answer which is merely a negative pregnant does not raise an issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Emma B. Freeman against George J. Wallace and others. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William J. Hayes, of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued in two causes of action, one for the recovery of four months' rent for the premises situated at 386 Sutter street, San Francisco, the other for the recovery of $110 as moneys advanced by plaintiff for the account of defendants. The defendants answered that one month's rent had been paid and that they had been forced to vacate the premises because the plaintiff had no authority to assign to them the lease under which they occupied the premises. They also filed a cross-complaint in which it was alleged that a contract of agency was executed by the same parties under which the defendants were authorized to sell on the premises certain personal property of the plaintiff during the term of the lease; that the defendants paid to the plaintiff $3,000 in cash under the contract and delivered to her their promissory notes in the sum of $2,000; that, because of plaintiff's failure to secure the landlord's consent to the assignment of her lease to said premises, the defendants were compelled to and did vacate and abandon said premises and surrender the possession thereof to the plaintiff, "together with all that was therein contained belonging to said Emma B. Freeman, as well as surrendering to the said Emma B. Freeman every other thing or right accruing to them from the said Emma B. Freeman, and at the same time delivered to said Emma B. Freeman the keys to said premises, and the said Emma B. Freeman then and there accepted the surrender, aforesaid, and thereupon went into the full possession of said premises, and the use and occupation thereof, and resumed therein the conduct of the business that she had theretofore carried on therein prior to the occupation of said premises by said cross-plaintiffs."

The trial court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, except that it found three months' rent to be due instead of four, as alleged. It also found the material allegations of the cross-complaint to be true. Upon these findings judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants for the return of the sum of $3,000, less the amount of the rentals and the money advanced to the defendants, and for the cancellation of the promissory notes. The appeal is taken from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] The only grounds urged in support of the appeal are that the cross-complaint failed to state a cause of action because it did not allege an offer to restore the consideration to the appellant, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the respondents surrendered to the appellant "every other thing and right accruing to them."

It appears that three contracts were executed by these parties, the assignment of the lease of the premises, the sale of the agency for the handling of appellant's exclusive line of wares, and the agreement of appellant to consign to respondents these wares and of the respondents to purchase certain personal property and fixtures on the premises. It is alleged in the cross-complaint that these agreements were all a part of the same transaction and depended upon securing the landlord's consent to the assignment of the lease. It is further alleged that when the respondents surrendered to the appellant the possession of the premises they also surrendered "every other thing or right accruing to them." The failure of consideration, as well as the acceptance of the surrender, were also alleged, and these were sufficient to support a cause of action for a rescission.

[2] The evidence fully supports the finding that respondents surrendered to appellant every thing and right accruing to them. Furthermore, the answer to this allegation is merely a negative pregnant which did not put the matter in issue.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WALLACH. (Cr. 1099, 2591.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 5, 1923. Rehearing Denied July 3, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 3, 1923.)

1. Parent and child $\S$ 17(6)—Proof of failure to support during entire period subsequent to desertion is competent.

The offense of willful failure to support a minor child, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 270, is a continuing one, so that it was not error to admit evidence of nonsupport and of ability to support extending over the entire period between the date alleged in the indictment, on which date defendant left his family, and the date of the trial.

2. Parent and child $\S$ 17(2)—Inability to support child because of illness is "legal excuse."

The inability of a father to support his minor child during a period when he was out of work and ill is a "legal excuse" for his failure to furnish such support, within Pen. Code, $\S$ 270.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Lawful Excuse.]

3. Depositions $\S$ 11—Refusal to order depositions to show attempt to communicate with family held error.

In a prosecution for failure to support a minor child, where the evidence showed that defendant had left home, with his wife's consent, to seek employment, and that the wife had frequently moved the family from place to place without notifying defendant, though she had his address, and defendant testified he made frequent efforts to communicate with his family, it was error to refuse to order the taking of a deposition of defendant's attorney, to whom defendant had delivered the letters he had written to his family and which had been returned by the postal authorities for failure to locate the addressee.

On Rehearing.

4. Criminal law ☞554—Doubt as to truth of uncontradicted testimony of defendant does not raise conflict in evidence.

The doubt in the minds of a jury as to the truth of defendant's uncontradicted testimony cannot furnish a conflict in that testimony, since the province of the jury is to decide a case in accordance with the evidence.

5. Parent and child ☞17(2)—Law does not exact diligence of most devoted father in endeavoring to locate family.

The law does not require a father to exercise the diligence which would be exercised by the most devoted father in his efforts to locate his family so as to discharge his duty to support them, in order to escape conviction for willful failure to support, under Pen. Code, § 270, but only requires reasonable diligence on his part, and the wife is under some obligation to keep her husband informed as to the whereabouts of the family.

6. Parent and child ☞17(2)—Father not obliged to repay sums advanced for support during his absence to avoid prosecution.

Though a father who was absent from his family and unable to communicate with them for a period of years is under a legal and moral obligation to repay sums advanced by others for the support of the family during that period, he is not obliged to make such repayment to escape prosecution for willful failure to support.

7. Depositions ☞9—Court cannot arbitrarily deny application for deposition.

Though the authority given by Pen. Code, § 1354, to authorize the taking of depositions is discretionary and requires the court to be satisfied of the truth of the facts stated, the court is not vested with an arbitrary discretion and cannot deny the right to take depositions, where defendant's affidavit contained all that the statute requires and was uncontradicted.

8. Depositions ☞11—Depositions to show contents of letters held not merely cumulative of defendant's testimony.

Letters written by defendant to his wife at the last address known to him and returned by the postal authorities, with notations thereon that the addressee could not be found, are not merely cumulative of his testimony to the effect that he had written such letters, which might not be believed by the jury, and therefore defendant's right to take the deposition of the attorney to whom he had delivered the letters, and thereby compel their production, is not defeated by the fact that after he was denied the right to take the deposition he testified to writing the letters.

Opinion of the Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

9. Parent and child ☞17(2)—Inability to communicate with family shows failure to support was not willful.

In a prosecution for failure to support a minor child, the defense that defendant, though financially able to furnish the support, was unable to locate his family by the exercise of reasonable diligence, is, in effect, a defense that the failure was not willful, within Pen. Code, § 270, so that it was contrary to the presumption created by section 270e that proof of omission to furnish support is prima facie evidence that it was willful.

10. Parent and child ☞17(2)—“Without lawful excuse” in nonsupport statute refers to omissions other than those not willful.

In Pen. Code, § 270, making willful failure to furnish support to a minor child without lawful excuse an offense, the phrase “without lawful excuse” was intended to cover other cases than omissions to provide support which were not willful.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Without Lawful Excuse.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Louis Wallach was convicted of willful failure to support his minor child, and he appeals. Reversed.

A. D. Duncan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of a felony, to wit, willful failure, without lawful excuse, to provide for the support of a minor child. Section 270, Pen. Code. The indictment charges the offense as having been committed on the 27th day of June, 1914, at which date the minor was of the age of five years, and that defendant has absented himself from the state since said date.

The testimony was to the effect that at the time alleged in the indictment the defendant was working in San Francisco and receiving a salary of $18 a week and supporting his wife and children. In July, 1914, the defendant lost his position because of the destruction by fire of the place of business of the company by which he was employed. It was difficult for him to secure work in San Francisco, and he sold some of his clothing and went to Los Angeles on a freight boat. This was with the consent of his wife. For a time his family secured their food upon credit at the grocery store. Defendant testified that he sent small amounts of money to his family during the short time he remained in Los Angeles, although he was able at the time to secure work for only a few days a week. There is, however, conflict in the testimony as to the receipt of this money, but there is no testimony other than that of the defendant as to his ability to support his family during this period, and his testimony narrated facts which would establish his inability to do so. About November, 1914, defendant lost his position in Los Angeles, because of a fire at his place of employment, and he returned to San Francisco to his family. At that time the family was supported by credit at the grocery store and a small amount of money which defendant had brought with him from Los Angeles and which he stated had been borrowed. Also, at that time, Mrs. Wallach accepted aid from the Eureka Benevolent Society, an organization for the relief of needy persons of the Jewish race. Defendant was again unable to obtain employment in San Francisco, because, as he stated, it was a "dull time of year" in his business of egg candler. Accordingly, after several weeks, he borrowed some money and returned to Los Angeles, and, upon being unable to find employment there, borrowed more money and went to Chicago. There he secured irregular employment for two or three days a week, and the first $10 he could accumulate, over and above his actual living expenses, he sent to his family. The wife and daughter admit receiving this, which was sent about three weeks after defendant left Los Angeles. The defendant testified that he had sent a second remittance of $10 to his family, but this is denied by the wife. However, she did acknowledge receipt of the first remittance, and shortly thereafter, in reply to a suggestion by the defendant that he would like to return to San Francisco as he had become very ill, she wrote to him that there was nothing to do in San Francisco and suggested that, as she was being provided for, defendant remain and do the best he could in Chicago. This letter was addressed to the defendant in care of the Egg Inspectors' Union of Chicago. Mrs. Wallach never made any attempt to communicate with her husband after that letter was written, and he testified that mail would always have reached him if intrusted to the office of his union at Chicago, an address which his wife knew and to which she had previously written.

On the other hand, Mrs. Wallach moved very frequently about this time. According to her own testimony, she was living on Webster street and O'Farrell in June, 1914, and moved from there after four months and took up her residence on Golden Gate avenue, from where she moved to a house on Octavia street, where she lived three months, after which time she moved to Webster street, where she remained four months, and then moved again to Webster and Pine. She remained there about two years and then moved to Bush and Fillmore. The last letter she received from her husband was delivered to her at the Golden Gate avenue address. Defendant testified that he wrote at frequent intervals to the Golden Gate avenue address, the only address that he knew, and that the letters were returned to him by the postal authorities with the notation that the house was vacant or that the addressee could not be found. Defendant testified that some of these letters contained money.

The defendant worked intermittently in Chicago for three or four years, during which time he testified he was seriously ill for a part of the time and ailing most of the time, and that he incurred hospital and doctor's bills which consumed all his earnings. He testified that in August, 1916, he journeyed to Detroit, Mich., to ask his niece to write to his wife at the last address he knew, thinking that perhaps the wife would reply to the niece even though she were unwilling to write to him. The envelope addressed to the wife at 857 Golden Gate avenue, written by the niece and mailed at Detroit, Mich., August 28, 1915, was admitted in evidence. It had been returned to the sender by the postal authorities marked "Unclaimed," etc. Defendant testified that many of the other letters written to his wife which had been returned to him were handed by him before his arrest to an attorney in New York City, and he asked permission to take the deposition of said attorney to prove the contents of these letters and the notations of the postal authorities upon their envelopes. This permission was denied, and its refusal is assigned by the appellant as prejudicial error and will be discussed hereinafter.

Defendant testified that in 1917 he was employed by a Chicago firm as a buyer at Dallas, Tex.; that while in Texas he again wrote to his family, addressing one letter to the old address at Golden Gate avenue and another to the United Hebrew Society, 436 O'Farrell street. In 1918 the defendant left Chicago and obtained a position with a firm in Newark, N. J. He now ceased his efforts to locate his family. He testified that about this time, while he was earning $50 a week, he was ill much of the time and did not work steadily and spent a large amount of money for doctor bills, etc. Later he went to New York City and engaged in numerous enterprises, with varying success, until finally, in September or October, 1921, we find him with a "dairy store" in New York City, retailing eggs, butter, fresh roasted coffee, etc., and making a profit of from $150 to $200 a week. Shortly after establishing this business (in October, 1921), defendant retained an attorney, one Fallick, and asked him to locate his family in San Francisco. It was through a communication sent by this attorney to the police department of San Francisco, which was referred by said department to the Eureka Benevolent Society, the benefactor of the family, that knowledge of the whereabouts of defendant was obtained. The Eureka Benevolent Society, through its agents in New York, made an investigation and caused the arrest and return of defendant to San Francisco under indictment.

At the time of his arrest defendant offered to send $1,000 for the transportation of his family to New York and to support them there, or to pay them a substantial amount weekly for their support in San Francisco if they desired to remain here. The Eureka Benevolent Society, which conducted the negotiations, telegraphed to its agent in New York City that defendant's family declined to go to New York and declined the offer of future support unless the defendant would either pay in cash or provide a bond to secure the future repayment of over $3,000 expended by the Eureka Benevolent Society and the city and county of San Francisco for the relief of his family during the period of defendant's absence. This the defendant was unable to do, and his prosecution followed.

[1] The defendant insisted at the trial that the prosecution be limited in its proof to some specific time within which to prove the commission of the offense, but the trial court ruled that proof of nonsupport and of defendant's ability to provide for his family might range over the entire period between the date mentioned in the indictment, to wit, June, 1914, and the date of the arrest, November, 1921. This ruling is assigned as error under the authority of People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 168, 65 Pac. 323. In that case the defendant was tried for rape, and it was held to be error to admit evidence of many separate offenses, extending over a considerable period of time. There can be no doubt about the correctness of this ruling, but that case is clearly differentiable from the present one. A prosecution under section 270 of the Penal Code is, necessarily, for a continuing offense. Failure to provide upon one day or another day is not the evil aimed at by the statute. It is the continuing offense, the failure to provide for a substantial length of time, without legal excuse, which constitutes this offense. The instructions and ruling of the trial court that this was a continuing offense were correct. People v. Stanley, 33 Cal. App. 624, 626, 166 Pac. 596.

However, it seems to us that the evidence herein narrated as to the earnings and conduct of the defendant during the period in question offered a lawful excuse within the meaning of the statute. It might well be said that a devoted husband and father would have made more persistent efforts to locate his family, and failing in that would have returned to seek them, but we cannot hold that to establish a "lawful excuse" defendant is compelled to show more than a reasonable effort to locate those dependent upon him. Some duty was upon the wife to communicate with her husband and inform him of the whereabouts of herself and her children and of their needs. That general subject was discussed in the case of People v. Meads, 28 Cal. App. 140, 151 Pac. 552, in which it was said:

"When the wife and child left under the circumstances indicated, the defendant was justified in assuming that the mother intended to support and take care of the child and it was not his duty to hunt her up and tender assistance. He could well wait until informed that assistance was needed and would be accepted."

[2] True, the present case does not present the element of the departure of the wife and child from the husband, but the evidence shows that the husband left with the knowledge and consent of the wife, for a legitimate purpose, to wit, to seek a field where he could better earn a living for himself and family, and when the wife wrote to him not to return to San Francisco, and subsequently moved from place to place every few months, it was her duty to inform the defendant of her whereabouts and not to expect him to employ the services of the police department to find her in order to offer her support. The evidence also shows that during the period when the defendant knew the whereabouts of his family he was without work and ill and had no ability to support them. Such inability is a legal excuse. People v. Forester, 29 Cal. App. 460, 155 Pac. 1022.

[3] But quite apart from the question of whether or not the defendant has shown a legal excuse, there seems to have been no justification for the refusal to allow the defendant to secure the deposition of the attorney Fallick, whom he had employed in New York to find his family. Defendant stated that he had given to Fallick the conclusive evidence of his numerous efforts to find his family, that is, the returned letters which he addressed to his wife from various parts of the country over a period of years, and which were sent to her last-known address. Defendant was a man of little education and highly excitable, as shown by his outbursts during the trial, and he testified that when he was arrested in New York at the home of his attorney, after he had engaged his services to aid him in finding and providing for his family, he conceived the idea that he had been deceived or betrayed by Fallick and threatened to have him disbarred. He later attempted to chastise Fallick in a public park. The entire situation revealed strained relations between Fallick and defendant, and defendant asserted that Fallick had refused to return his letters. These letters would have been most important and convincing evidence. Defendant was entitled to have them presented to the jury and he was entitled to secure their production by the only means open, which was to take the deposition of Fallick. The denial of this right is, in itself, prejudicial error and demands a reversal of the judgment.

Under the views just expressed, it is unnecessary for us to consider the point made by the defendant that under the provisions of section 196 of the Civil Code he was released from an obligation to support his minor child because of an order of the juvenile court depriving him of its custody and giving its sole custody to the mother, nor is it necessary to discuss the other assignments of error.

The judgment is reversed.

On Rehearing.

LANGDON, P. J. In the above-entitled matter the respondent has filed a petition for a rehearing, after decision by this court reversing the judgment against the defendant. The earnestness with which the petition is urged, as well as the important question of general public welfare involved in the facts of this case, make it desirable that some reply be made to the points urged in support of the petition for a rehearing.

The opinion heretofore filed herein reviewed the facts disclosed by the evidence and stated that such facts, showing a reasonable effort by defendant over a period of several years to locate his family, without success, would seem to offer a legal excuse for his failure to provide for his minor child. Although the decision was not reached upon that ground, the respondent has taken issue with this portion of the opinion and urges that section 270e, Penal Code, provides that omission to furnish necessary food, clothing, etc., for a child is prima facie evidence that such nonsupport or omission to furnish necessary food, etc., is willful, and this prima facie proof creates a conflict with the testimony of the defendant, which conflict was resolved by the jury. The section of the Penal Code under which defendant was prosecuted (section 270) provides: "A parent of * * * a * * * minor child who willfully omits, without lawful excuse, to furnish necessary food," etc. To say that the willfulness of the act is inferred from evidence of failure to provide does not touch the question discussed by the opinion in this case, which is that, regardless of the fact that defendant's willful failure to provide may have been shown, the evidence discloses facts which, under the decisions of this state, might constitute a lawful excuse. The prosecution must prove not only that there was a willful failure to provide, but that there was no lawful excuse for the omission. People v. Smith, 38 Cal. App. 176, 175 Pac. 696. This latter element is an important part of the statute. It is not the purpose of the statute to punish a father for failure to perform his duty as such, but to secure to minor children necessary food, clothing, and shelter. People v. Clarke, 51 Cal. App. 473, 201 Pac. 465.

It was because it appeared to us, for the reasons just stated, that section 270e of the Penal Code was not applicable to the questions presented in this case, that said section was not discussed in the opinion.

Respondent complains that many of the facts recited in the opinion are taken from the testimony of the defendant. This was because that testimony, in our opinion, stands uncontradicted in the record and must be given its full value. As we have stated, respondent urges that the prima facie case made by section 270e, Penal Code, is sufficient to raise a conflict with defendant's testimony and justify the verdict, but, as we have just pointed out, section 270e of the Penal Code has no effect in providing proof that defendant's failure to provide for his child was without lawful excuse, and it was to this point that the defense was directed.

Respondent also asserts that a conflict exists in the evidence because of circumstances from which the jury would be justified in inferring facts contrary to the testimony in the record. The first circumstance relied upon is that the defendant failed to provide for his family for seven years. We fail to see how this conflicts with his testimony regarding his repeated efforts to communicate with his family. It does not raise a conflict in the testimony that defendant wrote to his wife at frequent intervals for several years, sending money in some of the letters, and that these letters were addressed to her last-known address in San Francisco and were returned by the postal authorities; that a letter written by a relative to defendant's wife met the same fate; that defendant, finally, after he had succeeded in securing a regular income, engaged an attorney to locate his family; that it was through the inquiries of this attorney addressed to the police department of San Francisco that defendant was located and arrested. The other testimony relied upon by respondent to create a conflict goes to the question of defendant's ability to support his child. We will concede that the testimony shows his ability to support his child for a large part of the time that he omitted to do so. This the defendant did not deny; his own testimony establishes it. His lawful excuse was that he had made a reasonable effort to locate his wife and had failed to do so; that she never communicated with him during the entire period of his absence, although mail would always have reached him at an address which she knew and to which she had last written; that she moved about frequently and made no arrangements for forwarding her mail or for notifying the defendant of the whereabouts of herself and her family.

believe the defendant's story of his efforts to find his family. The doubt in the minds of a jury of the only testimony in the record upon a given subject cannot furnish a conflict in that testimony. The province of the jury is to decide a case in accordance with the evidence.

[5] Respondent points out various means by which the defendant might have located his family. It is suggested that defendant might have written the police department or public officials or the Eureka Benevolent Society, which organization he knew had assisted his family before he left San Francisco. Assuredly, he might have and should have done any and all of these things, but he stated that he did not think of them. When an attorney was employed by defendant to locate his family, the attorney thought of one of these methods and located the family through the aid of the police department, which in turn asked the co-operation of the Eureka Benevolent Society. We think the defendant might well have done even more than the things suggested by the respondent. He might well have returned to San Francisco to search for his family. The decision in this case indicates no sympathy on the part of this court with the general conduct of the defendant toward his family, but, as stated in the opinion, the law does not exact of defendant the diligence that would be employed by the most devoted husband and father. It would be impracticable to apply such a standard in criminal prosecutions under section 270, Penal Code. The law can only demand of the defendant reasonable diligence in locating his family, and some duty is also placed upon the wife to keep the defendant informed of her whereabouts, especially when she moves about frequently, as was done in the present case. Some duty is also upon the wife to inform the husband of the need for support for the minor child, especially in view of the circumstances of the present case, where the wife testified that she had worked during the entire time of her marriage, except when she was ill or had a very young child. Under the law it was as much her duty to support the minor child as it was his duty, if she were able to do so, and we think she should be held to some duty, not only to notify the defendant of her whereabouts, but to notify him of her financial needs. People v. Meads, 28 Cal. App. 140, 151 Pac. 552.

We are not insensible to respondent's argument that the statute under consideration should be liberally construed to effectuate its purpose, and we realize the social problem involved in cases of this character and the burden placed upon the state and upon such admirable institutions as the Eureka Benevolent Society, which cared for defendant's family during several years of his absence. However, we are also aware that section 270, Penal Code, might be used as an instrument of oppression and abuse in many conceivable cases unless it be construed by the courts with a view to protecting substantial rights of defendants charged thereunder. The decisions of this state show a wise policy of protection against such possible abuses. In the case of People v. Forester, 29 Cal. App. 462, 155 Pac. 1023, the court, in considering the section of the Penal Code we are discussing, quotes with approval the following language from another jurisdiction:

"While the law in question is salutary, it nevertheless is of that character which requires it to be administered with some care so as to not produce more mischief by its enforcement in certain cases than can be prevented thereby."

[6] In the present case, as recited in the opinion, the defendant voluntarily engaged an attorney to locate his family, and it was through the communication of this attorney to the police department in San Francisco that the Eureka Benevolent Society learned of defendant's residence in New York. It immediately telegraphed its representative in New York to investigate, and upon such investigation it was learned that the defendant had a dairy store in New York and was making a profit of about $150 a week from this source. He had only been in business for a few weeks at this time, and he offered to send $1,000 to San Francisco for the transportation of his family to New York and to support them either in New York or in San Francisco, as they desired. He offered to transfer his interest in his store to his wife as security for the performance of his obligations. This seems, from the record, to have been all he could possibly do. The Eureka Benevolent Society, however, declined this offer unless the defendant would either pay back something over $3,000 expended by it and the city and county of San Francisco in the support of his family, or give a bond to pay this amount back in installments. The defendant was unable to do this, and his arrest and prosecution followed. There is no question about the defendant's moral and legal obligation to repay the money paid out for the benefit of his family, but we fail to recognize any responsibility to do so to avoid a criminal prosecution. With all due respect to the generosity and good work of the Eureka Benevolent Society, we do not think it is in the interest of public policy that the statute be stretched and distorted against the defendant so that he may be forced to repay the money which the society expended upon his family during his absence.

[7] The foregoing lengthy discussion upon the evidence is indulged in merely in deference to the earnestness of the petition for rehearing. It is not really vitally connected with the decision upon this appeal. The opinion suggested that the evidence probably showed a lawful excuse on the part of the defendant for failing to provide for his child, but did not place the decision upon that ground. It was held that the trial court committed prejudicial error in refusing to the defendant permission to take a deposition in New York. The facts with relation to said deposition are set out in the opinion and will not be discussed herein. The answer of the respondent in its petition for rehearing is that section 1354 of the Penal Code, under authority of which leave to take the deposition was requested, is discretionary and requires the court to be satisfied of the truth of the facts stated. It is sufficient to say that discretion thus vested is never an arbitrary discretion and that in the present case the facts appearing in defendant's affidavit were uncontradicted. The court therefore was not at liberty to disregard them. In the case of People v. Lundquist, 84 Cal. 26, 24 Pac. 154, the Code section under consideration here was discussed. It was said:

"The evidence sought to be elicited was material and important to the defensé interposed by the defendant. The showing made contained all that the statute requires, and the reason for not having procured the order and the evidence before was sufficient."

[8] In the present case, as we have stated, defendant's affidavit supporting his motion appears in the record uncontradicted. The evidence sought to be procured was material and very important. Respondent contends that it was cumulative. It was the most convincing evidence of the facts relied upon by defendant to constitute a lawful excuse, and in its absence defendant was forced to offer exceedingly weak evidence of the same facts, and because he did offer what evidence he could on the subject should not militate against his rights when it is apparent that he has been prejudiced by the denial of the privilege of taking the deposition in New York. The defendant, having failed to obtain permission to secure the more convincing evidence of his efforts to locate his family, i. e., the letters returned to him by the postal authorities with the statement that the address could not be found, testified on the witness stand to their existence. There can be no question about the fact that he was prejudiced by being forced to rely upon this weaker evidence of so important a fact in his defense. Naturally, he could not recall the details of the letters, their dates, or contents, and his testimony was without much force because of these circumstances. On the other hand, the evidence of the letters themselves, with the markings of the postal authorities, would have been most convincing proof of his defense of a lawful excuse. Under these circumstances the ruling of the trial court was prejudicial error.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of the Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [9] In denying the application for a transfer to this court, we deem it proper to say that we agree with the District Court of Appeal in reversing the judgment of the lower court because the defendant was deprived of the opportunity of fully presenting his defense, namely, that he endeavored to get in communication with his wife and child and had sent his wife money. This evidence would tend to show that the failure of the defendant to support his child was not willful, and it was for the jury to say, from all the evidence, whether or not that defense had been so far established as to raise a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant had willfully failed to provide for his child. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal discusses the proper interpretation of sections 270 and 270e of the Penal Code. It is not necessary to consider the proper interpretation of the phrase "without lawful excuse" contained in section 270 of the Penal Code, for the reason that the defense interposed in this case was, in effect, that the failure of the defendant to provide for his child was not a willful one. It is therefore unnecessary to determine the exact meaning of the phrase "without lawful excuse." Where the legal obligation to support exists, and the defense of the father is his inability to furnish such support, either because of his inability to communicate with his child or because of his lack of means, section 270e applies, and "proof of * * * the omission to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter, or of medical attendance for a child or children is prima facie evidence that such * * * omission to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter or medical attendance is willful."

[10] In determining the proper interpretation of section 270 it is evident that the phrase "without lawful excuse" was intended to cover other cases than omissions to provide which were not willful.

The application for transfer is denied.

On the 6th day of July, 1917, Imperial Laguna Water Company entered into a contract with the United States government with respect to the diversion and use of water from and of the Colorado river. By the terms of the contract, under certain conditions therein specified, the United States government had the right to cancel the contract. However, without a formal cancellation of that contract, on October 23, 1918, the United States government entered into another contract with a different company—the Imperial irrigation district—covering practically the same subject-matter as did the former contract between the United States government and the Imperial Laguna Water Company. The respective rights of the two companies being in conflict, an effort was then made by the irrigation district to have the contract between the United States government and the Laguna Company canceled by the United States government. Representatives of each of the two companies were in attendance at Washington, D. C., for a considerable time, and, after a hearing before the Secretary of the Interior on the 8th and the 9th days of April, 1921, the Secretary of the Interior, on the 10th day of April, decided that the said contract should be canceled; the order to that effect being signed by him three days later. Prior to as well as after that time some negotiations had taken place between the representatives of the two separate companies looking to a settlement of the controversy. The case came into court by reason of the fact that certain other independent water companies (the plaintiffs herein), located in the Imperial Valley, considering themselves and their stockholders aggrieved because the irrigation district was about to pay to the Laguna Company a large sum of money on account of an alleged contract of settlement of the controversy between the two companies (which would result in the levy of a tax by the irrigation district against the lands owned by the said stockholders), brought a suit seeking to enjoin the irrigation district from paying the same, and the Laguna Company intervened. The lower court decreed in favor of the complainants and the Laguna Company has appealed.

[1, 2] There are several specifications of error and many reasons urged for a reversal—the principal points being with reference to the power or authority of the irrigation district to make any contract of settlement with the Laguna Company; the power or authority of the representatives of the irrigation district to bind it by any contract; the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the judgment; the sufficiency of certain findings by the court; the admission of certain evidence and the rejection of certain other evidence by the court. However, the principal question involved is whether or not there was a "meeting of the minds"—that is to say, was there ever a definite proposal made by the one side which was unqualifiedly accepted by the other. As to that point the court found:

"That no contract has ever been entered into between the said district and the said Imperial Laguna Water Company, * * * or any one on its * * * behalf."

An examination of the evidence discloses the fact that such finding is amply supported by the evidence, and, while the evidence may be conflicting, the rule of law is of long standing that in such circumstances the finding cannot be disturbed. Such being the case, the questions of the power or the authority of either the corporation or its representatives to enter into a contract of the nature of the alleged contract here under consideration become unnecessary of decision by this court.

Finding No. 13 by the court was as follows:

"That except as herein specially found to be true, all and singular the allegations contained in paragraphs 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 of the first cause of action of intervenor's complaint, and denied by the plaintiffs or defendants, are untrue."

Many decisions by the Supreme Court of this state are to the effect that a finding of such a nature is so vague and so indefinite that in certain circumstances it may be insufficient to support a judgment. Ladd v. Tully, 51 Cal. 277; Johnson v. Squires, 53 Cal. 37; Harlan v. Dly, 55 Cal. 340; Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379; Goodnow v. Griswold, 68 Cal. 599, 9 Pac. 837; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 606, 21 Pac. 965; Perkins v. West Coast Lumber Co., 120 Cal. 27, 52 Pac. 118; Krug v. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125; Holt Mfg. Co. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 265, 97 Pac. 516; Schwartz v. Carpenter, 157 Cal. 432, 103 Pac. 318.

Finding No. 13 refers to certain paragraphs of the first cause of action of the complaint in intervention, the gist of which allegations is that the United States is the owner of a diversion dam; that it entered into a contract with intervenor with reference to the water impounded therein; that intervenor has complied with each and all the terms contained within said contract and that said contract has remained in full force and effect from the time it was drawn on July 6, 1917, up to the date of its cancellation on April 13, 1920; that intervenor never waived nor agreed to waive any of its rights thereunder; that certain offers were respectively made and rejected by the Laguna Company to the irrigation district and by the irrigation district to the Laguna Company; that on April 9, 1921, it was agreed between intervenor and the irrigation district to submit the controversy existing between them to an arbitration commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, who was cognizant of the dispute and differences between intervenor and the irrigation district; that thereafter and on the 13th day of April, 1920, and in pursuance of said agreement to arbitrate, the Secretary of the Interior canceled the contract between the United States government and the intervenor, and that he thereupon appointed the said arbitration commission; that the reason for the cancellation of said contract was in order that an equitable settlement might be effected as between intervenor and the irrigation district, which cancellation the Secretary of the Interior would not have ordered in the absence of the agreement to arbitrate as between intervenor and the irrigation district; that the arbitration commission made an award in favor of intervenor, no part of which has been paid; and that intervenor, relying in good faith upon said agreement to arbitrate, took no appeal from the said order of cancellation by the Secretary of the Interior.

[3, 4] As heretofore stated, the basic question in this matter upon the decision of which the case must ultimately rest is: Was there ever any agreement between the irrigation district and the Laguna Company? The judge of the superior court before whom the suit was heard has answered that question in the negative, and this court is bound by his conclusion as to the facts in that regard. What effect, if any, is produced on the judgment by a failure (assuming it be such and that a finding covering such allegations is not elsewhere contained within the findings of the court) to find on the issues as presented by the paragraphs of the complaint in intervention to which reference has heretofore been made remains to be determined. The most that could be expected by appellant would be a finding by the court that each fact as alleged in the several paragraphs of its complaint in intervention (other than the fact of the alleged contract between intervenor and the district) is true. But even so, it still leaves appellant without foundation for a judgment in its favor. The failure to find upon material issues is prejudicial error for which a new trial should ordinarily be granted (Great Western Gold Co. v. Chambers, 153 Cal. 307, 95 Pac. 151; Swift v. Occidental M. & P. Co., 141 Cal. 166, 74 Pac. 700; Haight v. Tryon, 112 Cal. 6, 44 Pac. 318; Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 17); but a judgment will not be reversed on that account where, if the findings were in favor of appellant, no different judgment could be entered (Porter v. Woodward, 57 Cal. 535; McCourtney v. Fortune, 57 Cal. 617; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738; Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 136, 11 Pac. 589; Spotts v. Hanley, 85 Cal. 156, 24 Pac. 738; Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557; Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615, 30 Pac. 783, 19 L. R. A. 92; Merrill v. Merrill, 102 Cal. 317, 36 Pac. 675; Morrison v. Stone, 103 Cal. 94, 37 Pac. 142; Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 365, 41 Pac. 408; Sewell v. Price, 104 Cal. 265, 128 Pac. 407),

The trial court having found that no contractual relation ever existed as between the irrigation district and the Laguna Company, and all the other allegations being subsidiary and dependent upon that fact so far as the complaint in intervention is concerned, it is immaterial whether the court found for or against such other allegations, or whether there was any finding whatsoever with respect thereto. The determination by the court of the one outstanding issue is sufficient in itself. It absolutely controls the other issues in the case, regardless of any decision which the court might have made with reference to them. Appellant must not only show error, but must also show that it is really harmed thereby before the court, on account of such error, will be justified in ordering a reversal of the judgment. National Bank of San Mateo v. Whitney, 40 Cal. App. 276, 180 Pac. 845.

Concerning a question of the failure of the court to find on several material issues and because certain material findings were conflicting and irreconcilable, it is said in Black v. Harrison Home Co., 155 Cal. 132, 99 Pac. 499, that—

"The answer to interveners' claim as to conflicting findings lies in the fact that there is no conflict in the findings as to the execution of the contract. It is positively and unequivocally found that defendant never entered into either of these contracts, and the other findings contain nothing inconsistent with this. In view of the condition of the pleadings and the issues made thereby, these findings wholly dispose of interveners' case, and necessitate judgment against them regardless of the other issues made by the pleadings. It is therefore immaterial here whether other findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence, whether there are findings upon other issues, and whether findings in regard to some other issues are conflicting or unintelligible."

In Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 Pac. 495, which was a suit upon conflicting claims to real property which involved the quieting of title thereto and where the court failed to find upon certain material issues, namely, upon the common grantor's mental condition at the time when one of the deeds was made, upon the matter of alleged unfair advantage over the grantor taken by defendant, upon the question of consideration for the deed to defendant, upon the motives of defendant in marrying the common grantor, and upon the subject of the alleged plan to obtain the property by evil designs, the court said:

"Findings upon these aspects of the litigation were not necessary in view of the judgment that there had been a valid delivery of the deeds to the plaintiffs in escrow and that defendant then had full knowledge of that transaction. The determination of the last-named issues controlled the judgment. This court will not reverse a judgment because of failure to make findings which would not necessitate a different judgment even if they were made and entered in the appellant's favor. [Citing cases.]"

And see, also, Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449, 150 Pac. 375; National Bank of San Mateo v. Whitney, 40 Cal. App. 276, 180 Pac. 845; Berry v. Crowell, 55 Cal. App. 534, 203 Pac. 835.

Appellant's objections to certain other findings by the court, which ordinarily might be of some moment, also lose their importance because of the fact that they, too, revolve around and are necessarily controlled by the main issue as to whether or not any contract was ever made between the irrigation district and the Laguna Company.

The judge of the trial court refused to admit in evidence a certain exhibit offered by intervenor for the purpose of showing what had been done by it under its contract with the United States government, in order that the fact might be established that the cancellation of the contract could have been resisted with likelihood of success. But assuming as true all that was claimed would be shown by the exhibit, as well as its possible result on the question of cancellation of the contract by the United States government in view of the decision by the court as to the nonexistence of any contract between the irrigation district and the Laguna Company, such evidence would be immaterial.

[5] Another point urged by appellant relates to the fact that over the objection of intervenor the court, under the provision of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, as added by Stat. 1917, p. 58, permitted certain officers and directors of the defendant irrigation district to be examined by the plaintiffs as under cross-examination. The most that can be said against even the cross-examination of one's own witness is that he is thereby permitted to answer leading questions, and it is well understood that answers to leading questions do not deserve, nor are they accorded, the same credence as is given to answers to questions not in that category. It is purely a matter of the weight of such testimony, and the objection to such questions relates more to the weight of the evidence to be received, rather than to its admissibility. If, under the pleadings in this case and the admissions and stipulation of counsel representing respectively the plaintiffs and defendant irrigation district, the examination of the officers of the irrigation district as under cross-examination amounted to nothing more than asking leading questions of such officers, the rule is well settled that such a course may be pursued, dependent upon the discretion of the court. That such discretion was carefully exercised is manifest by an inspection of the record herein. Assuming, without deciding, that in the circumstances of this case, the plaintiffs did not have the right, under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, to examine the officers and the directors of the defendant irrigation district as under cross-examination, still the course pursued by the trial court resulted in no prejudice to the intervener company.

There appears to have been no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN PEDRO v. STANSBURY et al. (Civ. 4070.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 29, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.)

1. Partnership ⇨311(3)—Notes for account stated held to preclude general reopening of account.

Where two partners had agreed on a statement of their account on dissolving partnership, and one of them had given the other his notes for the amount due according to that statement, he cannot have a general accounting of the partnership affairs, without proof of a gross mistake going to the whole accounting, or of fraud by the opposite party, but can only have the account stated corrected as to the items in which he shows there had been a mistake.

2. Account stated ⇨8—Can be disregarded entirely for mistake only if gross.

An account stated can be disregarded entirely, and the whole account reopened for mistake, only if the mistake is so gross that it affects the entire account.

3. Stipulations ⇨14(1)—Account stated held not waived by stipulation for reference.

In an action on notes given for the amount shown to be due by an account stated, in which defendant claimed mistake in the statement of the account, a stipulation for a reference to take an accounting as to the correctness of all purported statements, and permitting amendments to the pleadings as further facts should be developed by the report of the referee, did not waive the presumptions in favor of the validity of the account stated, so as to authorize a general reconsideration of the account without reference to the statement.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of San Pedro against Charles Stansbury, in which the defendant filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff and against John Balch. From a judgment fixing the amount of defendant's liability after a partnership accounting, the plaintiff and cross-defendant appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Richard C. Goodspeed, and Goodspeed & Pendell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

K. A. Miller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In the year 1911 Charles Stansbury and John Balch entered into a partnership agreement for the purpose of carrying on a contracting and paving business. That business continued until August 28, 1915, when it was terminated. Stansbury then gave to Balch a written memorandum reading as follows:

"This memorandum certifies that the undersigned, Chas. Stansbury and J. Balch, both of Los Angeles, Cal., have this day above mentioned, viz. August 28, 1915, checked up the accounts and transactions affecting the contracts known as the St. Louis, Santa Cruz, Section Three, and Fifth Street of San Pedro, and all other jobs prior to this 28th day of August, 1915, and have agreed by and between themselves that there is a net amount due the said J. Balch from said Chas. Stansbury, amounting to twenty-one thousand seven hundred twenty-four dollars and forty-four cents ($21,724.44). [Signed] Chas. Stansbury." (Finding VII.)

Between August 28, 1915, and December 16, 1916, Stansbury made some payments on account of said indebtedness, and on said December 16th gave to Balch four notes, being for a total amount of $16,846, which represented the actual amount then estimated by said parties to be due and owing from Stansbury to Balch, and said notes were given unconditionally in evidence and acknowledgment thereof and for no other purpose. (Finding VIII.)

Under said partnership agreement, Balch was to furnish, and he did furnish, his tools and equipment, contribute his services, and all contracts under the partnership were to be taken in the name of Balch, who was to superintend, and did superintend, look after, and employ all the men in carrying on the said partnership business, subject to advice from Stansbury. Stansbury was to, and he did, figure and advise with Balch on all contracts, furnish bonds for and finance the same, and also furnish such equipment as he then had. It was agreed that a settlement of accounts would be had after each job or contract, and that there would be allowed and paid by Stansbury to Balch interest at 7 per cent. per annum on all moneys furnished by Balch and on his share of the profits from said jobs left with Stansbury. Otherwise, it was agreed that no salaries or other compensation should be drawn by either party, and all profits thereunder were to be divided equally. (Finding IX.)

Prior to the commencement of said partnership the said Balch and Stansbury had mutual interests in certain contracts in which one John Radich was also a partner, and said Stansbury also made collections on certain contracts belonging to said Balch and Radich. The proceeds of said contracts and of said collections, after settlement had and made by Stansbury with Radich (on February 10, 1912, with reference to the collections on the Balch-Radich contracts, and on February 29, 1912, with reference to the Balch-Radich-Stansbury contracts), were retained by Mr. Stansbury and carried along into the accounts of the new partnership between Balch and Stansbury. (Finding XIII.)

The notes of December 16, 1916, executed by Stansbury to Balch, were thereafter indorsed and delivered by Balch to the First National Bank of San Pedro before maturity in consideration of certain loans and advancements made and to be made by the bank to Balch, and as security for any and all indebtedness then or thereafter existing from Balch to the bank, and also for the purposes of suit on said notes and collection thereof at law or otherwise by the plaintiff for the benefit of Balch after satisfaction of any and all claims of the plaintiff. The plaintiff has been at all times mentioned in the complaint in this action the legal owner and holder of each of the two notes sued upon by the plaintiff in this action, but subject to any sufficient defense that Stansbury may have to said notes or to either of them as against Balch. (Finding III.)

On the 4th day of May, 1917, the bank commenced this action (superior court No. B-50368) to recover on two of the notes, which were for the principal sum of $4,000 each. Previous to that time the bank prosecuted another action (B-49418) against Stansbury on the other two of the said four notes of date December 16, 1916. In said action B-50368, which is the action in which this present appeal is taken, Stansbury, in addition to certain denials which raised issues upon some of the allegations of the complaint, set forth in his answer an affirmative defense, alleging the said partnership agreement and sundry transactions thereunder, by virtue whereof he claimed to have a good defense against the plaintiff's action.

At the same time with the filing of his answer Stansbury filed a cross-complaint against both the bank and Balch, wherein the cross-complainant set out the said partnership between the parties pursuant to said agreement and demanded an accounting of the partnership matters, and that cross-complainant have judgment that said notes be discharged and satisfied, and that he also have additional relief against said Balch. There followed an answer by the bank to the cross-complaint, an answer by Balch to the cross-complaint, a cross-complaint by Balch against Stansbury and an answer thereto. On April 10, 1918, while the case was on trial, an amended cross-complaint was filed by Stansbury, to which separate answers were filed by the cross-defendants.

It was alleged by Stansbury that the partnership agreement never was terminated; that at the time when the notes in suit were executed, the partnership was about to enter upon a contract for certain work known as "Fountain Avenue Sewer Contract" for the sum of $47,900; that the notes in this action, and in said action B-49418, were given solely as collateral security for accommodation of the partnership and to be used in obtaining moneys from the bank for said partnership for certain stated purposes relating to their construction business, to wit, for purchasing material and paying for labor in financing a contract for the improvement of Carolina street at San Pedro; that at no time have any settlements been made between cross-complainant Stansbury and said Balch which were intended to be other than tentative and temporary settlements "subject to any and all corrections, inaccuracies or mistakes, when the accounts between said partners were thereafter accurately determined and settled." But the court found, not only that the notes were given unconditionally, but also that the partnership terminated on the 28th day of August, 1915, and that no work was done thereafter by the partnership.

"This cross-complainant alleges that in the temporary accountings thus taken and in tentative settlements made, the books and accounts were not in such condition to disclose an accurate statement of the partnership affairs, and that since the said tentative settlements have been made this cross-complainant alleges he has discovered and finds that from time to time mutual mistakes had been made, which were not known at the time tentative settlements were had, and large sums of money have been paid by this cross-complainant for and on behalf of said partnership that at no time have been taken into consideration or allowed as credits to this cross-complainant from the said partnership, and through such mutual mistake, accident, inadvertence, and not taken into consideration, the said partnership is indebted to this cross-complainant in the following particular items, to wit: * * * Which above items amount in all to the sum of $6,316.04, no part of which has been paid by the said partnership to this cross-complainant, nor considered in any tentative settlements heretofore made, and for which the said partnership is now indebted to this cross-complainant, and by the mistake and through the said cross-complainant relying upon the figures of cross-defendant John Balch, same were overlooked and mistakenly not considered in any tentative settlements so made."

In paragraph VII, cross-complainant alleged the payment of attorney fees on behalf of the partnership, the exact amount and nature of which he could not then ascertain or state.

"This cross-complainant further alleges that from time to time large amounts have been expended by this cross-complainant for tools and equipment, to wit: For concrete cement forms purchased and paid for and delivered to the said partnership, amounting to the sum of $2,902; large amounts of small tools and equipment and unused material paid for, owned and unaccounted for by the said partnership and now in the possession of the said John Balch, belonging to the said partnership, for which there has been paid from said partnership funds a sum of approximately $5,000; all of which said tools and equipment are now in the possession of the said Balch and for which sums so advanced by this cross-complainant and from the partnership assets, equipment and tools, the said John Balch has failed and refused to account to this cross-complainant. That in addition to the above items, the said cross-defendant John Balch has received from various sources for and on behalf of the said partnership, and now has in his hands large sums of money, and purchased for and on behalf of the said partnership from the said partnership funds large amounts of other equipment and tools and unused material, the exact amount, nature and extent of which it is impossible for this cross-complainant to say until a full and complete accounting is had between the said partners, and which this cross-complainant is informed and believes is of the amount and value of many thousands of dollars."

Paragraph IX declares that on the Carolina street contract and the Fountain avenue sewer contract, and other contracts of the partnership, amounting to $65,000 or more, and all of which have been completed, large sums of money had been collected and large profits made therefrom, for which Balch had failed and refused to account; that by reason of said transactions Balch was indebted to the partnership and that upon accounting it would be found that he was so indebted to the partnership and to cross-complainant in a large sum. (By reason of the court's finding that the partnership terminated on August 28, 1915, this paragraph IX need not be further considered.)

"Said cross-complainant further alleges that none of the said items herein mentioned have been paid nor credited by the said partnership to this cross-complainant in any tentative or temporary settlements had between this cross-complainant and the said John Balch, and the total sum of said items specifically mentioned are due and owing from the said partnership to this cross-complainant, together with all other sums that an accounting may show when same has been accurately taken of the assets and profits from the said partnership, amounting to, as this cross-complainant is informed and believes and so alleges, more than any indebtedness due or claimed to be due from the said partnership or this cross-complainant to the said John Balch."

As a second cause of action, cross-complainant, in addition to the allegations of his first cause of action, alleged that Balch was indebted to him on open book account for certain moneys paid out, at the instance and request of Balch (stating the several items), amounting to the total sum of $764.90. Cross-complainant alleged that no part of these items had been repaid and that the same were now due and owing from Balch to Stansbury.

In July, 1918, both of said actions, B-49418 and B-50368, were pending in the superior court. The two cases were consolidated and were tried and submitted for decision. Thereafter the parties entered into a stipulation (nled August 13, 1918) to set aside the submission and the order consolidating said causes, and providing that the plaintiff bank have judgment in its favor in said action B-49418. In case No. B-50368 it was further stipulated that a referee be appointed to take an accounting between Stansbury and Balch at the cost of Stansbury—

"as to the correctness of all purported settlements had between said John Balch and said Charles Stansbury up to and including the giving of the notes of December 16, 1916, and that said referee report to the court any additions, deductions, errors, omissions, miscalculations, corrections, or mistakes in said accounts or pretended settlements, with a finding showing the true conditions of the accounts between said Stansbury and said Balch growing out of their partnership relations in the contracting business, or with Radich, Balch & Stansbury, or otherwise, and the true amount due from one to the other, after deducting all proper offsets and credits to date, that said settlements and notes be corrected accordingly; said referee, so to be appointed, to be further authorized and directed to examine all books of account, check books, stubs, bank books, ledger sheets, and any and all other accounts kept by the said John Balch and the said Charles Stansbury; to subpoena witnesses or expert accountants, together with such other books and accounts, and to hold such other hearings as may be necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the true status of said partnership relation between said John Balch and said Charles Stansbury."

It was further stipulated that the pleadings might be so amended—

"as to permit the introduction of such further evidence as may be developed by said report of said referee from said accounting, and such other proceedings may be had according to the evidence heretofore taken and such further evidence offered by either party before the court and upon the pleadings as amended; that said case be continued until the report of the referee be made and filed and the further order of this court, notice thereof being hereby waived."

Pursuant to said stipulation, an order of reference was made appointing the referee named in the stipulation. The order provided that the referee so appointed—to the correctness of all settlements had between said parties up to and including the giving of the notes of December 16, 1916, and that said referee report to the court any and all additions, deductions, mistakes, miscalculations and errors which have occurred in the said settlements, or any of them, or in any accountings had between said parties, which have been or may to the satisfaction of said referee be shown from the testimony, books and papers heretofore offered in evidence in this cause and from any and all books, papers, checks, or accounts of the said Charles Stansbury and said John Balch, or such other evidence as may be properly laid before said referee. Said referee shall within thirty days make a report to the court showing as nearly as he may be able, the corrections that should be made in said alleged settlements and including therein a statement showing as nearly as said referee can determine the true condition of the account between said Stansbury and said Balch up to the giving of said notes."

The referee's report was not filed until the 24th day of September, 1919. The case came before the court for hearing upon the report of the referee and exceptions filed by the respective parties. Further testimony was given and the cause was submitted upon said testimony and the report of the referee and the evidence taken by the referee and the books and records of the parties, whereupon the court made its findings of fact and conclusions.

The court found that during the pendency of the action, all of the bank's claims against Balch for which it held the notes in suit as collateral security had been paid and that the plaintiff continues to hold said notes only for the purpose of collection and for the use and benefit of Balch.

The court found that the partnership existed under the agreement to which we have referred and found the fact of settlement made which resulted in the execution of said notes of December 16, 1916; also that in the settlement with reference to the Radich jobs and in the settlements between Balch and Stansbury, and particularly in the settlements made on November 27, 1912, August 28, 1915, and December 16, 1916, by reason of the fact that the books and accounts were not in such condition as to disclose an accurate statement of the partnership affairs, various mutual mistakes were made in favor of said Balch and to the prejudice of said Stansbury, which said mutual mistakes were discovered since said notes were given; that since the giving of said notes, the said Stansbury has also been entitled to credits. (Finding XIV.) Without defining what these mistakes were, and without using them as the basis of any deductions from the amounts of the notes, the court, by its referee and by evidence taken before the court, made an independent examination of the transactions and accounts of the partnership, and made its findings and judgments pursuant to that investigation.

In finding XVIII the court refers to the fact that the balance found by the referee in his report was the sum of $3,309.06 in favor of Balch,

"but the court finds that the same is subject to certain corrections for clerical errors, miscalculations and mistakes in the debits and credits thereof and in the allowances to the two partners, and upon further hearing before the court upon the report of the said referee, the court finds that said report should be modified by deducting from the balance found due to said Balch of $3,309.06, total credits due to said Stansbury amounting to $1,740.81, as hereinafter specified, leaving an indebtedness, which the court finds to be due and owing from the said Stansbury to the said Balch in full settlement of all partnership claims of the said Balch against the said Stansbury, amounting to $1,569.10, which, the court finds, is entitled to draw interest at seven per cent. per annum from the 16th day of December, 1916; that the report of the said referee after deducting the above credits is in all other respects confirmed and adopted as the finding of this court."

The modifications made in said referee's report are then stated in detail, covering eight items of the report.

In finding XIX the court determined that Stansbury should pay the costs of this action and the fee of the referee ($500) "and the large mixer is the property of Charles Stansbury, and the steel forms, rings, small mixer and other tools are the property of John Balch."

Judgment was entered accordingly, and it was therein provided that upon payment of the judgment the notes in suit be canceled, and that the interests and claims of Balch and Stansbury growing out of said partnership "be and they are declared to be hereby fully settled and determined." From the judgment so entered the plaintiff bank and the said John Balch have appealed.

[1] Primarily, appellant relies upon the proposition that the court erred in undertaking to restate the whole of the accounts between Balch and Stansbury de novo, there being no claim of fraud made against Balch, and no error alleged or shown tainting the whole accounts found to have been mutually settled, and also because of there being no complete statement made or possible. It is true that neither the defense nor the cross-complaint rests upon any claim of fraud. No facts are alleged by respondent tending to show any erroneous method or principle involved in the settlement as made whereby the entire accounting became unreliable or erroneous. Respondent rested his claims upon two contentions, the first of which is that the so-called settlements were only tentative and temporary, really not settlements at all, and the second is that respondent is entitled to sundry credits, which by mistake were omitted from the computations which resulted in the execution of the notes in suit. The court having determined that the partnership terminated on the date of the settlement of August 28, 1915, and that after some further payments had been made the notes were given unconditionally, the only further questions in the case related to the alleged mistakes in the settlements as made, and the amount by which the correction of those mistakes would reduce the indebtedness shown by the notes. In this state of the case appellants were entitled to rely upon the amount of the notes and upon the resulting inference that respondent's indebtedness should be measured by the sums stated in those notes; subject only to the right of respondent to prove, if he could, any errors which had crept into the settlements by reason of mistakes which had prevented any items from being taken into consideration when the agreements of settlement were made. The burden of proof rested upon respondent to establish the facts by reason of which he would be entitled to these deductions. In addition to the particular errors claimed as pointed out in the pleadings of respondent, it will be remembered that in the stipulation for a reference it was agreed in substance that if in the course of the investigation by the referee facts should develop making it necessary so to do, the pleadings might be so amended as to permit the introduction of further evidence concerning the alleged errors. In other words, it was contemplated by the pleadings of respondent and by the stipulation and order, that the inquiry should be conducted for the purpose and only for the purpose of correcting any mistakes, miscalculations and errors which had occurred in the said settlements and thereby had been carried into said notes.

[2] We cannot see that counsel for respondent would be benefited by the acceptance of his theory that these notes do not represent the result of an "account stated." For his right to insist upon a reopening of the question concerning the amount due on a promissory note cannot be more favorable than his right to inquire into the circumstances of an account stated. Therefore, we think that the rules concerning the surcharging or falsifying of such an account, as shown by the decisions presented to us by counsel for appellant, are applicable to this case. In the early case of Branger v. Chevalier, 9 Cal. 353, 361, it was held that accounts stated may be opened and the whole account taken de novo, for gross mistake, in some cases.

"But this can only be done when the gross error affects all the items of the transaction. In case the clear mistake only affects a portion of the items of the stated account, it will be permitted to stand, except in so far as it can be impugned by the party alleging the error. And when the party who seeks to go behind the stated account, goes into particulars, and specifies the items improperly charged or omitted, he is confined to those items, and the remainder of the account must stand."

In that case the court further says:

"In this case certain errors were specified in the complaint, and the plaintiff should have been confined to the items mentioned. The order of reference cannot go beyond the pleadings of the parties; and then the mistake should be clear and material before the court could allow the party even to surcharge and falsify. It is a very dangerous practice to go behind stated accounts, especially as between partners, who alone understand their complicated affairs, and the mode in which their books are kept. If all partnership books were well and carefully kept, upon the same system, then the practice of opening up accounts would not be so doubtful. 4 Cranch, 308; 4 Paige, 495."

In White v. Thompson, 40 Cal. App. 447, 449, 180 Pac. 953, 954 (First District, Division 1), the rules governing the correction of an account stated are summarized as follows:

"An account stated does not bar a recovery for items not within the contemplation of the parties when the settlement was made. (Clarke v. Kelsey, 41 Neb. 766, 60 N. W. 138; Lawler v. Jennings, 18 Utah, 35, 55 Pac. 60); nor for those omitted by mistake; nor for such as were left open for further consideration (Waldron v. Evans, 1 Dak. 11, 46 N. W. 607). Parties to an account stated, signed by them, are not concluded by the presumption that it was a final settlement of all valid debts, debits, and credits, as to matters which were not contemplated by them, or which were not included in the settlement, though they existed at the time. Treacy v. Powers, 112 Minn. 226, 127 N. W. 936. Where an account has been adjusted by the parties, if any mistake is subsequently discovered, the whole account need not be opened and readjusted, but the mistake may be corrected and the rights of the parties readjusted as to such mistake. Carpenter v. Kent, 101 N. Y. 591, 5 N. E. 787."

In Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 150 Pac. 994, the court made a statement covering what in law constitutes an account stated. It was there held that the writing constituting an account stated need not aver or at all contain the grounds and reasons for the conclusion and declaration expressed. It is a complete account stated, if it contains a signed and written acknowledgment of a present, unqualified indebtedness or liability, with a promise to pay a named sum. With reference to such an account, the court there said that, while it is open to a defendant to repel the legal effect of the account stated by pleading and proof of its procurement through fraud, duress, mistake, or other grounds cognizable in equity for the avoidance of an instrument, yet it is not open to a defendant to attempt to defeat the legal effect of such a contract by showing a lack of consideration in any other way.

"Thus, it is not open to a defendant in such a case merely to show that the account stated was based upon a disputed claim of the plaintiff's, which claim subsequently proved to be invalid. Nor would it be open to a defendant to show that the amount justly due was very much less than the amount named in the account stated."

It is not necessary to make a detailed statement of the various items of the accounting, as made by the referee and by the court, in order to exhibit their resulting effect in determining the amount of the judgment. It is sufficient to say that the judgment is solely the result of an accounting which purports to cover all of the transactions of the partnership and to arrive at a balance due as shown by the books and papers of the partnership and by testimony concerning the same, without giving to appellants the benefit of the fact that their right of action is based upon the notes held by them, and without any findings directed to the particulars in which errors occurred in the settlements made between the partners and based upon which settlements the notes in suit were executed.

[3] It was contended by counsel for respondent and was held by the court at the trial that by reason of the stipulation for a reference and the order of reference based thereon, the court was authorized "to enter into an accounting of this entire matter." And when counsel for appellant in discussing the referee's report stated the rule that a settlement made in good faith is presumed to be a good and fair settlement and that the presumption is in favor of that settlement, the court replied: "I think your stipulation wiped out the presumptions." We are of the opinion that the stipulation, made as it was in view of the pleadings of respondent and the affirmative claims made by respondent, is not subject to the construction thus put upon it by the court. If it had been intended to wipe out the notes entirely and to wholly disregard the settlements made, it would have been useless to provide in the stipulation, as it was provided, that the accounting should be taken as to the "correctness of all purported statements." Likewise it would have been unnecessary to further stipulate for amendments to the pleadings, as further facts affecting the subject-matter should be developed by the report of the referee. By reason of the erroneous theory thus adopted, and according to which the case was tried, notes received for a valuable consideration, and not in any way tainted with fraud, have been, by the judgment, reduced to less than half of their face value, without any finding of the facts whereby such reduction may be justified.

The judgment is reversed, and it is hereby directed that a new trial be had of the issues presented with relation to credits claimed by respondent by reason of errors or omissions in the settlement of said partnership affairs, whereby respondent claims the amount of said notes should be reduced. Thereupon, findings having been made covering said issues, a new judgment may be entered.

I concur: CURTIS, J.

HOUSER, J. I dissent. To my mind, the stipulation to which reference is herein made constitutes a complete waiver as to any rights arising out of the "account stated" and fully authorizes an entire accounting de novo.

KENNEDY v. SCALLY. (Civ. 2594.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 31, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1073(1)—Decree quieting title in owner of equitable interest as against holder of legal title held not prejudicial to latter.

In an action to quiet title against the owner of the legal title, from whom plaintiff claimed the land as a gift, where plaintiff's pleadings set up the facts on which his claim was based and prayed for general relief, the court, complying with defendant's prayer that all adverse claims be determined, adjudged that the gift was valid and complete, and the objection that an action to quiet title was not the proper remedy for the owner of an equitable interest against the owner of the legal title was raised for the first time in defendant's reply brief on appeal, defendant was not prejudiced by further provisions of the decree quieting the title so adjudged, though a more appropriate judgment would have been one declaring that defendant held the legal title in trust for plaintiff and requiring her to convey it to him.

2. Gifts ⇨49(4)—Gift of land held established.

In an action to quiet title, evidence held sufficient to establish a gift of the land by defendant to plaintiff and his deceased wife.

3. Frauds, statute of ⇨158(4) — Evidence held to show possession and expenditure for improvements by donee of land, taking gift out of statute.

Evidence held to show possession and expenditures for improvements by donee of land in time and amount to take the transaction out of the statute of frauds.

4. Gifts ⇨49(4)—Evidence of parol gift of land should be clear and convincing.

The evidence to establish a parol gift of land should be clear and convincing.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Finding as to parol gift not disturbed.

Court's finding as to parol gift of land will not be disturbed, unless clearly unwarranted by the evidence.

6. Frauds, statute of ⇨129(9)—Parol gift of land in present relieved from operation of statute by donee's entry and making of improvements.

Where a parol gift of realty is made in present, donee has entered and made permanent and valuable improvements, and circumstances render it unjust to deprive him thereof because of imperfections in the gift, equity will treat donor's and donee's acts as such performance of the gift as will relieve the contract from the operation of the statute, and will lend its assistance to the perfection of donee's title.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Overruling objection to question calling for conclusion not prejudicial error, where witness testified fully as to facts.

In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff testified fully as to the facts on which his claim of interest was based, the court's action in overruling objection to question asked plaintiff as to whether he ever acquired an interest in the premises did not prejudice defendant's rights, though the question called for a conclusion.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1047(3)—Error in failing to strike out testimony held cured by witness' subsequent testimony.

In an action to quiet title to land given plaintiff by defendant, error in failing to strike out a witness' testimony that he could not make the improvements made by plaintiff for $100 an acre was cured by the witness' later testimony that the reasonable cost of making the improvements was $100 an acre.

9. Gifts ⇨48—Testimony that donee would not have made improvements if he had not believed property belonged to him held admissible.

In an action to quiet title to land given plaintiff by defendant, testimony that he would not have made improvements thereon if he had not believed that the property belonged to him as a gift was admissible, as tending to show that the improvements were made in reliance on such gift.

10. Gifts ⇨48—Evidence of value of donor's other property held admissible.

Evidence that defendant, at the time of the alleged gift of a ranch to her daughter and son-in-law, owned other property worth more than $150,000 was properly admitted as tending to rebut any inference that the gift was unnatural, or deprived defendant of her means of support.

11. Gifts ⇨48—Evidence that donor afterwards gave other property to other children held admissible.

In an action against plaintiff's deceased wife's mother to quiet title to land alleged to have been given by her to plaintiff and his wife, evidence that defendant afterwards gave valuable property to other children without giving any to plaintiff's wife held admissible as consistent with and tending to support plaintiff's claim of a prior gift to him and his wife.

12. Gifts ⇨48—Who paid taxes and assessments held immaterial, in donor's action to quiet title.

Whether defendant, in an action to quiet title, paid part of the taxes and water assessments on the land after her alleged gift thereof to plaintiff and his wife, who took possession and made permanent improvements in reliance on such gift, held immaterial; plaintiff's cause of action not being dependent thereon, and defendant having made no claim for reimbursement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by J. H. Kennedy, individually and as administrator of the estate of Margaret S. Kennedy, deceased, against Mary A. Scally. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, and John G. Covert, of Hanford, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and C. A. Tuttle, all of Fresno, and H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. In addition to the usual allegations in a complaint to quiet title, the plaintiff alleged that defendant gave him and his wife, Margaret S. Kennedy, a daughter of defendant, the land in controversy, consisting of 160 acres, and that they took possession thereof under the gift and expended in making permanent improvements thereon the sum of $4,000 during the year 1912, $3,000 during 1913, and made valuable improvements in the years 1914 and 1915. The prayer is for a judgment decreeing "that plaintiff is the owner in fee simple absolute, possessed and entitled to the possession of the undivided three-fourths of the real property above described; that the gift of the said quarter section of land described in said complaint by the said defendant Mary A. Scally to plaintiff and to his wife, Margaret S. Kennedy, is good and valid and a complete, executed gift, and that the defendant (plaintiff?) is entitled to the decree of this court quieting his title to said undivided three-fourths of said quarter section of land"; that defendant has no estate, right, title, or interest therein; that she be enjoined from asserting any claim thereto; and "that plaintiff have such other and further relief as to the court shall seem meet and proper in the premises."

The defendant answered, denying the foregoing allegations of the complaint, and alleging that she permitted plaintiff's wife to occupy the land as the tenant of defendant, without charge or rental, and to "retain the rents, issues, profits, and products of said land"; that any improvements made by plaintiff and his wife upon the land were made solely for their own convenience in their occupation and use thereof; and that the reasonable rental value of the land was far in excess of the value of such improvements. The defendant also filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff in his individual capacity and as administrator of the estate of Margaret S. Kennedy, deceased, in the usual form of an action to quiet title. In her cross-complaint the defendant prayed that "said plaintiff and said cross-defendants be required to set forth the nature of his or their claims and that all adverse claims of plaintiff or cross-defendants may be determined by a decree of this court" and that defendant's title be quieted and for general relief.

Evidence bearing upon the issues raised by the pleadings was presented by both parties without any objection as to the form or nature of the action. The court found that Margaret S. Kennedy died intestate on the 17th day of February, 1920, leaving surviving her the plaintiff and the defendant as her only heirs; that the defendant gave the land to plaintiff and his wife on or about August 15, 1912, and then and there placed them in possession of the same as the owners thereof; that during the year 1912 the plaintiff expended the sum of $4,000 in making permanent improvements thereon; that the plaintiff and his wife expended additional sums in making improvements as follows: $3,000 in 1913, $500 in 1914, and $50 in 1915; that ever since the gift was made they "held possession of said land, improved the same, harvested the crops raised thereon, leased the property, collected the rent, and managed and controlled the said land as owners thereof," and claimed and "asserted that they owned the same as a gift" from defendant; that such permanent improvements have enhanced the value of the land "far above its rental value"; that the value of such improvements is "largely in excess of the value of the use and occupation of said land at the time of the making of the gift; that the increased rental value of said land in the year 1915, and subsequent years, was due to the enhanced value by reason of the improvements placed thereon by plaintiff and his wife"; that they resided on the land from November 15, 1913, to January 1, 1916; that since January 1, 1916, the land has been occupied by tenants under leases executed by defendant, but that the plaintiff conducted all the negotiations for the leasing of the premises and arranged the terms thereof; that defendant signed such leases merely because she held the record title to the land; that the rental thereof was paid direct to plaintiff and his wife; that the defendant did not at any time give any directions to the tenants under such leases, or make any demands upon them, or in any manner treat them as her tenants.

By the judgment it is decreed that plaintiff "is the owner in fee simple absolute, possessed and entitled to the possession of the undivided three-fourths of the real property described in the complaint"; that "the gift of said quarter section of land * * * by the said defendant and cross-complainant Mary A. Scally to plaintiff and cross-defendant J. H. Kennedy and to his wife, Margaret S. Kennedy, is good and valid and a complete executed gift; and it is decreed that the title of the plaintiff and cross-defendant J. H. Kennedy, so acquired, be and the same hereby is quieted and vested in such plaintiff and cross-defendant J. H. Kennedy, to said undivided three-fourths of said quarter section of land"; that defendant "has no estate, right, title, or interest whatever in or to said undivided three-fourths of said quarter section of land"; and that she be enjoined from asserting any claim thereto.

"The reason for the rule announced in Chase v. Cameron is that, if the owner of equities could sue to quiet title, he might obtain a judgment based upon his adversary's fraud, without setting up, in his pleadings, the facts constituting such fraud. This would be manifestly unfair."

In the instant case the complaint and the answer to the cross-complaint set up the facts upon which plaintiff's claim of title is based. The plaintiff and the cross-defendants prayed for general relief. Under the pleadings and on the findings they were entitled to a decree determining their interest in the land. It may be conceded that a more appropriate judgment would have been one declaring that the defendant held the legal title in trust for plaintiff and cross-defendants and requiring her to convey the same to them. The objection now made to the judgment was raised for the first time in appellant's reply brief. Had it been made at the trial, it is probable that the more appropriate judgment would have been rendered. Further, the defendant prayed that "all adverse claims of plaintiff or cross-defendants may be determined by a decree of this court." In compliance with such prayer the decree adjudges "that the gift of said quarter section of land * * * is good and valid and a complete executed gift." If the judgment had gone no further, it would have established plaintiff and cross-defendants' ownership of the land. Defendant's rights are not prejudiced by the further provisions of the decree quieting the title so adjudged.

[2] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to establish the alleged gift. Plaintiff testified that about February, 1912, when himself and wife and defendant and her son were together, Mrs. Kennedy said to plaintiff, "Mama has come over and turned over one of her ranches to us to farm;" that defendant's son asked if that was the proposition made, and the defendant said, "No, I gave them the ranch to do what they pleased with;" that—

"she told me she would like to have me come over right away; she would turn things over to me. * * * Two or three days later I went to Lemoore. * * * I think my wife went with me and Mrs. Scally to the ranch. * * * Mrs. Scally took me to the men; I think there were two; * * * and she told them from now on to look to me for their pay; that she had turned the ranch over to us, and she was through with it. * * * She says: 'I will give you the ranch, and if you want the horses you can buy them, or use them for a while and afterwards I will sell them.'"

J. K. Kennedy, plaintiff's father, testified that on two occasions defendant said she had given the place to plaintiff and his wife. C. K. Kennedy, plaintiff's brother, and Walter McNamara, testified that defendant had made similar statements. Defendant denied having given the land to plaintiff or his wife, or having made the statements related by plaintiff and his witnesses. There is ample evidence to have sustained a finding that no gift was made, but there is also sufficient evidence to support the finding of the court that the defendant gave the property to plaintiff and his wife, and appellant's argument in this connection is addressed to the weight of the evidence rather than its sufficiency.

[3] The evidence fully supports the findings of the court as to expenditures made by plaintiff and his wife for permanent improvements. It shows clearly that the alleged gift was made, if at all, not later than February, 1912, and that immediate possession was taken. The complaint alleges and the court finds that the gift was made and possession given about August 15, 1912. This discrepancy is important only as bearing upon the amount expended in reliance upon the gift. The court finds that $4,000 was so expended in 1912, without specifying in what part of the year the expenditures were made. It may reasonably be inferred from the evidence that a considerable part of such expenditures were made prior to August 15th of that year. However, if the $4,000 expended in 1912 be eliminated entirely, the findings as to expenditures in subsequent years sufficiently support the judgment. The sum of $3,000 was expended in 1913. Testimony as to the rental value of the premises at the time the gift was made ranged from $160 to $800 a year. The expenditures made in 1913 alone, therefore, were nearly 4 times the highest estimate of the rental value and more than 18 times the lowest estimate. After January 1, 1916, the premises were leased for a cash rental of $2,000 a year. This higher rental was due to the fact that plaintiff had leveled and checked the land and planted it to alfalfa.

Appellant attempts to show that the rental value of the premises exceeds the alleged expenditures for improvements by adding plaintiff's gross receipts, including the receipts from a dairy conducted by plaintiff, prior to January 1, 1916, to the rentals received thereafter. The total amount so received undoubtedly exceeds such expenditures. The argument, however, is manifestly unsound. It is perfectly clear that the expenditures made up to January 1, 1914, greatly exceed the rental value of the premises from February, 1912, to January, 1914. Plaintiff's possession and expenditures made up to that time relieved the parol gift from the operation of the statute of frauds, and the rights of the parties then became fixed. No subsequent receipts from the property or increased rental value thereof could affect those rights. Howard v. Stephens, 38 Cal. App. 296, 314, 176 Pac. 65. The increased rental value of the premises was due largely to the improvements made by plaintiff and his wife. "The fact that the permanent and valuable improvements spoken of have given to the property a rental value it did not theretofore have is a false quantity. Otherwise, the very thing equity requires to be done would defeat its object." Howard v. Stephens, supra, 38 Cal. App. 314, 176 Pac. 71.

[4, 5] The evidence to establish a parol gift of land should be clear and convincing. "Whether the evidence in a given case is clear and convincing is a question, in the first instance to be determined by the trial court, and its conclusion is not to be disturbed, unless the reviewing court can say, after an examination of the entire record and all the circumstances surrounding the transaction as there disclosed, that such conclusion is clearly unwarranted by the evidence." Howard v. Stephens, supra, 38 Cal. App. 311, 176 Pac. 70; Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 688, 96 Pac. 357; Beckman v. Waters, 161 Cal. 581, 584, 119 Pac. 922.

[6] "The cases are numerous, and the rule may be considered well settled, that where a parol gift of real estate is made in præsenti, and the donee has entered under the gift, and has made permanent and valuable improvements upon the realty, and the circumstances are such that it would be unjust to the donee if he were thereafter to be deprived of the property by reason of imperfections in the gift, equity will treat the acts of the donor, together with the acts of the donee, as being such performance of the gift as will relieve the contract from the operation of the statute of frauds, and it will under such circumstances lend its assistance to the perfection of the donee's title." Burris v. Landers, 114 Cal. 310, 313, 46 Pac. 162, 163; Husheon v. Kelley, 162 Cal. 656, 124 Pac. 231; Howard v. Stephens, supra; Kinsell v. Thomas, 18 Cal. App. 683, 124 Pac. 220.

[7] Plaintiff was asked: "Did you ever acquire an interest in those premises?" Defendant objected on the ground, among others not urged on appeal, that the question called for the conclusion of the witness. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered in the affirmative. The witness testified fully as to the facts upon which his claim of interest was based, and hence the ruling could not have prejudiced defendant's rights.

[8] A witness was asked by counsel for plaintiff as to the cost of the improvements made by plaintiff. He answered: "I couldn't do it for $100 an acre." Defendant's counsel moved to strike out the answer, but the court failed to rule on the motion. While the answer should have been stricken out, the witness later testified that the reasonable cost of making the improvements was $100 an acre. This cured the error in failing to strike out the former answer.

[9] Plaintiff was permitted to testify that he would not have made such improvements if he had not believed that the property belonged to him as a gift from the defendant. The evidence was admissible as tending to show that the improvements were made in reliance upon the gift.

[10] Evidence was properly admitted to show that at the time of the alleged gift the defendant owned other property of the value of more than $150,000. She purchased the property in suit for $65 an acre in the year 1909. Evidence of the total value of her property tended to rebut any inference that the gift was unnatural or had the effect of depriving her of her means of support.

[11] Evidence was admitted over defendant's objection to the effect that in the year 1919 the defendant gave valuable properties to another daughter and to the son of defendant respectively. The fact that she gave property to two of her three children in that year, without then giving anything to the third, the plaintiff's wife, while perhaps of little weight, is consistent with and tends to support plaintiff's claim of a prior gift to him and his wife of the property in controversy.

[12] The court found that plaintiff's wife paid part of the taxes upon the land after the time of the gift and the defendant a part thereof. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding. The question of payment of taxes is not a material issue in the case. Plaintiff's cause of action is not dependent thereon, and defendant made no claim for reimbursement for taxes paid. The same is true as to water assessments paid by defendant.

Other points relied on are similar to those discussed, and what has been said sufficiently disposes of them.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

DUKE v. THORNBURY. (Civ. 4564.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 14, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1040(10)—Error in overruling demurrer not ground for reversal after trial on merits.

Error in overruling demurrer to complaint was not ground for reversal after a trial on the merits after the defendant by her answer had put in issue all matters going to the substantial rights of the parties.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1071(6)—Finding held sufficient on issue of whether plaintiff had received payments on note held as collateral.

In an action on a note, defended on the ground of payment, court's failure to find on issue of whether the plaintiff had received any payments upon the collateral held by him held not ground for reversal, in view of finding that no part of the note sued on had been paid except a specified amount.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Oscar Duke against Alpha E. Thornbury. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wal J. Tuska, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. E. Gearhart, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against her upon a promissory note executed and delivered by her to the plaintiff. The appeal is presented to us upon the judgment roll alone, and it is contended that the general and special demurrer of the defendant to the complaint should have been sustained, and that the judgment must be reversed because of the failure of the trial court to find upon certain issues presented by the pleadings. The plaintiff set out in full in the complaint the note sued upon, and also alleged that he had received from the defendant as collateral security for the payment of said note a certain promissory note of John L. Stickel, which note was also set out in full in the complaint.

[1] It must be conceded to the appellant that the allegations in the complaint as to the nonpayment of the note upon which recovery was sought were ambiguous and insufficient, and that the special demurrer attacking them upon these grounds should have been sustained. However, after the court had overruled the demurrer, defendant answered, admitting the execution of the note sued upon and denying that defendant had failed to pay the same. This, of course, would cure any defective allegations in the complaint upon these matters. The error or the trial court in overruling the demurrer would not warrant a reversal of this judgment after a trial upon the merits and after the defendant had put in issue by her answer all matters going to the substantial rights of the parties. In the case of Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 532, 536, 38 Pac. 410, 411, it was said:

"Aside from these reasons, if we concede the complaint defective in this regard by reason of uncertainty, yet that uncertainty is not such as demands a retrial of a case which has gone to judgment upon the facts. It is not in all cases where error has been committed by trial courts in overruling demurrers to complaints upon the grounds of ambiguity or uncertainty that this court will order a reversal of a judgment based upon a trial of the issues made by the complaint and answer. The same rule applies to errors of this character as is invoked as to all other errors of the court. It must not be mere abstract error, but it must be prejudicial and injurious error in order to avail appellant, for otherwise he has no cause of complaint. It is apparent to the court from this record that no harm resulted to appellant by reason of the order of the court overruling the demurrer. The denials of the answer are full and complete. * * *

See, also, Trask v. Garza, 51 Cal. App. 739, 197 Pac. 807; Ferry v. O'Brien (Cal.) 206 Pac. 449; Ransch v. Arp, 39 Cal. App. 580, 179 Pac. 694; Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 174 Pac. 903, 906; Sledge v. Stolz, 41 Cal. App. 209, 182 Pac. 340; Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 183 Pac. 379. In the case of National Bank v. Exchange Nat. Bank, 186 Cal. 172, 180, 199 Pac. 1, 5, the court said:

"In view of the answer and the trial upon the merits it is unnecessary to consider the special demurrer. The rights of the parties were fully litigated under the pleadings. The evidence * * * of the nonpayment of the plaintiff's claim was fully presented to the court, so that a technical error, if any, in the statement of the causes of action in the complaint would not justify the reversal of the case."

[2] The next objection of appellant is that the trial court erred in failing to find whether or not the plaintiff had received any payments upon the note of Stickel held by plaintiff as collateral security. The findings recite that no evidence was offered by the defendant at the trial and it is found:

"That no part of said promissory note, principal or interest, has been paid, except $492.50 on account of interest."

Defendant was given credit for this amount and judgment rendered against her for the balance due. The question of whether or not the plaintiff had received any payments upon the collateral held by him was an issue made by the pleadings, the answer alleging, upon information and belief, that plaintiff had received from Stickel certain payments upon his obligation, the exact amount of which was alleged to be unknown to the defendant. This was an issue at the trial. The evidence is not before us, but, if it had shown that plaintiff had received any payments upon the note held as collateral, such payments would have been applicable upon the obligation of the defendant, and would have reduced the amount owing upon her note by the amount of the payments received upon the collateral. Therefore a finding that only $492.50 has been paid upon the obligation of defendant, and that there is due and owing to plaintiff thereon the sum of $2,623.08, principal and interest, is also an implied finding that no amount greater than $492.50, applicable upon defendant's note, was ever received by the plaintiff from any source whatsoever. While it would have been desirable to have an express finding regarding the receipt of payments upon the collateral, a claim that its absence would constitute prejudicial error under the facts just recited need not be seriously discussed.

The judgment is affirmed.

PINQUE v. J. B. HILL CO. (Civ. 4385.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 8, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 994(3)—Trial court's conclusions as to weight of testimony not disturbed.

The weight to be accorded the testimony of a witness was a matter for the trial court, and its conclusions will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Pleading $\S$ 236(5)—Denial of defendant's motion for leave to amend answer to conform to evidence not abuse of discretion where matter was admissible without amendment.

The denial of defendant's motion to amend answer so as to make it conform to the evidence held not an abuse of discretion where the matter sought to be alleged, if material, could have been presented to the trial court without amendment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Pinque against the J. B. Hill Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Drew and Harris & Hayhurst, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing & Wild, J. R. Fitch, and D. F. Conway, all of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for the recovery of damages sustained by reason of the taking of certain personal property under a writ of execution on a judgment which was subsequently reversed on appeal. Plaintiff herein, who was the defendant and judgment debtor in the former action, was a tenant of the defendant herein. The former action lay in two counts, one alleging a cause of action in ejectment in the ordinary form and the other alleging that the plaintiff therein had elected to terminate the lease upon the ground that the lessee had forfeited her rights under the terms of the lease. Judgment in that action went for the plaintiff but was reversed on appeal to the Supreme Court. J. B. Hill Co. v. Pinque, 179 Cal. 759, 178 Pac. 952, 3 A. L. R. 669. The judgment in the superior court had however, allowed the J. B. Hill Co. $509 by way of damages for injury to the building and the further sum of $300 as the value of the use and occupation of the premises. Execution was had upon that judgment pending the appeal, and the personal property, consisting of machinery, tools, and appliances used by the lessee for the purpose of conducting an automobile garage, was sold, and the defendant herein was placed in possession of the premises. Upon the return of the remittitur from the Supreme Court the J. B. Hill Company filed an amended complaint setting up three distinct causes of action, the first in ejectment, the second for damages for waste committed on the premises by the lessee, and the third for the cancellation of the lease upon the ground that the terms thereof had been changed contrary to section 1700 of the Civil Code. The trial judge sustained the demurrer to the first and third causes of action and the case went to trial upon the second. Judgment was thereafter rendered in favor of the lessee, from which and the order sustaining the demurrer to the first and third causes of action the Hill Company appealed. The judgment in so far as it related to the first and second causes of action was sustained, but was reversed upon the ground that the trial court was in error in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the third cause of action. Hill v. Pinque (Cal. App.) 204 Pac. 241. The remittitur in said action was filed in the superior court on March 24, 1922. The lessee commenced this action by the filing of the complaint in the same court on October 24, 1919. Judgment was entered in favor of the lessee, the plaintiff herein, on June 5, 1922, for the sum of $1,232.71. The appeal is from the judgment.

Two grounds are urged by the appellant: First, that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment; and, second, that the court erred in denying the appellant's motion to amend its answer to conform to the proof. On the first point it is said that all the testimony given for the purpose of establishing the value of the property taken came from the witness Weyant, who was the former business manager of the respondent and who acted throughout the proceedings and signed the complaint as her attorney in fact, she having abandoned the place and left for France some time prior to the commencement of this action. It is also said that the testimony of this witness is uncertain and unsatisfactory; that he demonstrated a lack of knowledge of the values of the property, which had been purchased secondhand, and which, in some instances at least, had been obtained by the respondent without payment of the purchase price therefor.

[1] We may agree with all that appellant says regarding the weakness of the testimony of this witness, but that was a matter which the trial court was required to judge, and its conclusions thereon cannot be disturbed upon this appeal.

[2] Upon the second point it is said that the appellant moved to amend its answer to conform to the evidence, and particularly to allege that the property was not the property of the respondent as she had not paid for it, but had merely acquired it as bankruptcy stock, and that, secondly, she was not damaged by the taking of the property by the judgment creditor. The motion to amend the answer does not appear in the record, and it is impossible for us to determine the grounds upon which it was made or the time when notice thereof was given. The respondent states in her brief that the motion was made after the findings of fact were made and after the judgment was rendered and filed. But, in any event, we are unable to see how the appellant suffered any prejudice by the order of the trial court refusing its application for leave to amend its answer. The evidence was all before the court, and if the failure to pay for the property in suit was material, it was a matter which the appellant could have presented to the trial court without amending its answer. We cannot, therefore, say that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the appellant's application for leave to amend. Green v. Burr, 131 Cal. 236, 239, 63 Pac. 360.

CONTRACTORS' & BUILDERS' SUPPLY CO.
v. KLAY et al. (Civ. 2344.)(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1923.)Mechanics' liens §290(5)—Judgment in mechanic's lien foreclosure based on obscure findings cannot stand.

In a mechanic's lien foreclosure case, judgment for the materialman on obscure finding as to payment by him to one defendant of the sum for which judgment was given must be reversed in view of finding that plaintiff had been paid for the material furnished for the construction of the building.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkert, Judge.

Suit by the Contractors' & Builders' Supply Company against A. B. Klay and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against A. B. Klay, defendant Klay appeals. Reversed.

Griffin, Boone & Boone, of Modesto, for appellant.

J. B. Jennings, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is based on the Mechanics' Lien Law, and is for the foreclosure of a lien upon a quarter section of land belonging to the defendants above named other than the defendant Klay, and situated in Stanislaus county, said lien arising by reason of the furnishing by plaintiff of certain materials to be used and which were used in the construction of a dwelling house on said real property. The judgment denied to the plaintiff the claim of lien against said property, and acquitted the defendants, other than defendant Klay, of any liability upon the claim for which the lien was sought to be asserted, but awarded the plaintiff judgment against the defendant Klay in the sum of $328. This appeal, supported by the judgment roll alone, is by the defendant Klay from so much of said judgment as awards, as against him in favor of the plaintiff, the said sum of $328.

The defendant Klay, a contractor, entered into a contract with the owners of the said real property for the construction of a 1½-story dwelling house on said land. The complaint states that, under an agreement with Klay, it furnished materials, consisting of lumber and mill work, to be used and which were actually used in the construction of said building, of the total value of $1,580.40, the same to be paid for in cash as they were delivered; that of said amount the sum of $1,144.50 was paid, and that there remained due and unpaid of said amount at the time said dwelling house was completed, on the 1st day of March, 1920, the sum of $433.90; that on March 17, 1920, the plaintiff filed and recorded, in due and legal form, a claim of lien upon said dwelling house and land in said sum of $433.90.

The answer specifically denies all the allegations of the complaint, and sets up a special defense to the effect that the defendants had fully discharged and satisfied the claim sued for, and, in fact, had paid the plaintiff more than was its due on the claim upon which it declares.

The court found that the materials were furnished by plaintiff as stated in the complaint; that all of said materials were actually used in the construction of the building likewise mentioned, and that they were of the value of $1,578.40; that plaintiff duly and in proper form filed its claim of lien on the said building and the real property upon which it was erected in the sum of $433.90, alleged to be the balance due for said materials at the time of the completion of said building, but found that the claim so filed involved an overcharge of $105.90, and that the true balance claimed by plaintiff is and was the sum of $328.

These findings were succeeded by the following: That on the 15th day of January, 1920, the defendant M. J. Kline paid to said Klay the sum of $1,000 on the contract price for the construction of said building; that said plaintiff received as payment from the said defendant Klay the sum of $750 of said $1,000 paid as aforesaid; that on the 19th day of January, 1920, said Klay paid to the plaintiff the sum of $750, with the express understanding and agreement between him and the plaintiff, and upon the express direction of Klay to that effect, that said sum of $750 so paid to plaintiff should be applied to and become a payment on account of the materials furnished Klay by plaintiff as alleged in the complaint; that the plaintiff "failed and neglected to apply said $750 on said indebtedness for said materials, but applied a portion thereof to an indebtedness owed by said defendant Klay on an entirely different job for others than the defendants, or any of them, and other than that set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and not connected in any way with the materials furnished for the work of the construction of the building set forth in plaintiff's complaint"; that the plaintiff had knowledge and notice at the time of the payment of said sum of $750 by the said Klay that said sum was received by said Klay from the defendant M. J. Kline as a payment on the contract price of said building mentioned in plaintiff's complaint; that said sum of $750 so paid by said Klay to plaintiff "more than satisfied the balance due to the plaintiff for materials furnished for the construction of the building, as set forth in plaintiff's complaint on file; that the claim or demand sued on in said complaint has been fully paid, discharged, and settled by the said defendants, and that the said defendants have paid to the said plaintiff more money than the said plaintiff had coming or was entitled to on said claim sued on in said complaint"; that only a portion of the said sum of $750 paid by said Klay to the plaintiff was applied and credited on the account for materials used in the construction of the building mentioned in plaintiff's complaint.

The court then made the following finding:

"That the plaintiff has paid to and for the use of the defendant A. B. Klay, and credited on the general account of the said defendant A. B. Klay with the said plaintiff, the sum of $328, and that the same, or any part of said $328 so credited on the general account of the plaintiff, has not been paid on said general account, but the said sum of $328 is a payment on materials furnished in the construction of the building set forth in plaintiff's complaint."

No brief has been filed herein for and on behalf of the respondent. This omission has been a source of regret to this court, because of the perplexity which it must be confessed has confronted us in attempting an interpretation of the findings and the meaning of the judgment from which the appeal is taken. The assistance of counsel who presumably prepared the findings might have been of much help to us in this particular. This remark is due to the fact, which must become obvious upon reading them, that the findings are not free from the imputation of ambiguity. Indeed, the finding last above quoted herein is unintelligible. So far as information upon the subject is to be obtained from the finding itself, we have been unable to determine whence the $328 came, whither it went, to whom it belongs, or, in fact, what it has to do with this case. It will be observed that in the first part of said finding it is said that the plaintiff paid that sum for the use of defendant Klay, and credited rather than debited it on the general account of the said defendant. This is followed by the statement that said $328, "so credited on the general account of the plaintiff" has not been paid on said general account. It then states that the said sum of $328 "is a payment on materials furnished in the construction of the building set forth in plaintiff's complaint." Whether the payment of said sum on account of the materials furnished for the building mentioned in the complaint was by the plaintiff or the defendants, said finding is palpably obscure, and cannot be made clear as to that proposition, even when considering it in comparison with other portions thereof. This being the only $328 referred to in the findings, we assume that it is that sum for which the court awarded judgment for the plaintiff and against said Klay. But, as has been pointed out, the finding is so confusing by reason of its palpable inconsistencies that it can afford no safe foundation for a judgment against anybody in this case, even if it could in any event support a proper judgment herein. If the $328 relates to another and entirely different account between the plaintiff and the defendant Klay, then the judgment cannot stand, since, clearly, it is not within the issues made by the pleadings. If, on the other hand, it was the intention to declare by said finding that there was still $328 due the plaintiff for the materials furnished for the building in question, then the finding is inconsistent with the finding that the entire sum which was coming to the plaintiff for the materials furnished for use in the construction of said building had been fully paid, discharged, and satisfied. Again, if said finding, when viewed in connection with the finding that only a portion of the said sum of $750 was credited on the account upon which this action was based, is to be interpreted to mean that the plaintiff paid a portion of the said $750 on some other account between it and Klay, and that by reason thereof there remained an unpaid balance on the account sued on, then the plaintiff misappropriated so much of said sum as it credited on such "other account." Section 1479, subd. 1, Civ. Code. Under the terms of said section the plaintiff, having been directed by Klay at the time he paid the $750 out of the $1,000 obtained from the other defendants to apply said amount to the account upon which it has herein sued, was without authority to apply said $750 or any portion thereof on any other account than that created by the furnishing by plaintiff to Klay of the materials which were to be used, and which were used, in the construction of the building mentioned in the complaint, unless the said sum of $750 was in excess of the actual balance due on the account for the materials mentioned in the complaint, in which case, probably, the plaintiff would have been at liberty to apply the excess toward the satisfaction of any other account which it might have had against said Klay. If, though, such was really the situation, the court, as above stated, was without authority to enter a judgment for the plaintiff for the excess amount so applied.

But, whatever might have been in the mind of the court when making the finding above considered, it is clear that the court did find that the $750 paid to the plaintiff out of the said sum of $1,000 paid to Klay by the other defendants "more than satisfied the balance due to the plaintiff for materials furnished for the construction of the building as set forth in plaintiff's complaint," and that "the claim or demand sued on in said complaint has been fully paid, discharged, and settled by said defendants," etc. Upon this finding the court had left to it but one course to pursue, to wit, to render and cause to be entered a judgment in favor of all the defendants as against the plaintiff upon the claim sued for herein.

From every viewpoint from which the findings may be considered, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

MESSERSMITH v. SMITH. (Civ. 4559.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, June 7, 1923. Rehearing Denied July 3, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1923.)

1. Tenancy in common ⇨55(3)—Failure to make other tenants parties plaintiff held not to defeat right of action.

A right of action to quiet title was not defeated because it developed at the trial for the first time that plaintiff's interest in the premises was only that of a tenant in common with others who were not parties to the action, since a tenant in common was entitled to sue either jointly or severally for the protection of her interest, under Code Civ. Proc. § 384, and therefore it was not error to refuse to stop the proceeding in order to make the other tenants in common parties.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

2. Witnesses ⇨205—Escrow instructions given to grantor's attorney are not privileged communications.

Where a grantor delivered a deed drawn for her by her attorney to the attorney in escrow, her oral escrow instructions to him were not privileged communications in the course of professional employment, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2, so that he can be required to reveal such instructions to the grantee without the consent of the grantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Rowena Messersmith, as administratrix of the estate of Elizabeth Hans, deceased, against Lucas F. Smith, Jr., executor of the last will and testament and of the estate of Elizabeth Schwan, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lucas F. Smith and Stanford G. Smith, both of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

Rea, Cassin & Caldwell, of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action to quiet title commenced by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Elizabeth Hans, deceased, against the defendant, as executor of the estate of Elizabeth Schwan, deceased. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant appeals under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

For a long time prior to and on November 10, 1911, Elizabeth Schwan was the owner of the tract of land described in the complaint. On that day she made a deed of this property conveying an undivided two-fifths thereof to Elizabeth Hans, an undivided two-fifths to Conrad Scholl, and the remaining one-fifth to Elias Trust. Deceased's deed was executed under the direction and advice of her attorney, who testified at the trial that the grantor delivered the deed to him in escrow with instructions that he deliver it to the grantees upon her death. Subsequent to its delivery the grantor procured the deed from her attorney on more than one occasion and exhibited it to some of her friends. On one of these occasions she returned to the office of her attorney and told him that the deed had been destroyed. It was never seen thereafter, but, over the objection of appellant, what purported to be a typewritten carbon copy of the original deed was produced by the attorney who drew it and was received in evidence. Some time after the destruction of the deed the grantor therein made and executed her will disposing of this same property. The defendant is the executor under this will.

The appeal is based upon the grounds: (1) That Scholl and Trust should have been made parties to the action; (2) that the testimony of the grantor's attorney was inadmissible; and (3) that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings of fact.

[1] 1. It appears that the interests of Scholl and Trust were not disclosed until the trial of the case. No allegations appear in the complaint relating to the fact that these parties asserted any claim against the interests of the parties who were named in the action. Thus no demurrer was filed raising the point of nonjoinder of parties. It seems to be conceded that under the deed Scholl and Trust were both tenants in common with the administrator of the estate of Elizabeth Hans, a fact which appeared for the first time when the deed was offered in evidence. Such being the case, it was not necessary to stop the proceedings in order to make either Scholl or Trust a party to the action. As tenant in common the administrator was entirely to sue either jointly or severally for the protection of her interest. Section 384, Code Civ. Proc.

2. Upon the question of the admissibility of the testimony of the grantor's attorney, appellant cites subdivision 2 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

"An attorney cannot, without the consent of his client, be examined as to any communication made by the client to him."

Under the provisions of the Code section appellant's position is unanswerable. The Legislature prohibited the admission of testimony based upon confidential information gained by an attorney from his client. The reason for the law is illustrated by this case. The deed which was executed by the deceased was never delivered to the grantees nor to any one to hold for them under written escrow instructions. Without the testimony of the attorney the destruction of the deed by the grantor before delivery was a complete and efficient revocation, as she undoubtedly intended it to be. By taking the testimony of the attorney, the want of escrow instructions was supplied by parol and a deposit in escrow was created. The value of the Code rule as well as the evil of its nonobservance is also illustrated by the circumstances of this case. All the acts of the grantor and statements made by her to her friends demonstrate that she did not know the effect of her deed or that she did not intend to create an escrow condition. If such had been her intention, the simplest precaution would have dictated the writing of instructions covering the escrow. If she had been living at the time of the trial, she could have denied the testimony of her attorney, and it would seem to be self-evident that his testimony was just the kind intended to be prohibited by the Code section. But the Supreme Court, in Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 188, 64 Pac. 294, held that the confidential relation between attorney and client was waived when he was employed to draw his client's will; that "by requesting his attorney to draw his will the client impliedly asks him to do and say whatever may at any time and place be requisite for the purpose of establishing the integrity of the will." If this is true regarding the preparation of a will, it should also apply to conversations relating to the preparation and execution of a deed placed in escrow transferring possession of real property after the death of the grantor. Though we are unable to draw from the statute the exception stated in the Nelson Case, the decision of the court is controlling. Respondent also relies upon Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 732, 161 Pac. 495. But this case is not in point, because the communications of the attorney Russell there under consideration were made in the presence of other parties, while the testimony of the attorney Taylor was not attacked on the ground that it was privileged.

3. The attack upon the findings is based upon the ground that the testimony of the grantor's attorney was inadmissible. It is granted that respondent's entire case depends upon the testimony of this witness, and that if this testimony was stricken out her case would fall. There cannot be any question that there is sufficient evidence in this testimony to support the findings of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] In denying the petition for transfer to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, we deem it proper to say that escrow instructions given by the grantor in a deed are not privileged communications, even though such instructions be given to a party who has theretofore, or at the time, occupied the position of attorney to the grantor. The assumption that the attorney while acting as the depository of the deed is occupying the position of attorney to the grantor, and acting as the agent of the grantor, assumes the very matter in issue where the question of delivery in escrow is involved, because, if the attorney is acting solely as the attorney for the grantor, then the deed in the possession of the attorney, as such, is, in legal effect, in the possession of the grantor, and there has been no delivery whatever. The very act of constituting the attorney depository of the deed in escrow makes him the agent of both the grantor and grantee (McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 282; 19 Pac. 499; Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Ga. 267, 63 Am. Dec. 235; Davis v. Clark, 58 Kan. 100, 48 Pac. 563; Gammon v. Bunnell, 22 Utah, 421, 64 Pac. 958), and renders the instructions given to him unprivileged.

Instructions to the holder of a deed delivered in escrow with reference to its delivery are not "in the course of the professional employment" of the attorney within the meaning of section 1881, subd. 2, C. C. P., although the delivery be made to the grantor's attorney, but are instructions which he is bound to reveal at the request of the grantee for whose benefit the instructions are given.

"Where the communication between the client and attorney is one authorizing the attorney to perform some act on behalf of the client, the communication giving such authority is not a confidential communication by the client, and the attorney may testify to the instructions given to him. Burnside v. Terry, 51 Ga. 186; Williams v. Blumenthal, 27 Wash. 24, 67 Pac. 393; Bruce v. Osgood, 113 Ind. 360, 14 N. E. 563." Collette v. Sarrasin, 184 Cal. 283, 284, 193 Pac. 571, 572.

See, also, Henshall v. Coburn, 177 Cal. 54, 169 Pac. 1014; Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 498, 45 Pac. 867.

AGALIANOS v. AMERICAN CENT. INS. CO.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1923. Modified on Rehearing June 20, 1923.)

1. Pleading ⚡408—Failure of complaint to state sufficient facts may be raised at any time.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, objection to complaint for want of facts is not waived by failure to raise it by demurrer, answer, or during the trial, but may be raised at any time.

2. Insurance ⚡632—If building only insured while used for particular purposes, such use must be alleged.

If, as claimed, fire policy only insured building and its contents while the building was occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes, it was indispensably necessary, in stating a cause of action, to allege that the building was, at time of fire, used for such purposes.

3. Insurance ⚡632—Complaint held to allege sufficiently, in absence of demurrer or objection, that building was occupied at time of fire for purposes specified.

Complaint alleging that on certain date, and from that date to and including the date of its destruction by fire, insured was the owner of described building occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes, held to allege sufficiently that the building was used for such purposes at time of fire, in absence of any demurrer or other objection, especially where insurer, by stipulation, limited the trial to the question of cancellation.

4. Insurance ⚡310(2) — Notice that policy would stand canceled unless premium was paid construed as conditional notice of cancellation.

Notice by insurer that unless premium was paid within five days it would stand canceled for nonpayment of premium was a conditional notice of cancellation, and, if premium was not paid, operated as cancellation without further notice or other action, but, if the premium was paid, was of no further force or effect.

5. Insurance ⚡665(3)—Evidence held to support findings of payment of premium and non-cancellation of policy.

Positive testimony of insured that he paid premium in full to insurance company's local agent held to support findings that the premium was paid and that policy was not canceled by notice that it would stand canceled unless premium was paid within five days.

6. Insurance ⚡229(2) — Notice that policy would stand canceled unless premium paid not a cancellation, though cancellation without any reason was authorized.

Though fire policy provided that either party might, without giving any reason, cause policy to be canceled, notice by insurer that policy would stand canceled unless premium was paid within five days did not cancel and invalidate the policy; the premium having been paid.

7. Insurance ⚡229(2)—When premium had been paid policy remained in force, notwithstanding notice that it would stand canceled unless premium was paid.

Notice by fire insurer that policy would stand canceled unless premium was paid within five days did not cancel policy, where the premium had already been paid before service of such notice.

8. Insurance ⚡654½—Question whether Insured and agent were on friendly terms immaterial on question of payment of premium.

Where fire insurer claimed its agent, without authority, permitted payment of premium in part by cancellation of his personal indebtedness, questions asked insured as to whether he and the agent were on friendly terms were immaterial.

9. Witnesses ⚡236(4)—Question asked insured as to business in which he was engaged at time of fire properly excluded as indefinite.

Though, under policy insuring building and contents only while occupied for certain purposes, question as to business in which insured was engaged at time of fire was perhaps proper as preliminary to direct question as to purpose for which building was being used, it was so indefinite as to justify sustaining of objection thereto.

10. Witnesses ⚡42—Exclusion of questions as to matter which witness had admitted he did not remember by reason of intoxication held not error.

Where insurance company's agent admitted that he was so under the influence of liquor at times involved that he could not remember how premium was paid, it was error to exclude questions as to whether he did not buy liquor from insured and become indebted therefor, and whether such indebtedness was not deducted from the premium, or whether he had paid the indebtedness.

11. Witnesses ⚡42, 271(3)—Affidavit of witness held incompetent, and when admitted without objection not proper subject of cross-examination.

Where insurance agent disclaimed ability to recall facts as to payment of premium by reason of intoxication, his affidavit to effect that premium was fully paid was incompetent, and, having been admitted without objection, did not authorize cross-examination as to whether he was intoxicated when he signed it.

12. Witnesses ⚡380(5) — Party could not cross-examine his own witness when he gave no testimony adverse to such party.

Where insurance agent could give no rational account of facts concerning payment of premium, and gave no testimony adverse to the insurer, who called him, but merely failed to give testimony as favorable to it as desired, it could not cross-examine him, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, as to his statements prior to trial.

13. Witnesses ⇨323—Party may cross-examine witness and impeach him when surprised, but surprise must be substantial.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, one may cross-examine his own witness and impeach him, if taken by surprise by his testimony, but the surprise must be substantial and be founded on testimony at variance with what the party producing him had reason to believe it would be, and prejudicial or detrimental to such party.

14. Insurance ⇨670—Finding held sufficient finding of occupancy for particular purposes at time of fire.

Finding in language of allegation that on certain date, and thereafter and to and including the day of its destruction by fire, insured was the owner of a described building occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes, held a sufficient finding that it was so occupied at time of fire.

15. Appeal and error ⇨694(1)—Sufficiency of evidence to support finding not reviewable when bill of exceptions does not specify insufficiency.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 648, sufficiency of evidence to support finding is not subject to review, when bill of exceptions contains no specification of insufficiency of evidence to support it.

16. Stipulations ⇨14(7)—Proof of occupancy of insured building for purposes specified held rendered unnecessary.

In action on fire policy, stipulation that policy was issued, that fire occurred and proof of loss was made, and that, if premium had been paid and policy had not been canceled, the amount of $1,800 was unpaid and was the amount of the loss, held to admit all essential and material facts except payment of premium and noncancellation of policy, and to render unnecessary proof that premises were occupied for purposes specified in the policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Theodore Agalianos against the Amerian Central Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Coogan & O'Connor, of San Francisco, and Arthur L. Levinsky, of Stockton, for appellant.

Stanley M. Arndt and N. A. Brown, both of Stockton (George F. McNoble, of Stockton, of counsel), for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff sued to recover on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant to the plaintiff, and covering a certain building and the contents thereof situated in Lodi, San Joaquin county. The action was tried by the court, the parties thereto having expressly waived a trial by jury. The plaintiff was awarded judgment in the sum of $1,800, which is the amount of the risk provided in the policy. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant and denied by the court. The defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions.

The important allegations of the complaint are as follows:

"II. That on the 15th day of April, 1921, at Lodi, county of San Joaquin, state of California, in consideration of the payment by the plaintiff to the defendant of the premium of $81, the defendant, by its agents duly authorized thereto, made its policy of fire insurance in writing to the amount of $1,800, a copy of which is annexed hereto marked Exhibit A, and is hereby referred to and made a part hereof as if herein set forth in full.

"III. That on said 15th day of April, 1921, and for a long time prior thereto, and from that date on up to and including the 2d day of July, 1921, the plaintiff was the owner of the property situated at No. 10 South Main street, city of Lodi, San Joaquin county, state of California, including the one-story frame building thereon occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes and the merchandise therein contained and the store, office, and workshop, furniture, fixtures and equipment, implements, signs, and tools and supplies incidental to the business being carried on in said premises.

"IV. That plaintiff now is, and at all times herein mentioned has been, the owner of the property situated at No. 10 South Main street, city of Lodi, San Joaquin county, state of California.

"V. That on the 2d day of July, 1921, said one-story frame building, together with all its contents, including said merchandise and said store, office, and workshop, furniture, fixtures, and equipment, and said implements, signs and tools and said supplies, were all and each of them totally destroyed by fire."

The answer of the defendant consists of a denial of the allegations contained in paragraphs 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the complaint and a special defense based upon the alleged cancellation of the policy by the defendant upon the 21st day of June, 1921, and prior to the day on which the property was destroyed by fire, to wit, the 2d day of July, 1921.

Among other provisions, the contract of insurance between the plaintiff and the defendant contains the following:

"(1) $1,000.00. On the one-story roof frame building and its additions (if any) of like construction communicating and in contact therewith, including foundations, sidewalks, plumbing, electrical wiring, and stationary heating and lighting apparatus and fixtures; also all permanent fixtures, awnings, wall and ceiling decorations, and frescoes, stationary scales, and elevators, belonging to and constituting a part of said building, only while occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes and situate as above."

[1] The point first urged for a reversal, and which is raised for the first time on this appeal, is that the complaint does not state a cause of action on the policy because it fails to show that the building covered thereby was, from the time of the issuance of the policy until and including the time at which the building was destroyed by fire, used only for mercantile and restaurant purposes, an allegation which is essential to the statement of a cause of action under the above provision of the policy. There was no objection by demurrer to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action, nor was there any such objection made in the answer or during the progress of the trial by way of opposition to evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of the complaint; but failure to object to a complaint for want of facts is not waived and may be raised any time. Code Civ. Proc. § 434; Arnold v. American Ins. Co., 148 Cal. 660, 663, 84 Pac. 182, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 6.

[2] It has been held that, where, as here, the action is to recover on an insurance policy, a cause of action is not stated unless it be shown by the complaint that the loss alleged was within the terms of the policy. In this case therefore, under the construction placed by the defendant upon the above provision of the contract between the insurer and the insured, it was, to state a cause of action against the defendant, indispensably necessary to allege that the building destroyed was, at the time of the fire, used by the insured for mercantile and restaurant purposes. Allen v. Home Ins. Co., 133 Cal. 29, 65 Pac. 138; Arnold v. American Ins. Co., 148 Cal. 660, 84 Pac. 182, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 6. See, also, Benicia Agricultural Works v. Germania Ins. Co., 97 Cal. 468, 32 Pac. 512; Mawhinny v. Southern Ins. Co., 98 Cal. 184, 32 Pac. 945, 20 L. R. A. 87; Slinkard v. Manchester Fire Assurance Co., 122 Cal. 595, 55 Pac. 417.

[3] As to the meaning of the provision of the policy above quoted herein, the contention of the appellant is that the words "only while occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes" refer to the building itself, while, on the other hand, the plaintiff insists that, interpreting the provision according to its grammatical construction, as in this case (so it is contended) it should be construed, the said words mean this: That all permanent fixtures, awnings, wall and ceiling decorations, and frescoes, etc., belonging to or constituting a part of said building, shall remain covered by the policy only for such time, during the term of the policy, as the building shall be "occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes." In other words, the plaintiff takes the position that said provision comprises two different and independent paragraphs or parts, each dealing with a different subject-matter; that the intention to disconnect the two paragraphs so that each should be read without reference to the other is clearly shown by the fact that the second paragraph is not only separated from the first by a semicolon, but commences with the word "also"; that, as thus considered, the natural and rational meaning of the entire article or provision is that the "appellant insured the building, the merchandise and the store, office, and workshop, furniture, fixtures, and equipment, regardless of the nature of occupancy, but that appellant only insured the permanent fixtures, awnings, wall and ceiling decorations, and frescoes as long as the building was occupied for restaurant and mercantile purposes." Resp. Brief, p. 9.

There is much force in the view that counsel for the plaintiff thus take of the provision of the policy in question; but it is not necessary to determine this particular controversy herein since, assuming that the defendant's construction of the provision is sound, and conceding, as must be done, that it was necessary, to state a case for the plaintiff, to allege that the building at the time of the fire was occupied and used for mercantile and restaurant purposes, we are persuaded to the belief that the complaint in paragraph 3 thereof, in the absence of a demurrer thereto, is sufficient in that particular. It will be observed that in said paragraph it is, in effect, alleged that from the date of the issuance of the policy down to and including the 2d day of July, 1921, on which day it was destroyed by fire, the building was occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes. The complaint in this regard may be amenable to the criticisms of a demurrer on special grounds, but, even so, it is sufficiently clear to show that the building was, at the time of the fire, used for mercantile and restaurant purposes. At least the facts stated in paragraph 3 clearly imply the existence of the fact that the building was at the time of the fire occupied and used for said purposes, and this is sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer or other appropriate and timely objection to the pleading. The courts are disinclined to view with favor objections to pleadings specifically made for the first time after judgment, where it is clear that upon suggestion before trial, the defect or defects could have been easily remedied or overcome. Speaking of such a situation in a case which, as we have seen, involved precisely the same point as the one we are now considering, it is said in Arnold v. American Insurance Co., supra:

"A somewhat liberal rule, therefore, has frequently been applied in construing a complaint where the objection is made for the first time after judgment. Facts essential to a cause of action appearing by reasonable implication only, and allegations made in the form of a legal conclusion, which merely implied the necessary material facts, have been held sufficient as against such an objection. An example of this is the case of Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 Pac. 772, where there was no other allegation of the essential fact of non-payment except the allegation that 'there is now due and owing,' etc. This was held sufficient after judgment, the ground of the ruling being that the objection was rather to the manner of pleading an essential fact than to the total failure to allege such fact, and that such faults, in the absence of demurrer, are cured by the judgment."

While, obviously, the mere admission, either expressly or impliedly, of counsel for the defendant that the complaint is sufficient in the statement of a cause of action cannot have the effect of making a complaint wanting in sufficient facts a good pleading, yet it is undoubtedly true in this case that counsel for the defendant assumed that the complaint herein is sufficient in all respects, for they not only failed to challenge its sufficiency by demurrer or other legal mode of testing the sufficiency of a pleading, but, on the opening of the trial, voluntarily and expressly limited by stipulation the trial to the issue of the alleged cancellation of the policy prior to the date of the destruction of the building and its contents by fire. The stipulation is as follows:

"Mr. Levinsky: We will admit on behalf of the defendant that the policy was issued by the agent, Mr. De Force, at Lodi, and that a fire occurred, and proof of loss was made within time, and if the premium has been paid, and the policy has not been canceled by reason of nonpayment or otherwise, that the amount of $1,800 has been unpaid and is the loss."

This stipulation, it is clear, involves an admission of all the facts essential to the statement of a cause of action for a recovery upon the policy.

[4] We are now to consider the next point insisted upon for a reversal, to wit, whether the policy was actually canceled prior to the day on which the building and its contents were destroyed, as alleged in the complaint. It was admitted by the plaintiff at the trial that the defendant addressed to and served upon the plaintiff a notice in writing, dated June 15, 1921, to the effect that the premium of $81 due the defendant under the policy in question had not been paid, and further likewise notified plaintiff that—

"Unless said premium be paid on or before five days from the date of service of this notice, said policy and the whole thereof, including mortgage agreement, if any, will stand canceled for nonpayment of premium without further notice, and thereafter be null and void, and no liability will exist thereunder."

It will be perceived that the above notice was a conditional notice of cancellation. It notified the defendant that unless he complied with the condition therein stated within the time specified in the notice the policy would stand canceled. If in such case the insured defaults in the payment of the premium within the time specified, then, upon the expiration of said time, the notice operates, ipso facto et eo instanti, to cancel the policy. In other words, in such case, the insured having failed to pay the premium within the prescribed time, the notice then operates to cancel the policy, and no other or further notice or other action by the insurer is necessary to effect a cancellation of the policy. If, on the other hand, the premium be paid by the insured within the time specified in the notice, then the notice is of no further force and effect and the policy will remain a valid contract between the insurer and the insured.¹

[5] The plaintiff positively testified that he, in three different installments, paid in cash the premium of $81 to one Byron A. De Force, the local agent of the defendant at Lodi through whom the policy of insurance involved herein was issued by the defendant, long prior to the receipt of the above notice.

De Force was made a witness by the defendant and questioned closely as to the matter of the claimed payments by the plaintiff, but stated that, owing to the fact that he was suffering from alcoholism about the time the policy was issued and for some time thereafter, he was unable to say how much money was paid on the premium or in what manner it was paid. In fact, his testimony was so unsatisfactory and, indeed, so unintelligible upon the subject-matter thereof, that the trial judge was impelled to remark: "The witness has not specifically, certainly testified to anything in any fashion that the court can consider it." He did not deny receiving the payment of the premium in full nor did he affirm that he had received such payment. As we shall later see, counsel for the defendant undertook to make him say that part of the payment for the premium was in the application of a personal debt he owed the plaintiff to the satisfaction of the amount due on the premium, but he seemed unable to remember whether such was the fact or not and refused to testify that it was the fact.

It was specifically found by the court that the policy of insurance issued to the plaintiff was not canceled by the defendant in the manner stated in the notice and at the time alleged in the answer, and from this finding the finding is implied that the defendant had paid the premium at the times mentioned by him in his testimony. The testimony of the plaintiff, if believed by the court, as evidently it was, was sufficient to justify the specific finding that the policy was not canceled and the finding of payment of the premium necessarily implied therefrom. At any rate, said testimony is sufficient to support the findings of noncancellation of said policy and the payment of the premium thereon. Indeed, there is in the record no testimony worthy of being so characterized which is contradictory to the testimony of the plaintiff that he paid the premium in full to defendant's agent, De Force, before the receipt by plaintiff of the notice from defendant of its purpose to cancel the policy if the premium were not paid as required by said notice.

[6, 7] Counsel for the defendant contend, however, that, since it is within the rights of the defendant, under the policy issued to the plaintiff, arbitrarily or without stating any reason therefor, to cancel the insurance policy before the end of the term for which it was issued, the effect of the above notice operated, ipso facto, to cancel and so invalidate the force of the policy. It is true that the policy issued by the defendant provides that either the insured or the insurer may at any time, without giving any specific or any reason therefor, cause the policy to be canceled. But the case here is not one in which the insurer, following the provision of the policy authorizing it to cancel the policy merely upon giving the insured five days' notice, has elected to cancel the policy arbitrarily or for unexplained reasons. And it is for this reason that the case of Wing Chung Long v. Prussian National Insurance Co., 33 Cal. App. 715, 166 Pac. 358, cited by the defendant as supporting its position with regard to the effect of the notice herein involved, is not in point. In that case it appears from the opinion that two different written notices were served upon the insured at different times. The first, which was served in January, 1913, was precisely the same as the one here. The second was dated March 25, 1913, and was an unconditional notice of the cancellation of the policy. It was properly held in that case that the defendant, under the terms of the policy, had the right to elect arbitrarily to cancel the policy, notwithstanding that a notice had been previously served upon the insured declaring it to be the intention of the insurer to cancel the policy unless the insurer paid the premium, as to which he was then in default, within five days from the date of such notice. In other words, it was held that the insurer could cancel the policy even though the premium had been paid, and that there was no necessity under the terms of the policy for the insurer to state in the notice of cancellation the grounds upon which or the reasons for which the policy was canceled, and that the prior notice stating that it would be canceled in case the premium was not paid within a specified time was not to be considered as having any connection with the subsequent notice or as qualifying or limiting its effect. There is, obviously, a marked distinction between that case and the one at bar.² If, therefore the plaintiff paid the premium to the defendant, the life of the policy would, of course, be perpetuated or retain its legal integrity to the end of its term, unless in the meantime it was canceled by either the insurer or the insured under the provision of the policy investing them with the mutual right of cancellation, exercisable arbitrarily, but, it having been shown that the premium had been paid before the receipt by the plaintiff of said notice, it follows that the contingency (failure of plaintiff to pay premium) upon the happening of which the force of the policy was, by virtue of the terms of said notice, to terminate, did not happen, and the policy therefore remained in full force and effect.

The next assignments of error involve rulings of the court disallowing answers to certain questions propounded to certain witnesses by counsel for the defendant. These assignments are numerous, but are of the same general nature, and may therefore be grouped and thus considered.

The theory upon which it was sought to bring the proposed but excluded testimony into the record was that the defendant's Lodi agent, De Force, transcended the scope of his authority as such agent by accepting, as in payment of the premium, or at least as in part payment thereof, the cancellation by plaintiff of a debt which he (De Force) owed the former for goods and merchandise. See Tomsecek v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 113 Wis. 114, 88 N. W. 1013, 57 L. R. A. 455, 90 Am. St. Rep. 846; Briggs v. Collins, 113 Ark. 190, 167 S. W. 1114, L. R. A. 1915A, 686; Sullivan v. Germania Life Ins. Co., 15 Mont. 522, 39 Pac. 742; Folb v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 133 N. C. 179, 45 S. E. 547; Texas Life Ins. Co. v. Davidge, 51 Tex. 244; Hoffman v. Hancock Mutual Life Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 161, 23 L. Ed. 539; Wiley B. Allen Co. v. Wood, 32 Cal. App. 76, 82, 162 Pac. 121; Stetson v. Briggs, 114 Cal. 511, 514, 46 Pac. 603.

After the stipulation of counsel for the defendant as to the truth of certain facts was made, and the plaintiff had introduced in evidence, without objection, the policy and proof of loss, the latter admitted to be properly made, the defendant, under section 2155 of the Code of Civil Procedure, called the plaintiff as a witness. As stated above, the plaintiff repeatedly, and with apparent emphasis, declared in the course of his examination by defendant's counsel that he paid the whole of the premium, a part thereof in cash and a part by means of a check. He was then asked by the defendant's attorney the direct question as to whether the premium was not paid partly in cash and partly by deducting a personal debt that De Force owed him, and the plaintiff answered that De Force had never at any time owed him any money or was indebted to him for any purpose. To contradict this testimony by the plaintiff the defendant called De Force to the witness stand and, as above stated, undertook to show by him that the premium was paid partly by the plaintiff deducting therefrom the amount of a personal indebtedness of said De Force. De Force, as shown, did not seem to remember how or in what manner the premium was paid. Counsel then asked the witness a number of questions, for the purpose, it was stated at the time, of showing by what particular means the premium was paid and the business for which the building was used at the time the policy was issued and the fire occurred.

As illustrative of the character of the questions asked for the purposes stated are the following: Plaintiff was asked by counsel for the defendant whether De Force was in the habit of buying liquor at his (plaintiff's) place, and also if it was not true that he and De Force were on friendly terms at the time of the issuance of the policy and down to the time of the destruction of the premises by fire. Objections to these questions were sustained by the court. Also the following questions propounded to De Force: Whether he had not purchased liquors from the plaintiff for which he did not pay and the amount of which was deducted by the plaintiff from the total amount due for the premium; whether or not De Force was indebted to the plaintiff in the year 1921; whether the witness had paid plaintiff an indebtedness which he (De Force) admitted he owed him in April, 1921; as to the nature of the business in which the plaintiff was engaged in the year 1921. To all these questions objections were made upon the general grounds, and the objections sustained by the court. Counsel for the defendant also asked the witness some questions in the nature of impeachment, to which the court sustained objections on the ground that it was an attempt by defendant to impeach his own witness. These rulings are also assigned as erroneous.

[8, 9] The questions by the defendant which the court refused to allow the plaintiff to answer called for testimony which could have reflected no substantial light upon the issue which was being tried. It was certainly immaterial whether the plaintiff and De Force were upon friendly terms, and the question propounded to the plaintiff as to the business he was engaged in at the time of the fire, while perhaps proper as a preliminary one, or one leading finally to a direct or categorical question as to the particular purpose for which the building was then being used, was so indefinite as to have justified the court in sustaining an objection thereto. The court suggested that counsel should go directly to the question of occupancy and not ask questions which appeared to be upon their face wholly immaterial. It is quite manifest that the plaintiff might have been engaged in a business other than the mercantile and restaurant business and still the building upon which the insurance was placed used for the purposes stated in the policy.

[10] There was no error in sustaining the objections to the questions put to De Force by counsel for the defendant which are above adverted to. It requires but slight scrutiny of the testimony given by said witness, if, indeed, it can properly be called testimony, to make it clear that he could not give a rational explanation of any of the details of the transaction upon which this action is founded. It was admitted by him, it will be recalled, that at the time of the issuance of the policy and at the times payments on the premium were made by the plaintiff he was under the influence of liquor to an extent that rendered it impossible for him to state definitely how or in what manner or by what means the payments were made. He did say on one occasion, however, that he remembered receiving a check from plaintiff as in part payment of the premium, but that he had no recollection of receiving any cash payment, although he did not affirmatively say that he did not also receive cash as in part satisfaction of the premium. It is therefore quite plain that, even if the court had allowed the question propounded to him by counsel for the defendant as to the means by which the premium was paid, he would not have been able to give any more satisfactory answer thereto than he had given to the questions calling for the same testimony previously propounded to him. Hence it cannot be held that the court's rulings upon those questions were erroneous. Indeed, the court could properly have excluded the answers to said questions that we are now considering on the ground that similar questions had previously been asked the witness, with the result as first above explained.

The disallowance by the court of the impeaching questions to De Force and other questions likewise propounded to the same witness in the nature of cross-examination did not involve error.

[11] One of the questions asked of De Force by the attorney for the defendant, which was in the nature of cross-examination, and evidently for the purpose of laying the foundation for introducing proof in impeachment of his testimony in a certain particular, in case his answer should require impeach-

ing proof, was whether he was intoxicated at the time he signed a certain affidavit to the effect that the premium was, on the 15th day of April, 1921, paid to him in full as agent of the defendant by the plaintiff. The said affidavit was, without objection by the defendant, introduced in evidence by plaintiff's attorney during his cross-examination of De Force, who had stated, just previous to the introduction of the document, that he executed the same. In sustaining the objection to the question as to whether De Force was in an intoxicated state when he signed said affidavit, the trial court properly held that the document involved incompetent testimony, at the same time stating that the affidavit would not have been allowed to go into the record if counsel for the defendant had objected to it, and further correctly declaring the rule to be that, as to incompetent testimony to the admission of which no objection is made, cross-examination is not allowable.

[12, 13] Another question asked of De Force by defendant's counsel, and similar in character to the above, was whether the witness did not say, prior to his being called to the witness stand, in the presence of one of the attorneys for the defendant and certain other named persons, that a portion of the premium was paid by the application thereto of a personal debt in a certain amount which the witness owed the plaintiff. As already pointed out, the witness was not able, prior to the asking of said question, to give a rational account of the manner in which or the means by which the premium was paid. Indeed, nowhere in his testimony did he positively or affirmatively make any statement militating against the case of defendant, either as to the payment of the premium or the occupancy of the building. As must readily be inferred from what has been said above as to the general character of his testimony, it is manifest that all that can be said of such testimony, in so far as its effect upon the case of the defendant is concerned, is that it did not measure up to the expectations of the latter. In other words, De Force's testimony as to the payment of the premium was merely disappointing to the defendant in that he did not testify as favorably to it as it had wished or desired. Such disappointments, however, do not justify the cross-examination or the impeachment of one's own witness. One may cross-examine his own witness for the purpose of laying the foundation for his impeachment and so impeach him, if he can, if he is taken by surprise by the testimony given by such witness. Section 2049, Code Civ. Proc. But the surprise which will open the way to such a course must be substantial. It must be founded on the fact that the witness has given testimony not only at variance with what the party producing him as a witness had good reason to believe, before calling him to the witness stand and examining him, that it would be, but that such testimony is prejudicial or detrimental to the case of such party. The rule as thus stated is not only sound in principle but accords with the spirit as well as the letter of section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is sustained by the cases treating that subject. It has repeatedly been held that the mere failure of a witness to give favorable testimony for the party producing him does not entitle such party to prove that he has made contrary statements elsewhere, and when the testimony of such witness is of that character, the party producing him is bound to accept the same as it is so given. See People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 532, 75 Pac. 101; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 345, 83 Pac. 43; Zipperlen v. Southern Pacific Co., 7 Cal. App. 206, 214-217, 93 Pac. 1049; People v. Spencer (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 380.

There are other rulings than the above to which counsel object, but they involve the disposition of questions similar to those above considered and they need therefore not be given special notice herein.

[14-16] It is lastly contended that there is no evidence supporting the finding that the building was occupied for mercantile and restaurant purposes at the time of the fire. The finding as to occupancy is in the language of the third paragraph of the complaint and sufficiently shows, as we hold is true of the complaint, that the building was occupied for the purposes stated in the policy at all times from the date of the issuance of the policy to and including the time that the building and contents were destroyed by fire on July 2, 1921. As to the contention, however, that there is no evidence to support this finding, it is first to be remarked that that point is not subject to review upon the record before us, because the bill of exceptions contains no specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to support it. Section 648, Code Civ. Proc.; Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 799, 167 Pac. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184, and cases therein cited; Smith v. Meade, 36 Cal. App. 173, 171 Pac. 815; In the matter of Baker, 153 Cal. 537, 542, 96 Pac. 12. But a conclusive reply to the point is that the stipulation whereby counsel for the defendant admitted the existence of certain material facts involved, as we have above pointed out, the admission of all the essential and material facts in this case, except the issue as to the payment of the premium or cancellation of the policy, and therefore, if it be true that the finding as to occupancy is in any respect insufficient or not supported by positive testimony, said stipulation supplies such deficiency. Indeed, in view of the stipulation referred to, there was no necessity for a finding upon the question of occupancy, since it is well settled that no finding of essential facts, the truth of which is admitted, is necessary or required.

The judgment is affirmed.

Modification of Opinion on Rehearing.

HART, J. It should be explained that the above modification (shown by footnotes, ante), is made because of a suggestion to the writer of the opinion, after its publication in the California Appellate Decisions, that the language stricken from the opinion seemed to imply that, in the event that the insured failed to pay the premium within the time specified in the notice, the said notice would not then operate, ipso facto, to cancel the policy. We did not intend, by the use of the language hereby expunged from the opinion, so to declare. We never for a moment supposed that the notice upon default by the insured in the payment of the premium within the time designated therein, would not stand as an absolute cancellation of the policy. Counsel for the appellant in their briefs seemed to hold to the view that, even though the premium were paid within the prescribed time, the insured could, nevertheless, treat the notice as one of unconditional cancellation, to take effect upon the expiration of the five days within which the premium was required to be paid, or as amounting, in effect, to the cancellation which either the insurer or insured was at liberty to effect under the provision of the policy giving the parties to the contract of insurance the mutual right to cancel or surrender the policy arbitrarily or without stating any reason therefor. This contention we had in mind when we used the language stricken out. We merely attempted to say that a notice specifically stating a condition upon which alone the policy would be canceled would not have that effect unless the condition were not complied with by the insured within the time fixed by the notice for its performance. But we can see the force of the criticism that the language hereby stricken from the opinion might justify the implication that, if the premium was not paid within the prescribed time, a cancellation of the policy would not then be effected, but that there would be required further notice to that effect. Clearly, the said language so construed would not correctly state the rule as to that matter; and, to make our position clearer upon the proposition, we are glad of the opportunity to make the above modification.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.)

1. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 76(2)—Contract for services held violation of covenant not to sublet.

A covenant in a lease not to sublet the house or furnishings held violated by a subsequent contract for services between lessee and third party, transferring exclusive possession and management of the premises at a fixed rental reserved, and containing a re-entry clause on condition broken; such contract being a thinly veiled lease.

2. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 76(3) — Covenant against subletting not waived by permission to employ a servant manager of premises.

Under a lease with covenant not to sublet, lessor granting permission to employ a servant to manage the premises did not waive the right to claim a forfeiture for transferring exclusive possession as an entirety under a "contract for services."

3. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 290(5) — Damages from independent covenants not proper offset.

In a forcible entry and detainer suit, where the lease contains a covenant by lessor to repair and a covenant by lessee not to sublet, the covenants being independent, damages from failure to repair cannot constitute a set-off or counterclaim in an action on the covenant not to sublet, since Code Civ. Proc. § 741, applies only to cases of adverse possession.

4. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 290(5) — Counterclaim or offset for money paid for future rent must be so pleaded.

In an action of forcible entry and detainer, in the absence of any pleading that an offset or counterclaim was money advanced for rent, accruing in the future, testimony to that effect is not availing.

5. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 198—Retention of rents paid in advance, but accruing before forfeiture, held proper.

Rents paid in advance, but accruing before forfeiture of the lease and notice to quit, were properly retained by lessor, and do not constitute a counterclaim in action for unlawful detainer.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 758(3) — Errors not specifically designated held not reviewable.

Errors suggested by appellant's general discourse, but not specifically pointed out, are not reviewable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Loulu V. Frasier against Maye Witt and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Witt appeals. Affirmed.

Floyd S. Sisk, of Venice, for appellant.

Wm. T. Blakely, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action of unlawful detainer to recover possession of a lot of land, with the apartment house thereon known as the Seaward Apartments, situated in the city of Venice, together with damages for unlawful withholding. The case was tried before a jury, a verdict was returned awarding possession to plaintiff and assessing her damages at $345, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant Maye Witt appeals.

Appellant, as plaintiff's lessee, entered into possession of the premises under a written lease executed by herself and plaintiff on November 1, 1919, whereby the latter, as the lessor, leased the premises to appellant for the term of five years at a rental of $100 per month, payable monthly in advance on the 1st day of each and every month of the five-year term. The lease contained the following covenant on the part of appellant:

"That she will not sublet, or transfer the use or possession of, said house, No. 15 Mildred Ave., Venice, California, furniture, goods and chattels, or any part of the same to any person or persons whatever; that she will carefully and economically occupy and use said house, furniture, goods and chattels, and forthwith repair all injury, and pay all damages * * * that may happen or accrue to the same or any part thereof during the term of this lease."

On December 10, 1921, appellant, as the party of the first part, and the defendants H. K. Weadon and wife, as parties of the second part, executed a written instrument bearing the caption, "Contract for Services," and which contains the following provisions:

"That the first party hereby engages and employs the second parties, and said second parties hereby accept said engagement and employment, upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: That the said second parties hereby agree to manage and conduct that certain apartment house known as the Seaward Apartments, situate at No. 15 Mildred avenue, in the city of Venice, Cal., for the term of one year from and after the 10th day of December, 1921, and ending on the 9th day of December, 1922. That during the said term said second parties will carefully and economically manage and conduct said apartment house, and carefully and economically use and occupy said house, furniture, goods and chattels now therein situated, and shall at their own expense forthwith repair all injury, and pay all damages that may happen or accrue to the same or any part thereof during the term of this agreement. * * * At the termination of this agreement, or other sooner determination thereof, said second parties will peaceably and quietly surrender, yield, and deliver up the entire possession of said house, furniture, goods, and chattels, and premises above described, unto said first party, in as good condition as the same are now in, reasonable use and wear thereof excepted. * * * The second parties, for their services to be rendered and performed hereunder, are to and shall receive and retain any and all sums of moneys derived as rentals in and about said premises, in excess of the sum of two hundred seventy-five ($275.00) dollars per month; said second parties hereby agreeing to pay to said first party the said sum of $275.00 per month, in lawful money of the United States of America, upon the 10th day of January, 1922, and thereafter upon the 10th day of each and every month during the remainder of this term, a similar amount as above specified; said parties of the second part hereby and upon this date paying to the first party the sum of $700.00, to apply as follows: For the first month of said term, and for the last month thereof—and $150.00 to apply upon the October-November, 1922, payment; and if all of the terms of this agreement are carried out upon the part of said second parties, then they shall not be called upon by first party to account for any sums of money for the months above mentioned, but if said second parties make default in any of the covenants herein contained, and first party again takes possession or is entitled to take possession of said premises, she shall also be entitled to retain all of said above-named sum of $700.00 as liquidated damages for the use and occupation of said premises by the second parties under this contract. * * * And it is agreed that time is of the essence of this contract, and that, if the second parties do not make the payments hereinbefore provided for, at the time and in the manner therein specified, or default in any of the covenants above agreed upon, then and in that event this contract may, at the option of the first party, thereupon and without notice to second parties, be terminated and thereafter become null and void, and that thereafter the first party or her agents may re-enter and take possession of said premises in entirety, and remove said second parties therefrom, or any and all other persons unlawfully holding the same, or any part thereof, using all force that may be reasonably necessary, said second parties hereby waiving any and all damages that may accrue from such removal."

Upon discovering that her lessee, the appellant here, had entered into this agreement with the Weadons, plaintiff, deeming that the former had thereby violated her covenant not to sublet or transfer the use or possession of the premises, brought this action on January 21, 1922, alleging that, without plaintiff's consent, appellant had sublet the leased property to the Weadons, and had transferred to them the use and possession thereof. Before bringing the action plaintiff served upon each defendant the statutory three days' notice to quit and deliver up possession. At that time appellant was in possession of the property, she having previously effected a re-entry.

Appellant's answer, besides containing a denial that she had sublet the premises or had transferred the use or possession thereof, pleaded as affirmative defenses: (1) That plaintiff had waived the covenant against subletting and transferring the use and possession by previously giving to appellant permission to place a "manager" in charge of the apartment house; (2) that on January 1, 1920, at plaintiff's request, appellant had orally agreed to pay an additional sum of $20 per month on her lease—that is, a monthly rental of $120 instead of the $100 per month provided for in the written lease; that pursuant to such oral agreement she paid to plaintiff such additional sum of $20 for 21 months, making a total of $420; that said total of $420 was “additional rental at the rate of $20 per month upon said premises for 21 months from January 1, 1920, to and including September 1, 1921,” and that, in consideration of such increased rental, plaintiff had agreed that defendant might install a “manager”; and (3) that, since taking possession, appellant had expended for repairs and new furnishings more than $3,000.

Appellant has not stated her points with any definiteness or crystalline lucidity. Her principal points, as nearly as we can discern them, are: (1) Her contract with the Weadons was not a sublease or a transfer of the use or possession of the premises; (2) by previously permitting appellant to install a manager, a Mrs. O'Brien, who was in charge of the apartment house for appellant from February, 1921, to June of that year at a salary of $35 per month, respondent waived appellant's covenant not to sublet or transfer the use or possession; (3) the expenditures made by appellant for repairs should have been allowed as an offset to respondent's claim of damages for the unlawful withholding; (4) the 21 payments of $20 each likewise should have been allowed as an offset; and (5) the trial judge erred in his refusal to give certain instructions and in his rulings upon certain objections to the admission of evidence.

[1] The instrument executed by appellant and the Weadons, though it is styled a “Contract for Services,” is but a thinly veiled attempt to conceal appellant's deliberate evasion of her covenant not to sublet the premises or transfer the use or possession thereof. Looking beyond the form of the transaction to discover its true import, we can readily see that the arrangement made with the Weadons amounted to an underletting of the premises, notwithstanding the parties designated their agreement a contract for services. Under the provisions of the instrument the Weadons were not to go into occupation simply as servants of appellant. They were new tenants, and not merely new occupants. A part of the lessee's estate was transferred to them. That is, they were given the right of exclusive possession for a definite term, one year, for which a fixed rent was reserved. The document provides that the Weadons are to manage and conduct the apartment house “for the term of one year,” and that during that “term” they shall pay appellant “the sum of $275 per month * * * upon the 10th day of January, 1922, and thereafter upon the 10th day of each and every month during the remainder of this term.” This part of the document is so worded that the Weadons, in effect, obligated themselves to pay appellant this fixed sum of $275 per month irrespective of whether they received that amount from the rentals of the several apartments or not. It is further provided that, if the Weadons shall “default” in any of their covenants, then appellant, at her option, may “re-enter and take possession of said premises in entirety, and remove said second parties therefrom.” It is clear that it was within the contemplation of the parties that the Weadons should have the right to receive and retain the whole income to be derived from the apartments. True, the instrument declares that the Weadons shall have the right to retain only the income in excess of $275 per month; but, as that sum was to be paid by them to appellant in any event, the effect is the same as if the document had expressly declared that the Weadons should retain all the income from the apartments, rendering to appellant a rental of $275 per month during the term. Such a provision is wholly inconsistent with the idea that the Weadons were but servants of appellant. Moreover, if the relation were not that of landlord and tenant, but that of master and servant, as appellant would have us believe, then why did appellant expressly reserve to herself the right of “re-entry” for condition broken? Such a reservation would not have been necessary had the possession of the Weadons been that of servants and not that of tenants. Clearly the transaction possessed all the elements necessary to constitute it an underletting of the leased premises, let the parties to it call it what they may.

[2] Respondent's previously granted permission to install a “manager,” i. e., a mere agent or servant, did not authorize appellant to sublet to a tenant the entire premises and transfer the right of exclusive possession. Therefore any permission which respondent may have given to employ a servant to manage the apartment house was not a waiver of appellant's covenant not to sublet or to transfer to a tenant the use or possession of the premises as an entirety, as was done when appellant put the Weadons in possession under the so-called “Contract for Services.”

[3] Appellant was not entitled to set off the cost of the improvements made by her. We do not understand her to claim that respondent violated any covenant to make repairs. And, even if the latter had violated such a covenant, still it would have been the violation of a covenant wholly independent of appellant's covenant not to sublet or transfer possession, and therefore would not be a defense to this action (McSloy v. Ryan, 27 Mich. 110); nor would it be a proper subject for set-off or counterclaim (Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 Pac. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370; Phillips v. Port Townsend Lodge, 8 Wash. 529, 36 Pac. 476). Appellant seems to think that section 741 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives her the right to set off the cost of the improvements. That section has no application here. Aside from the consideration that set-off or counterclaim is usually not permissible in an action for unlawful detainer, section 741 is applicable only when the improvements are made by a defendant who, at the time when they were made, was holding adversely to the plaintiff. Hannan v. McNickle, 82 Cal. 122, 23 Pac. 27. Here the defendant, when she made the improvements, was holding not adversely to but under plaintiff, as the latter's tenant.

[4, 5] The $420, the aggregate of the 21 additional payments of $20 each, is not available as an offset or recoupment. Assuming, for the purposes of this decision only, that these additional amounts could have been successfully pleaded as a recoupment or an offset if, as appellant testified, they were paid as advances on rent to accrue in the future at a time subsequent to the forfeiture of appellant's lease, still the fact remains that such a defense was not pleaded. Appellant's answer alleges that the $420 was an "additional rental * * * upon said premises for 21 months from January 1, 1920, to and including September 1, 1921." This period antedated the transaction whereby appellant sublet the premises to the Weadons contrary to her covenant. That underletting did not occur until December 10, 1921. There can be no question as to respondent's right to receive and retain all rents which accrued prior to the forfeiture of the lease. Such prior rents could not possibly be set off against the damage which was caused by appellant's unlawful detainer after she was served with notice to quit.

[6] What we thus far have said will suffice to dispose of most of the other points raised by appellant. The few remaining assignments are not pointed out with sufficient definiteness to call our attention to the particular action of the court which is deemed to be erroneous. We cannot be expected to hunt through the record to find errors which appellant's general discourse might lead us to suspect may exist. She should at least specifically point out the errors upon which she relies.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant has appealed from a judgment of conviction and an order of the trial court denying him a new trial.

He was charged, in an information filed by the district attorney with having committed the crime of embezzlement, on the 6th day of March, 1922. Before we take up that particular transaction it should be recited that the complaining witness, Bella Gilmore, in the month of February of that year called at the office of Harrison J. De Vere, manager of the office at San Jose of Aftergood & Co., for the purpose of purchasing corporate securities. On that occasion she purchased through Mr. De Vere ten shares of Studebaker at $95 a share; ten shares of American Tobacco at $131; ten shares of Telephone at $118; ten shares of Allis Chalmers at $45; and ten shares of Texas Oil at something like $30. As stated, she bought the stocks on margin, and at the time of the purchase she was told by Mr. De Vere that it was necessary for her to furnish collateral. As she did not understand the meaning of the expression collateral, she inquired of Mr. De Vere, and he informed her that she could put up other stock which Aftergood & Co. would deposit in the bank, borrow money on it, and with the money so borrowed would purchase the other stock. In accordance with that statement, in Feb-

February the prosecuting witness delivered as collateral to Mr. De Vere a certificate representing Pacific Gas & Electric stock.

On the 6th day of March, 1922, Miss Gilmore again called on Mr. De Vere to purchase other stocks. After having made the purchase at that time she delivered to him certificate No. 447, of which she was the owner, representing four shares of the capital stock of Reid Bros., a corporation. Mr. De Vere said he would forward the certificate No. 447 to Aftergood & Co., who would hold the certificate as collateral, and thereupon he gave Miss Gilmore a written receipt for the certificate. After that date Aftergood & Co. did not call on Miss Gilmore for any further security, neither did she ever receive back her certificate representing the Reid Bros. stock, nor the certificate representing the Pacific Gas & Electric stock. She testified that she had never received any stock from Aftergood & Co., or anything at all. In her conversations with Mr. De Vere he told her that Aftergood & Co. would transact the business, and that, when Miss Gilmore came to close out the deal, if there was anything left out of the Reid Bros. stock she would receive the amount. He also stated to the witness that if the stock purchased on margin went down that the witness stood in danger of losing her collateral. From the time she purchased until the date of the trial the witness stated that the stock which she had so purchased on margin did not fall in price, but increased in price. As she delivered her certificates to Mr. De Vere she signed the certificate of transfer on the back of the certificate. She so signed certificate No. 447. Mr. De Vere was called as a witness by the prosecution and confirmed the several statements made by Miss Gilmore. Furthermore, he testified that when he received the certificates from Miss Gilmore he mailed them to Aftergood & Co.

Charles J. Blumenthal was then called by the prosecution and testified that he was a stock broker and that on the 10th day of March, 1922, he bought from the defendant, E. L. Lorden, four shares of Reid Bros. stock at a price in the neighborhood of $85 per share, that the stock so purchased was evidenced by certificate No. 447, and that he paid the defendant by check.

On December 4, 1922, when Mr. De Vere was on the stand as a witness, the district attorney asked him the following questions, and he made the following answers:

"Q. Calling your attention to the months of February and March of the present year, what was your occupation at that time? A. I was managing a brokerage office of Aftergood & Company in San Jose.

"Q. Do you know the defendant in this action? A. I do.

"Q. And what connection, if any, did the defendant have with Aftergood & Co., if you know? A. He was a partner in the concern."

[1, 2] The appellant now contends that there is no evidence in the record showing that he was a partner in the firm called Aftergood & Co. The record, as we have quoted it, refutes the contention. The statement made by Mr. De Vere was not adverted to on cross-examination, and was allowed to stand in the record for its full value. If the appellant considered that the witness was giving incompetent testimony, or that he was stating his conclusion, an objection should have been made in the trial court, or a motion to strike out should have been made. In the absence of an objection, a fact proved by incompetent testimony is beyond attack on appeal. Walberg v. Underwood, 39 Cal. App. 748, 180 Pac. 55, 57; Sanders v. Austin, 180 Cal. 664, 182 Pac. 449. The rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also in criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in the Penal Code.

[3, 4] Miss Gilmore turned her stock over to Mr. De Vere to be by him turned over to Aftergood & Co. to be held by that company for certain purposes only. Mr. De Vere testified that he forwarded the stock to the San Francisco office. As a partner in the firm of Aftergood & Co. the defendant was entitled to the possession of Miss Gilmore's stock to the same extent and no less than any other partner. When, without any authority to do so, he took the stock into his possession and make an unauthorized sale thereof, and kept the proceeds from the rightful owner of the stock, it may not be said that the verdict was against the evidence, or contrary to the law. Over the objection and exception of the defendant, the trial court received in evidence testimony of and concerning similar acts and transactions of the appellant committed at about the same time. The court did not commit any error in receiving such testimony. People v. Sindici, 54 Cal. App. 193, 201 Pac. 975. One of the similar acts was the sale by the defendant to Pinckard, Shaughnessy & Anderson on February 20, 1922, of the shares of stock in the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, which Miss Gilmore transmitted through Mr. De Vere a few days previously. Another was a sale of stock owned by Minnie Moeslein, and another one was a sale of stock owned by Harriet S. Cochran. The testimony was admissible, notwithstanding that some of the stock so embezzled was not owned by Miss Gilmore. The appellant argues that before such evidence is admissible for the purpose of proving intent it must first be made to appear that the offense for which the defendant is on trial has been proved. The answer is that in the instant case such showing had been made.

The trial court gave to the jury certain instructions regarding the law of partnerships. The appellant does not contend that they did not correctly state the law, but does contend that they were not relevant to any evidence that had been introduced. For the purpose of this decision, it may be conceded that the instructions were not pertinent to the evidence introduced, but it is patent that there was nothing in any one of the instructions that was prejudicial to the defendant.

When the prosecution rested its case the defendant also rested its case without introducing any testimony. Thereafter the case was argued, and the court instructed the jury. The defendant requested the court to give two instructions which were refused, and the refusal is now assigned as error. The purport of each instruction was to advise the jury to acquit the defendant. The trial court did not err in refusing each of the instructions.

The last point made by the appellant is that the trial court erred in denying the appellant a new trial because "the verdict is contrary to law or evidence." The verdict was not contrary to law, nor was it contrary to the evidence. The motion was properly denied.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RALPHS et al. v. OBERFELD. (Civ. 4417.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 20, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 16, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 938(2)—Bill of exceptions presumed to have been engrossed and settled within required time.

Where bill of exceptions was not settled within the 10 days provided therefor by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, nor within the time extended by stipulations of the parties or by order of the court referred to in the certificate, but the certificate did not negative the fact that an additional extension of time was obtained, it will be presumed that the bill was settled and engrossed within time extended by stipulation of parties or order of the court obtained in due time, in view of section 1963, creating the presumption that an act of a court was regularly performed within the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction.

2. Guaranty $\hookrightarrow$ 25(3)—Evidence held not to prove renewal of contract between principal and creditor.

In an action on written guaranty of the performance by sales agents of their contract, evidence held insufficient to prove renewal of the guaranty contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Isaac Ralphs, William J. Pugh, W. W. Woodd, and Irvin Holmes, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Ralphs-Pugh Company, against Bertha Oberfeld. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jesse H. Mills, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank A. Duryea, of Marysville, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. In this action the plaintiffs sought to recover judgment against the defendant on a written guaranty. The defendant answered, and thereafter a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs, and awarded the plaintiffs a judgment, and the defendant has appealed, bringing up a bill of exceptions.

[1] The respondents have interposed a preliminary objection, which must be disposed of at this time. The respondents objected to the use of the bill of exceptions by the appellant and to the consideration of the bill by this court. The objection is based on the contention that, after the bill had been settled, it was not engrossed and presented for settlement within the time allowed by law. To support their objection the respondents presented for our consideration the certificate settling the bill. That certificate is as follows:

"The foregoing engrossed bill of exceptions is hereby settled and allowed this 28th day of July, 1922, subject to the objection of counsel for plaintiffs that the same was not engrossed and presented for certification within the time allowed by law after settlement of proposed bill; said proposed bill having been settled on December 17, 1921, 10 days' extension of time to engross and present having been given by stipulation of counsel on December 27, 1921, 10 days' further extension having been given by order of court on January 6, 1922; the bill not having been engrossed and presented within said last extension; and the court having made and filed its order on January 17, 1922, without notice to or consent of counsel for plaintiff, allowing defendant to January 27, 1922, to engross and present said bill, and said engrossed bill having been delivered to the attorney for plaintiffs for his stipulation as to the correctness of the engrossment on January 27, 1922."

It will be noted that the certificate recites that the bill was settled December 17, 1921. It will be borne in mind that the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 650) gave the appellant 10 days in which to engross and present the bill for signature. That would carry the time to December 27th. Later counsel by stipulation extended the time 10 days. That would carry until January 6, 1922. The certificate does not negative the fact that counsel for respondents did not give an additional extension.

sion, nor does it negative the fact that the court did not make an additional order extending the time from January 6 to January 17, 1922. Continuing, the certificate affirmatively shows that on January 17th the court made an order extending the time to January 27, 1922, and on the date last mentioned the said engrossed bill was delivered to the attorney for the plaintiffs for his certificate as to the correctness of the engrossment. The trial judge certified the bill on July 28, 1922. It is presumed as a matter of law that his act in doing so was regularly performed and was within the lawful exercise of his jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. In support of the certificate of the trial judge we must presume, in the absence of any other showing, that a further stipulation was obtained in due time, or an additional order was obtained in due time, regularly extending the period for engrossment from January 6th to January 17, 1922. No other objection being made thereto, the bill of exceptions may properly be considered as a part of the record in this case.

The appellant's son, Albert O. Oberfeld, and Joseph Duarte were about to engage in the business of handling automobile accessories, and were negotiating with the plaintiffs to act as sales agents of the plaintiffs. The contract between the principals and agents having been arranged before the delivery thereof, the appellant was induced to execute a guarantee in writing as follows:

"Whereas, an agreement bearing date of March 16, 1915, has been made and entered into between Isaac Ralphs, William J. Pugh, W. W. Woodd, and Grayce Holmes, doing business under the name of Ralphs-Pugh Company, as the party of the first part, and Albert O. Oberfeld and Joseph Duarte, the parties of the second part, wherein the said parties of the second part are to act as sales agents for certain tires and tubing:

"Now, therefore, I, Bertha Oberfeld, hereby guarantee the payment for all such tires and tubings sold by the said first party to the second parties under said agreement up to the amount of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00).

"Dated San Francisco, California, March 20th, 1915. Bertha Oberfeld."

[2] The paper having been executed, the principals and agents commenced to transact business. The second paragraph of the contract between the principals and agents stated its term to be "for a period of one year commencing March 20, 1915, and ending March 20, 1916. * * *" But the respondents alleged, and the court found, that the contract between the principals and the agents contained a covenant as follows:

"Renewal: In the event party of the second part shows sufficient volume to warrant extension of this contract for one year from date of expiration of present contract, party of the first part agrees to extend contract on above terms and conditions."

The trial court also found:

"And at the expiration of said one year mentioned in said contract, on or about the 20th day of March, 1916, plaintiffs extended said contract another year from and after said March 20, 1916, upon the same terms and conditions, pursuant to the provisions in said contract relating to such extension. * * *"

The unpaid bills for which the plaintiffs sought to recover in this action were deliveries made subsequent to March 20, 1916. The matter of the extension, or nonextension, of the one-year term was therefore most material to a correct determination of the rights of the parties. The appellant claims that there is no evidence sustaining the finding quoted above to the effect that the term of the principal contract was extended. We think this claim is well founded. The bill of exceptions contains no writing of any kind or nature extending the contract between the principals and agents. The only evidence on the subject of extension was as follows:

Mr. Ralphs, one of the plaintiffs, testified:

"All the goods sold by us to Oberfeld & Duarte from March 20, 1915, to March 20, 1916, were paid for in full. After March 20, 1916, I do not remember ever having any conversation whatsoever with Mr. Oberfeld, or Oberfeld & Duarte, in regard to the continuance of this agreement, and after the expiration of the year, to wit, March 20, 1916, we continued selling goods to Oberfeld & Duarte. * * * After the 20th day of March, 1916, and after the contract had been in existence for one year, we took no steps to renew this contract, because we believed the terms of the contract covered the continuance for the next year."

On the trial of the case a stipulation was read which contained the following paragraph IV:

"That plaintiffs did not at the time of the expiration of the period provided for in said Exhibit A (contract between principals and agents), or at any other time or at all give to defendant any notice either written or verbal, that they had extended plaintiffs' Exhibit A for the second year, or for any other time, and that defendant did not know and was never informed of any extension of plaintiff's Exhibit A, and that she did not give her consent thereto."

Counsel for appellant and counsel for respondents have presented to the court very learned arguments as to when, in what manner, and with what effect the debtor and creditor may extend the principal contract without affecting the rights of the guarantor. In view of the facts contained in the present record, we do not find ourselves called upon to go into those matters. It is sufficient to say that the contract between the principals and agents in the instant case was never extended. It manifestly appears that after March 20, 1916, the respondents sold and delivered goods to their former agents, but such sales were not made under the contract March 20, 1915, to March 20, 1916.

The finding to the effect that said contract was extended is not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. SINGH. (Cr. 692.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 7, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1923.)

1. Sodomy $\S$ 1—Instruction that sexual penetration, however slight, was sufficient to complete crime, not error.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature an instruction that any sexual penetration, however slight, is sufficient to complete the crime, and that evidence of emission is not necessary, was not error, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 287.

2. Sodomy $\S$ 5—Proof of commission on or about time alleged in information held sufficient.

Under information charging the infamous crime against nature as of date December 6, 1922, it was not error to instruct that it was not necessary to prove the offense as of the date alleged, but proof thereof at any time on or about that date and within three years of the filing of the information was sufficient.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 822(12).—Instruction that victim of infamous crime against nature, in absence of proof of knowledge of wrongfulness, could not be deemed accomplice, not invasive of jury's province.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, the victim being a 9 year old boy, where there was an instruction that it was for the jury to determine whether the boy was an accomplice, a further instruction that, in absence of clear proof that at the time of committing the act constituting the crime he knew its wrongfulness, a child under the age of 14 years is presumed incapable of committing a crime, and cannot therefore be deemed an accomplice, when considered with instruction given, was not invasive of the jury's province.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 814(12).—Question of good character, in prosecution for infamous crime against nature, held not applicable.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, where there was no proof of defendant's good character, the rule as to good character had no application, and refusal of instruction thereon was not error.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 370(1).—Refusing evidence of ill feeling of complaining witness, not called as witness, nor complaint introduced in evidence, held not error.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, where the father of the 9 year old boy victim swore to the complaint, but was not called as a witness, nor the complaint introduced in evidence, there was no error in refusing to permit defendant to show the ill feeling of the father toward him, citing Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 2049, 2052.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(1).—Admission of details of complaint of boy subject of sodomy held harmless, if error.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, committed upon a boy, it was harmless, if error, to permit mother of boy to testify to details of child's complaint concerning defendant's crime.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Carter Singh was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Ebert, of Marysville (W. E. Davies, of Marysville, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellant was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The victim of the assault was a boy of the age of 9 years, and his story as recited on the witness stand discloses every fact material to a conviction. We cannot say that his testimony is inherently improbable, or that the jury was not justified in according it full credit. It would do no good to set out the testimony, or to comment further upon it, and while it is true that there was a sharp conflict in the evidence, the case was properly one for the jury to determine, and we have no right to substitute our judgment for theirs as to the facts.

"Any sexual penetration, however slight, is sufficient to complete the crime against nature. Evidence of emission is not necessary."

The criticism of appellant is directed particularly to the last sentence in said instruction. The first sentence is in the exact language of section 287 of the Penal Code and is a part of the definition of the crime. It must be read in connection with the preceding section, and as thus construed it reveals all the elements sufficient to constitute the crime, and necessarily removes by implication from the prosecution the burden of proving the circumstance mentioned in the concluding portion of the instruction. In People v. Hodgkin, 94 Mich. 27, 53 N. W. 794, 34 Am. St. Rep. 321, cited by appellant, the Supreme Court of Michigan based the decision upon the ground that the statute dispensing with the necessity for such proof had been repealed, and that therefore the common law was in effect, which required such showing.

[2] The court did not err in instructing the jury that:

"It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove the commission of the offense on that date (December 6, 1922), but proof of its commission at any time on or about that date and within 3 years of the filing of the Information is sufficient."

There was no evidence or claim of more than one offense and hence the authorities cited by appellant are not in point. In People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323, many acts were committed, and it was held that the main charge could not be dispensed with by giving such an instruction, but that it should have been selected and notified to the defendant at the commencement of the trial, as the offense upon which the prosecution intended to rely.

People v. Elgar, 36 Cal. App. 114, 171 Pac. 697, involved a similar situation. Herein no such confusion or injustice could result from the instruction. It was given for the reason that the boy was not certain of the exact date of the commission of the offense, but it is apparent, from his and other testimony, that it was on the date mentioned, or within a very few days of it.

Appellant complains of instruction No. 7 as to reasonable doubt. He says that a similar instruction was criticized by this court in People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 100 Pac. 887, and People v. Tomasovich (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 119. Such is the case, and we think there is merit in the criticism; but in each instance it was held that the fault was not such as to demand a reversal of the judgment, and we adhere to that view.

[3] The court instructed the jury that it was for them to determine whether the complaining witness was an accomplice, but appellant contends that the court virtually withdrew the question from the jury by giving this instruction:

"In the absence of clear proof that at the time of committing the act constituting the crime he knew its wrongfulness, a child under the age of 14 years is presumed incapable of committing a crime, and cannot therefore be deemed an accomplice."

The only comment upon the instruction by appellant is as follows:

"While this instruction follows section 26 of the Penal Code, the addition of the words 'and cannot therefore be deemed an accomplice' had the effect of taking from the jury the very question which the court in instruction No. 10 advised them they had to pass upon."

We think appellant has misconstrued said instruction. If the court had unqualifiedly instructed them that the prosecuting witness could not be deemed an accomplice, the criticism would be just, as there would have been a clear invasion of the province of the jury.

But the instruction must be considered as a whole, and, while not very happily expressed, the reasonable construction is that, unless clearly shown that the prosecuting witness understood the wrongfulness of the act, where he is under the age of 14 years, the presumption is that he is incapable of committing a crime and therefore cannot be an accomplice in its commission. Manifestly, if incapable of committing it, he cannot be an accomplice. To say, therefore, that in the absence of such proof he is presumed to be incapable of committing crime is tantamount to saying that he is presumed not to be an accomplice. It still left it for the jury to determine whether this presumption was overcome by the evidence. We do not understand appellant as questioning the competency of the Legislature to prescribe such rule of evidence as is presented in said section 26 of the Penal Code. For further discussion of the principle we may refer to People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 143, 127 Pac. 1031, People v. Camp, 26 Cal. App. 385, 147 Pac. 95, and People v. Kanngiesser, 44 Cal. App. 345, 186 Pac. 388.

[4] Appellant next complains of the refusal of the court to give his proposed instruction:

"I instruct you that evidence of good character is evidence relevant to the question of guilty or not guilty, and is to be considered by you in connection with the other facts and circumstances in the case. * * * The good character of the defendant, when proven, is itself a fact in the case; it is a circumstance tending, in a greater or less degree, to establish his innocence; and it is not to be put aside by the jury in order to ascertain if the other facts and circumstances considered in themselves do not establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

The rule itself is well established (People v. Ashe, 44 Cal. 288), but it had no application to the case, since there was no such proof. Appellant, indeed, asked a certain witness this question, "Do you know what his reputation for truth, honesty and integrity is?" but the court held that the evidence must be confined to the traits involved in the accusation, stating to the defendant that he would be permitted to show his general reputation "for the elements involved in the charge," but appellant declined to follow the suggestion of the court, and in fact withdrew the question. The ruling was clearly right, since the reputation of the defendant for "truth, honesty, and integrity" had not been assailed by the prosecution.

[5] It is claimed that "the court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to show the interest and ill feeling of the father of the boy toward the defendant. It appears that the complaint was sworn to by the boy's father, and it was proper for the defendant to show that the complaining witness was biased and prejudiced against defendant. People v. Bird, 124 Cal. 32, 56 Pac. 639; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2049, 2052." But the father was not called as a witness for the people, nor was said complaint introduced in evidence. We do not understand that a defendant may call a person as a witness simply for the purpose of discrediting him. The purpose of such showing is to weaken the effect of the testimony which the witness has given in favor of the adverse party. If he has not testified, there is, of course, no ground or reason for any impeachment. In the Bird Case the prosecuting witness, Griffith, had testified against the defendant, and it was sought to show his bias and hostility; but the lower court would not permit it. Said sections of the Code also refer to the impeachment of a witness who has given adverse testimony at the trial.

[6] Another objection of appellant is that "the court erred in permitting the mother of the boy to state the details of the boy's complaint." She was asked, "What did Lloyd say to you at the time?" and she answered, "He complained all the time of running off at the bowels, he couldn't hold passages, and I asked him what was the matter, 'Did you get hurt?' and he said, 'Yes,' one of the children at school kicked him. And on Friday evening he came home from school and looked awful pale, and crying, and went to the toilet, and I went out and asked him what was the matter and said, 'I will have to take you to the doctor to-night,' and he cried and told me Carter Singh did this, that Carter Singh 'corn-holed him.'" There was no motion to strike out any portion of the answer, although a general objection was made to the question.

In People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 554, 47 Pac. 41, it is said:

"There was no error in overruling defendant's objection to the question propounded to Mrs. Boone, the child's mother, as to whether, shortly after the date of the alleged offense, the child made any complaint to her about any injuries she had received from defendant. * * * In cases of this kind the prosecution is always permitted to prove that the injured party made complaint of the injury while it was recent."

In People v. Figueroa, 134 Cal. 159, 66 Pac. 202, it was held proper to ask the mother concerning the child the following question:

"Now, when you got here to the house, did she make any complaint about what had happened?"

The Supreme Court, however, took occasion to say:

"Of course, any narrative of the child as to what the defendant did would not be admissible."

This latter statement is, no doubt, in accordance with the generally recognized rule, and ordinarily the form of the question should be as suggested without calling for the conversation. But herein the boy had previously testified on direct examination in response to a proper question that he had made complaint to his mother. In the cross-examination, in an effort to discredit his testimony, appellant required him to state just what he had said to his mother. He did so in the language which we have already quoted from his mother's testimony. Under such circumstances, it was probably permissible, according to the authorities, to allow the mother to confirm what he had said. At any rate, in view of the boy's testimony, it is reasonable to hold that the error, if any, was without prejudice. It is almost inconceivable, indeed, that, if the mother had simply stated that he complained of his treatment by the defendant, that the verdict would have been different. The effect upon the jury would have been the same.

We have given careful attention to the earnest contention of appellant that he has been grievously wronged by the action of the jury and the trial judge, but we cannot assume the responsibility that belongs to them. Finding substantial evidence to support the verdict and judgment, and believing that no prejudicial error was committed, we must leave the conclusion undisturbed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re SOWASH'S ESTATE. (Civ. 4539.)

1. Wills ⚡502—"Relation" under statutes preventing lapse of estates devised to children or relation dying before testator defined.

The word "relation" is very general and comprehensive and may include, in its generic sense, every relation arising in social life, including relationship by affinity as well as blood; but in determining whether a wife is a "relative" under statutes, such as Civ. Code, § 1310, preventing lapse of estates devised to children "or other relation" dying before testator, the term includes only relationship by blood.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Relation—Relative.]

2. Wills ⚡552(3)—Devise to wife fails on her death before testator, though she leaves lineal descendants by former marriage, in absence of substitutionary intent.

Under Civ. Code, § 1343, a testamentary disposition to testator's wife fails on her death before testator, where no intention appears to substitute another in her place, though she leaves lineal descendants by a former marriage; relationship by marriage not being contemplated by section 1310, providing that descendants of a child or "other relation," to whom an estate is devised, shall take it on devisee's death before that of testator, while section 1334, vesting it in deceased's heirs at law according to the law of succession, when words of donation and not of limitation are used, does not apply, so as to include any one who would succeed to testator's estate had he died intestate within the term "relation."

3. Wills ⚭440—Testator's intent must be ascertained from will as written notwithstanding subsequent changes in conditions.

The rule that testator's intent must be carried out, if possible, does not authorize courts to make a new will conforming to what they think was his intent, which must be ascertained from the will as it stands notwithstanding changes in conditions after its execution.

4. Wills ⚭555(1)—Testamentary disposition to wife with request to devise to her and testator's children by former marriages held to have failed on wife's death before testator.

Under a will devising all of testator's property to his wife with a request that she make a will dividing it between her and his children by former marriages, the devise to her failed on her death before testator; the will showing no intent to substitute others for her in such event.

5. Wills ⚭675—Devise to wife with request to devise to her and testator's children by former marriages held not impressed with precatory trust.

A devise of all of testator's property to his wife with a request that she make a will dividing it between her and testator's children by former marriages held not impressed with a precatory trust not terminated by the wife's death before that of testator.

6. Wills ⚭675—Pecatory words in will do not create trust unless testator intended imperative obligation.

Pecatory words in a will do not create a trust unless testator intended to impose an imperative obligation and exclude the exercise of discretion by the person to whom they are addressed.

7. Wills ⚭675—Whether trust is created by precatory words depends on court's impression as to maker's intention.

Whether a trust is created by precatory words depends on the court's impression as to the maker's intention, considering the will itself with the circumstances surrounding its execution.

8. Wills ⚭601(8)—Expression of testator's desire to legatee or devisee not limitation on estate expressly vested in absolute terms.

An expression of testator's desire for the disposition of his estate is considered imperative when addressed to his executor, but expression of wish addressed to a legatee or devisee is not construed as a limitation on an estate or interest expressly vested in him in absolute terms; a clear and distinct devise or bequest not being affected by other words not equally clear and distinct or by inference from other parts of the will.

9. Husband and wife ⚭276(1)—On death of wife community estate vested in husband without administration.

Where a testamentary disposition of community property to testator's wife failed by reason of her death before his, the estate vested in him without administration, and his heirs, on his death, were entitled to distribution in conformity with Civ. Code, § 1336, subsec. 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Jacob M. Sowash, deceased. From a decree construing decedent's will, two children of deceased's wife by a former marriage appeal. Affirmed.

J. H. G. Weaver and Puter & Quinn, all of Eureka, for appellants.

Pierce H. Ryan and A. G. Bradford, both of Eureka, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This appeal involves the construction to be given to the will of one Jacob M. Sowash, deceased. The instrument is dated February 8, 1916, and at the time of his death which occurred December 6, 1919, Sowash was a resident of the county of Humboldt. He was possessed of certain real and personal property. He had been twice married. His second wife, Augusta M. Sowash, predeceased him, she having died March 26, 1919. Sowash was her second husband. The property here involved constitutes community property acquired by deceased and his wife Augusta. The will mentions three groups of children, namely, the children of deceased by his first wife, the children of Augusta M. Sowash by her former husband, and the children of deceased by his wife Augusta. The proper construction to be given to the second paragraph of the instrument is the subject of this appeal. It reads as follows:

"Second. I give, devise and bequeath all the property, whether in expectancy or possession, whereof I shall die possessed, or to which I may be entitled to my dear and beloved wife, with this my dying request to her: that she make a will before, or, at least, immediately upon my death, devising and bequeathing all the property she shall receive from me or my estate upon the final settlement of my estate by final decree of distribution or otherwise (not necessarily in kind but in amount or value) other than so much thereof as shall have been expended by her and for her during her life time for her comfort, maintenance and support, to the following persons, to wit, the one half thereof to my wife's children, to wit, Hazel Sowash, Ethel Maud Sowash, Hattie Long, Benjamin Doffner, and Lottie Stebbins, share and share alike; and the other half to be given to my children, to wit: Hazel Sowash, Ethel Maud Riley, George Sowash, Frank Sowash, Ida Devault, Alice May, Jacob Sowash, share and share alike. I make this request because all the property we have has been accumulated by us jointly as husband and wife, and is as much hers as mine; and it is just and right that upon our deaths the one half of it should go to her children and the other half to my children, and we have mutually agreed that it shall be so divided; and the terms of this will and my request herein expressed have also been mutually agreed upon by myself and wife."

Under the construction adopted by the trial court the entire property of the estate was distributed to the children of the deceased by his first and second marriages to the exclusion of the children of his wife Augusta by her former marriage, the court concluding that as Augusta had predeceased the testator the testamentary disposition as to her had lapsed, and that, therefore, the entire estate went to the heirs at law of deceased. This is an appeal from the decree and is prosecuted by two of the children of Augusta by her former marriage.

It is their contention that it was the intention of the testator, as clearly expressed by his will, that upon the death of both himself and his wife the estate was to be divided equally between his children and his wife's children in the proportion of one half to his children by his first and second marriages, the other half to the children of his wife Augusta by her first marriage and to her children by her second marriage with deceased, and that this manifest intention must be carried out, and courts have no power to change it.

It is further contended that the devise in the will to Augusta A. Sowash was impressed with a precatory trust, by reason of which, had she survived the testator, she would have taken all the property devised to her, less that expended in her lifetime for her comfort and support, in trust for the persons to whom the will requests her to devise it, and that the trust was not terminated by her death.

Respondents' answer to the first contention is that the wife, having predeceased the testator, the disposition to her failed, and the entire estate was properly distributed to the heirs of Sowash.

The Code sections upon the subject in force at the time of the testator's death provide as follows: If a devisee or legatee dies during the lifetime of the testator, the testamentary disposition to him fails, unless an intention appears to substitute some other person in his place, except as limited by section 1310 of the Civil Code. Section 1343, Civ. Code. Section 1310 declares that whenever any estate is devised or bequeathed to any child, or other relation of the testator, and the devisee or legatee dies before the testator, leaving lineal descendants, such descendants take the estate so given by the will in the same manner as the devisee or legatee would have done had he survived the testator.

There is no express intention in the will to substitute others in place of the wife in the event that she predeceased her husband, a subject hereinafter discussed; and unless it can be said that the wife is a relation of the husband within the meaning of section 1310 of the Civil Code the disposition as to her failed, and the estate was properly distributed to the heirs of the husband, the testator having survived the wife.

[1] Appellants' first contention involves the meaning of the term "relation" as applied to the construction of wills.

The word is a very general and comprehensive term, and may include in its generic sense every relation that arises in social life. Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 36, 3 Am. Rep. 320. Lexicographers have defined it as signifying a relation in general so as to include relationship by blood or affinity. In its widest sense, therefore, the word no doubt has this meaning. But in the construction of wills, when courts have been called upon to determine whether a wife is a "relative" under statutes preventing lapse, they have by a uniform course of decisions held that the term includes only relationship by blood, and that a husband, therefore, is not a relative of his wife, nor a wife a relative of her husband. Renton's Estate, 10 Wash. 533, 39 Pac. 145; Supreme Council v. Bennett, 47 N. J. Eq. 39, 19 Atl. 785; Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 36, 3 Am. Rep. 320. The reason for the rule is stated in Renton's Estate, supra, to be that upon a devise to a child or other relative by consanguinity it would be naturally supposed that a testator would intend that his property, upon the death of the devisee before his own, should inure to the benefit of the lineal descendants of his devisee, because such descendants would in fact be his relatives for whose welfare he might be supposed to have a concern, only differing in degree from that which he would feel towards the devisee himself. But in the case of a wife, although a husband might acquire a great affection for her children by a former husband, yet this solicitude would not stop with such children, and the husband's whole estate devised by will to his wife might upon his death descend to utter strangers to him, to the exclusion of those who might be the natural objects of his bounty. See Estate of Pfuell, 48 Cal. 643.

[2] The claim that the devise has not lapsed by reason of the saving clause in section 1310 cannot, therefore, in our opinion be maintained as such statute applies against a lapse only where the beneficiary is a relation of the testator, and relationship by marriage is not contemplated within the meaning of the section.

Nor is this situation altered or in any way affected by section 1334 of the same Code. Appellant presents the argument in this connection that the term "relation" as used in section 1310 is broad enough to include the meaning given to it under section 1334, which, he contends, includes any person who would succeed to the estate of a testator had he died intestate.

The latter section does not apply to the situation under consideration. As pointed out by respondent, the section is but a general rule dealing with the subject of the interpretation of wills, providing, as it does, that testamentary dispositions to the class of persons enumerated therein, when the words used are words of donation and not of limitation, vests the property in the heirs at law of a deceased according to the provisions of the Code relating to succession. The manifest object of this section is to give a definite meaning to the different words employed in the statute, which have received various constructions in the different jurisdictions when unaided by statute. As suggested by counsel for respondents, if the testator had made a devise to "my relations" instead of to "my wife," then resort might be had to the section to determine the meaning of the term. The use of the term in the will here under construction did not therefore create a substituted devise. Farnsworth v. Whitney, 102 Me. 296, 66 Atl. 831; Curley v. Lynch, 206 Mass. 289, 92 N. E. 429.

[3, 4] Nor does the will, as claimed, show any intent on the part of the testator to make a substitution to others in the event that his wife predeceased him. Of course, if such an intent appeared it would control, and, if legal, be given full effect. Estate of Goetz, 13 Cal. App. 292, 109 Pac. 492; Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 106 Pac. 230, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110; Smith v. Secor, 157 N. Y. 402, 52 N. E. 179. Here there is absolutely nothing in the will that can possibly justify the claim that such intention does appear. The instrument is silent upon the possibility of the wife predeceasing the testator. If he had contemplated a substitutional gift over he should have made such intention clearly appear. Estate of Sutro, 139 Cal. 87, 72 Pac. 827.

It must therefore be held that the will was made in view of existing conditions at the time of its execution. Here Sowash gave his estate to his wife, and the fact that he made no provision in the event that she predeceased him shows that he did not anticipate this contingency. What his intent may or may not have been after this condition was changed by the death of his wife we have no means of knowing, except from the fact that he allowed the will to stand as originally executed. We are limited in our powers to an interpretation of the will as we find it. The rule of construction that the intent of the testator must be carried out if possible does not authorize courts to make a new will to conform to what they may think the testator intended. The intent of the testator must be ascertained from the will as it stands. Estate of Hittel, 141 Cal. 436, 75 Pac. 53.

Upon this question, therefore, we conclude that there was no substitution, and that the wife, having predeceased the husband, and she not being a relation of his within the meaning of section 1310 of the Civil Code, the testamentary disposition as to her lapsed and failed.

[5] Nor do we think that the devise to the wife was in any manner impressed with a precatory trust.

In this connection it is contended by appellants that by reason of the requests contained in the will a trust was created, under which the wife, had she survived the testator, would have taken all of the property devised to her (less what might be expended for her comfort and support during her lifetime) in trust for the persons to whom the will requests her to devise it, and that such trust was not terminated by her death prior to that of the testator.

Respondents advance two arguments against this contention. They claim:

First, that the chief essential of a precatory trust does not exist, as the words employed in the will are recommendatory in nature and import no trust or charge, and cannot therefore be construed as imperative.

Second, it is further argued that the subject or res of the supposed trust being merely the property devised "other than so much as shall have been expended for herself during her lifetime for her comfort, maintenance and support," is too uncertain and indefinite to be made the basis of an enforceable trust.

[6-8] Upon the question as to what words are sufficient to create precatory trusts the decisions of our own state are controlling. As is said in the Estate of Browne, 175 Cal. 361, 165 Pac. 960, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it is here settled that precatory words are not to be regarded as creating a trust unless it appear that the testator intended to impose an imperative obligation and to exclude the exercise of discretion on the part of the person to whom the recommendatory words are addressed, citing Estate of Purcell, 167 Cal. 176, 138 Pac. 704; Estate of Mitchell, 160 Cal. 618, 117 Pac. 774; Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071; Kauffman v. Gries, 141 Cal. 295, 74 Pac. 846. In the determination of this question our Supreme Court, in Estate of Hamilton, 181 Cal. 758, 186 Pac. 587, has declared that the construction to be placed upon one instrument is of little value as a precedent in aid of the construction of another. And this is particularly true of cases involving the existence or nonexistence of a precatory trust, for previous decisions only serve to illustrate the application of general rules of construction of wills, which, after all, is a matter of impression as to the maker's intention made upon the mind of a court considering the will itself with the circumstances surrounding its execution. Each case must of necessity, therefore, depend more or less upon its own peculiar facts. While in the case last cited the court deemed certain words used in connection with the will under consideration as being sufficient to create a precatory trust, there is nothing contained in the decision which conflicts in any manner with the doctrine expressed in the Marti Case, supra, which establishes the rules of interpretation to be observed in the construction of language used in this connection, and these rules have not been departed from in subsequent cases. It is there pointed out that precatory words may or may not create a trust according to the circumstances of the particular case. They are not to be regarded as creating a trust unless it appears that the testator intended to impose an imperative obligation, and to exclude the exercise of discretion or option in reference to the act in question. The expression of the desire of the testator for the disposition of his estate is one to be considered as imperative when addressed to his executor, but a mere independent expression of desire addressed to the legatee or devisee is not to be construed as a limitation upon an estate or interest expressly vested in the legatee in absolute terms. A clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any other words not equally clear and distinct or by inference from other parts of the will. Accordingly, the ordinary use of the word "desire" does not import a trust or charge as addressed to a legatee or devisee. An expression of "desire" that the one to whom a present bequest is made shall make a testamentary disposition falls short of a command or direction, and is in the nature of a mere expression of the testator's feeling, and a suggestion or recommendation or reason to be considered by the legatee or devisee in making a testamentary disposition. See, also, Estate of Mitchell, 160 Cal. 618, 117 Pac. 774; Estate of Purcell, 167 Cal. 176, 138 Pac. 704.

Unless, therefore, the case compels a different construction, a mere recommendation or request is not sufficient to create a precatory trust.

Nor can it be here said that the reason given for the devise to the wife in any manner changes the situation, for, as above stated, a clear and distinct devise is not affected by recommendations or by any other words not equally clear and distinct. Estate of Granniss, 142 Cal. 1, 75 Pac. 324; Civ. Code, § 1322.

[9] The property being community property in its character and the testamentary disposition to the wife having lapsed and failed by reason of the fact that she predeceased her husband, the estate vested in him without administration, and upon his death his heirs were entitled to have distribution made to them in conformity with subsection 1 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. The trial court rightfully so concluded.

As above suggested, whatever the testator's intention may have been as to the disposition of his estate in the event that his wife predeceased him we have no means of knowing. He had an opportunity of meeting the changed condition by making a new will. This he did not see fit to do, and we cannot make one for him. Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 436, 75 Pac. 53; Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70; Estate of Walkerley, 108 Cal. 656, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97.

This conclusion renders a discussion of the question of the uncertainty and indefiniteness of the trust unnecessary.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

In re THOMPSON'S ESTATE. (Civ. 4519.)

1. Wills ⚡470—Construed as whole and testator's intention given effect.

A will is to be construed according to testator's intention, and in case of any uncertainty arising on its face his intention is to be ascertained from the words thereof, and to that end all of its parts will be construed in relation to each other, so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole, in view of Civ. Code, § 1318 et seq.

2. Wills ⚡538—Alternative gift to another in case of death refers to death during testatrix's lifetime.

A will, which gave a two-thirds interest in an estate to testator's daughter, but provided that, in the event of the daughter's death, testator's brother was to get a two-thirds interest, held to refer to death during testatrix's lifetime.

3. Wills ⚡601(1)—Absolute gift limited by subsequent disposition of remainder.

One provision of a will provided that, if testatrix's daughter survived her, a two-thirds interest should go to her, and another provided that, if the daughter died without issue, the remaining estate should be distributed among named remaindermen. The daughter died without issue shortly after testatrix. Held, in view of the will as a whole, that the daughter secured only a life estate; hence on her death the remaindermen were entitled to the two-thirds interest.

4. Wills ⚡601(1)—General devise limited by clear subsequent disposition of gift over.

A general devise may be limited by a subsequent clear disposition of a gift over of the remainder.

5. Wills ⚡812—Specific lapsed legacy not required to contribute until general funds exhausted.

Where no objection was raised to the payment of a specific legacy, which had lapsed, it should not be required to contribute to a deficiency until after the general funds have been exhausted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Caroline H. Thompson, deceased. From an order approving and settling an executor's account, and from an order of partial distribution, an appeal was taken. Affirmed, as modified.

Charles B. Younger, of Santa Cruz, for appellants.

Alfred W. Hare and Netherton & Johnston, all of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from an order approving and settling an executor's account and from an order of partial distribution. The main question involved is the proper construction to be given to the last will and testament of the deceased. The instrument in question is olographic, and it is dated January 4, 1919. The death of the testatrix occurred September 15, 1919, and the will was admitted to probate October 21, 1919. Certain real estate described therein as the Morris Vineyard tract, and which was sold during the course of administration for the sum of $20,250, forms the major portion of the estate and is the subject-matter of the present controversy. It is the claim of appellant that the trial court adopted a wrong construction of the will, and that respondents were distributed a greater sum than that to which they were entitled. Such portions of the will as are necessary for a proper discussion of the case are as follows:

"1st. I give and devise and bequeath to my brother Harry H. Penfield should he survive me an undivided one-third interest in lot 21, block C of the Morris Vine Yard Tract in the city of Los Angeles. * * *

"2d. I give and devise and bequeath to my daughter Della Thompson Euans should she survive me the remaining two-thirds interest in the above described real property. In the event of my death Carolyn H. Thompson and of Della Thompson Euans I desire that my brother Harry H. Penfield shall have the two-thirds interest hereinabove given to my daughter Della Thompson Euans. And that the remaining one-third interest shall be divided equally between my life-long friends Annie Adella Dunsmoor Charles F. Dunsmoor and Grace Dunsmoor Hare."

"4th. The rest and residue of my estate

* * * I give and devise and bequeath to my daughter Della Thompson Euans in the event that she survives me. In case of her death before mine own, all property not otherwise bequeathed is to be divided equally between Annie Adella Dunsmoor Charles F. Dunsmoor and Grace D. Hare.

"5th. In the event of the death of my daughter Della Thompson Euans and Harry H. Penfield prior to my own demise I bequeath to my friends Annie Adella Dunsmoor Charles F. Dunsmoor and Grace D. Hare whatever I may die possessed of share and share alike.

"6th. I nominate and appoint Alfred W. Hare and Cassius M. Jay of Los Angeles Cal. executors and trustees of my will without bond for carrying out the terms of this will and I desire that Alfred W. Hare and Cassius M. Jay shall become trustees for such estate as shall by this instrument come to said Della Thompson Euans and they shall make such sales investments as shall in their judgment provide income for the support of said Della Thompson Euans principal and interest to be spent if necessary for such maintenance and support.

"7th. I am desirous that Kenneth Logan Euans husband of Della Thompson Euans, shall not receive one cent of my estate and I require and direct that in the event of my daughter Della Thompson Euans dying without issue such estate as shall remain shall be distributed to Annie Adella Dunsmoor Charles F. Dunsmoor and Grace D. Hare share & share alike if Annie Adella Dunsmoor be still alive. If not to Charles F. Dunsmoor and Grace Dunsmoor Hare, of their heirs.

"8th. In case of my death and that of Della Thompson Euans I devise that the heirs herein mentioned Annie Adella Dunsmoor Charles F. Dunsmoor and Grace Dunsmoor Hare shall out of their undivided one-third interest in lot 21, block C, of Morris Vine Yard Tract of the city of Los Angeles pay to Cassius M. Jay $500 for his faithful friendship and care of my interests."

[1] In construing a will the predominant idea in the testator's mind, if apparent, is heeded as against all doubtful and conflicting provisions which might defeat it. A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator, and in case of any uncertainty arising upon the face of the will as to the application of any of its provisions, the testator's intention is to be ascertained from the words thereof, and to that end all the parts are to be construed in relation to each other so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole. Where, therefore, the meaning of any part of a will is ambiguous or doubtful it may be explained by reference to other parts of the will. Civ. Code, § 1318 et seq. In other words, a will is construed from its four corners.

[2] It is perfectly apparent from a reading of the entire will that it was the intention of the testatrix to make her daughter and her brother the chief objects of her bounty. It is therein provided in the first instance that the daughter is to have a two-thirds interest in the property and the brother a one-third interest, dependent only upon the condition that they survive the testatrix. As she predeceased both of these beneficiaries the condition upon which they were to take occurred and, in the absence of any further qualifications, their estates became absolute. So far as the brother's share is concerned, there was none, so that the interest given to him directly under the will has become vested and it is not involved in this controversy. The daughter Della Thompson Euans died intestate without issue shortly after the death of the testatrix, her death having occurred July 19, 1920.

In construing the will of the mother the trial court concluded that under the seventh clause thereof the daughter had only a qualified interest in the share set apart to her amounting to no more than a life estate and that the testatrix had effectually disposed of the estate in remainder by devising the same to her friends the respondents. Appellant contends that such construction does not conform to the intention of the testatrix as stated in her will; and he further contends that any such attempted distribution of the property is inconsistent with and contrary to the absolute disposition which testatrix made of the same in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the will and is therefore void on the ground of repugnancy. Upon the first proposition it is argued that as the daughter survived the mother she succeeded to two-thirds of the vineyard lot and that this absolute devise was in no manner qualified by the seventh paragraph of the will under which the testatrix provided that in the event of the death of the daughter without issue her interest should go to her friends.

We see no merit in this contention. As pointed out by the respondents, two primary devises are made in the alternative, depending upon the condition as to whether the mother or daughter died first. If the daughter and brother both survive, one-third goes to the brother and two-thirds to the daughter. As this condition happened, both estates became absolute, unless qualified by some secondary provision. The final sentence of the second paragraph makes an alternative complete primary disposition, to become effective in the event that the mother survives the daughter, in which case two-thirds would go to the brother and one-third to the three friends. This event did not happen, and this provision therefore did not become effective, for the reason that it provides for the primary disposition of the property in the event that the daughter predecease the mother.

It is true, as contended by appellant, that this paragraph of the will does not expressly provide for the death of the daughter prior to that of the mother, but it certainly can have no other meaning as hereinafter pointed out. Assuming this to be true, this clause, as above stated, must be eliminated, and the primary devise of one-third to the brother and two-thirds to the daughter is up to this point still effective. By paragraph 6 a secondary provision affecting the situation is found. Trustees are there provided for the property of the estate devised to the daughter, and then in paragraph 7 occurs a final secondary disposition in favor of the respondents of whatever may remain of such property at the death of the daughter if she should die without issue. The language of the alternative disposition contained in the second paragraph of the will in referring to the devise over to take effect in the event of the death of the testatrix and of her daughter, though unlimited as to time, cannot be held to mean death generally whenever it may happen, but rather to death in the lifetime of the testatrix. Civ. Code, § 1336; Estate of Rounds, 180 Cal. 386, 181 Pac. 638.

The instrument in question as a whole is in complete accord and harmony with this rule of construction, and an analysis of its provisions compels the construction given to it by the learned trial court. It will be noticed that the clause in question immediately follows in the same paragraph a disposition to take effect in the event of survival, and it being a disposition to take effect upon death, shows that it was a mere alternative provision, the first relating to survivorship, the second to nonsurvivorship. The language in question, therefore, as above stated, creates an alternative primary disposition of the property, to become effective only in the event that the mother survive the daughter. As this contingency did not happen, the provision becomes inoperative.

This construction finds support in other provisions of the will and carries out the intention of the testatrix. By paragraph 4 the testatrix disposed of the remainder of her estate, the daughter being named the residuary legatee, remainder over to her friends, of all the property of her estate not otherwise bequeathed, to take effect in the event of her daughter predeceasing her. In this event the brother would still have received his two-thirds share of the vineyard lot. Paragraph 5, although inoperative for the reason that the death of both brother and daughter before that of the testatrix is the condition precedent to its effectiveness, throws light upon the intention of the testatrix, for it provides that upon the happening of this contingency the whole estate should go to her friends. It is apparent that the testatrix had in mind under this paragraph the possibility of her daughter and brother both predeceasing her; and unless paragraph 2 is construed as referring to the death of the daughter during the lifetime of the testatrix, this situation is unprovided for. The contingency of the brother's death is taken care of under the residuary clause.

Paragraph 7, under which the remainder of the daughter's inheritance is devised over to respondents in the event of her death with out issue, shows the condition of mind of the testatrix toward her son-in-law, as it is declared therein that he shall not receive one cent of her estate. This paragraph of the will became operative only by reason of the fact that the daughter died without issue after having survived the testatrix, and the amount of the estate in remainder which respondents might receive thereunder would, of course, depend entirely upon the amount expended on behalf of the daughter in her lifetime—an uncertain quantity. This provision further shows that the testatrix had in mind the possibility that the daughter might die leaving a portion of the property devised to her unexpended and that the husband might benefit thereby, a result she wished to thwart. There is no question that she desired to make some provision for respondents, and the remainder, whatever it might amount to, is all they could possibly succeed to in the event that the daughter survived the mother, and it might or might not have been of value, depending upon the extent of the expenditures made on behalf of the daughter, which in turn depended upon the duration of her life.

Paragraph 8 is not operative as the provisions thereof contemplate the possible antecedent death of the daughter, in which event respondents were to receive one-third of the lot in question.

Counsel for the appellant direct our attention to this last provision as supporting his contention that the testatrix was referring in the second paragraph to the death of her daughter at any time, and not in the sense that it was to occur prior to that of the testatrix, and he argues that if his construction is not the correct one then it must follow that the testatrix intended to require her friends to pay $500 out of their devise to her other friend Cassius M. Jay, if they acquired a one-third interest in the property by reason of the fact that the daughter predeceased the mother, but that upon failure of that event they should not be required to pay anything if they succeeded to a two-thirds interest.

As above suggested, if the condition upon which they were to pay this sum of $500 had happened they could have well afforded to do so; but in the event that the daughter survived the mother their remainder would be of uncertain, if any, value—a fact quite apparent to the testatrix. This argument therefore has little force. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the learned trial court properly construed the instrument in question.

[3, 4] This brings us to the second contention of the appellant. In this connection it is claimed that testatrix having made a complete disposition of the property in question by the first two paragraphs of the will, the limitation over is repugnant to this absolute devise, and is therefore inoperative and void. We see no merit in this contention. Here the provisions of the will show a clear intent on the part of the testatrix to bequeath to her daughter a limited estate, for the words creating the same are dispositive, and not precatory, and they require that the remainder provided for shall be distributed to respondents. The law is well established in this case that a general devise may be limited by a subsequent clear disposition of a gift over of the remainder. Estate of Briggs, 186 Cal. 351, 199 Pac. 322; Estate of Tooley, 170 Cal. 164, 149 Pac. 574, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 516; Adams v. Prather, 176 Cal. 33, 167 Pac. 534.

[5] And, finally, appellant objects to that part of the account charging him with a proportion of the expenses of administration. It appears from the record that a considerable sum was received by the executors from the residuum of the estate of testatrix, and also that the account includes the specific legacy to Jay which had lapsed for reasons indicated. No objection seems to be raised by respondents to the payment of this legacy, they no doubt believing that there is a moral if not a legal obligation to pay the same, especially since they have received a greater sum by reason of the early demise of the daughter than they would have received under their specific legacy. However this may be, the specific legacy of appellant should not be required to contribute to any deficiency until after the general funds have been applied to the payment of administration expenses.

The judgment, therefore, should be modified to conform with these views. So modified, it stands affirmed.

SHANKLIN v. SCRIBNER et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California: June 12, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 9, 1923.)

I. Appeal and error §1036(2)—Overruling of demurrer on ground of misjoinder of parties defendant harmless as to defendant indebted to plaintiff for whole amount due.

The overruling of a demurrer, on the ground that there was misjoinder of parties defendant, was harmless as to a defendant who was under legal obligation to pay the whole amount due plaintiff, since the fact that other persons were made defendants could not affect such obligation.

2. Corporations §244(6)—Stockholder's liability applies only to debts contracted while a stockholder.

Under Civ. Code, § 322, making a stockholder liable for a proportionate share of corporation's debts, the fact that person acquires a part or all of the capital stock of a corporation does not make him liable as a stockholder for its past debts, but liability therefor rests upon the person who owned the stock at the time the debts were contracted.

3. Limitation of actions ⚡53(2)—Action held to constitute one on "open book account."

Corporation's account with employee, in which the corporation was charged with employee's salary from month to month, and credited with payments thereon made from time to time, was an open book account, and employee's action thereon was an action on an open book account, notwithstanding that the account was that of the corporation and not of the employee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Open Account.]

4. Limitation of actions ⚡53(2)—Action one on open book account, though books were kept in name of ditches owned by corporation and not name of corporation itself.

An action against a corporation operating certain water ditches was an action on a book account within the statute of limitations, though the accounts were kept in the name of the ditches and not the name of the corporation.

5. Limitation of actions ⚡53(1)—Payment entered upon open book account tolls the statute.

An action on an open book account was not barred by limitation, where the last payment on the account was made within four months of the time of the commencement of the action, since the payment made and entered upon the account tolled the statute.

6. Pleading ⚡237(6)—Action of court in permitting plaintiff to amend to conform to proofs held not error.

Where account book was produced during the trial and the items of the account read therefrom in evidence and clearly showed the amount due the plaintiff, the court did not err in permitting plaintiff to amend his complaint to conform to the proofs, by alleging that the sum sued for was the balance due on an open book account.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by J. W. Shanklin against O. Scribner, C. B. Bills, T. G. Patton, and the Diamond Ridge Water Company. Judgment for plaintiff against first-named and last-named defendants, and such defendants appeal. Reversed as to first-named defendant, and affirmed as to last-named defendant.

J. W. Dorsey and W. E. Cashman, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, and T. A. Farrell, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff was given judgment against defendants Scribner and Diamond Ridge Water Company, and such defendants have appealed.

The third amended complaint, on which the action was tried, alleges that in August, 1911, defendants Scribner, Bills, and Patton "owned and were copartners in the Cosumners water rights and Diamond Ridge water ditches in El Dorado county, Cal., which said water rights and ditches furnished water for irrigation and mining purposes;" that the Diamond Ridge Water Company was incorporated March 5, 1916, and in that month acquired the property described, and has thereafter operated and controlled the same; that in August, 1911, Scribner, Bills, and Patton employed plaintiff as an office employee, and that plaintiff performed services as such from September 1, 1911, to the time when the corporation defendant took over the properties, and that at that time the corporation assumed and promised to pay plaintiff the balance due for his services under such employment by the individual defendants, and has since paid him all, or nearly all, thereof; that at that time the corporation employed plaintiff in the same capacity, and that plaintiff continued in such employment from March 6, 1916, to January 1, 1920; that plaintiff's agreed salary was $150 a month up to January 1, 1912, $50 a month thereafter until January 1, 1918, and $25 a month after that date; and that there remained a balance of $1,738.50 due plaintiff January 1, 1920. The original complaint was filed January 7, 1920, and the third amended complaint was filed June 30, 1920.

Scribner and the corporation demurred to the complaint on the grounds, among others, of misjoinder of parties defendant, misjoinder of causes of action, and that any sum in excess of $600 was barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Their demurrer was overruled, and they thereupon filed separate answers, each denying the existence at any time of the alleged copartnership, the employment of plaintiff, the performance by him of the alleged services, or that defendants were indebted to him, and alleging that he had been fully paid, and pleading the statute of limitations. The corporation filed a counterclaim of $1,125, alleged to be due defendant corporation from plaintiff for office rent.

After the evidence was closed, the court permitted plaintiff to file amendments to his complaint to conform to the evidence, alleging that Scribner "is the sole owner of all of the stock of the defendant corporation"; setting up a second cause of action for $1,738.50 for services performed for defendants at their request; and a third cause of action alleging "that upon the 1st day of January, 1920, the defendants were and now are indebted to the plaintiff upon an open book account for labor and services as an office employee, rendered to defendants by plaintiff at defendants' request, upon which there is due a balance to plaintiff from the defendants of the sum of $1,738.50."

The court found all the allegations of the complaint and the amendments thereto to be true, except that Bills and Patton had no interest in the corporation, and that all the allegations of defendants' answers and counterclaim were untrue.

Plaintiff testified that he was employed and his compensation agreed upon as alleged in the complaint. Patton's testimony tends strongly to corroborate that of plaintiff. Scribner testified that the corporation assumed the indebtedness of the individual defendants to plaintiff for the alleged services performed prior to the organization of the corporation, amounting to $1,591, and included the same in the statement of indebtedness filed with the Railroad Commission at the time of the organization of the corporation. The evidence relative to plaintiff's employment and the balance remaining unpaid on account of his services is without substantial conflict. It is true that Scribner, who was president of the corporation, testified that he instructed Patton, the resident manager thereof, to disperse with plaintiff's services after the corporation was formed, but plaintiff was not informed of such instruction, and he continued in the discharge of his duties as such employee, a fact which Scribner must be presumed to have known and which the evidence fairly shows he did know. The services were performed under the immediate supervision of Patton, who had full charge as resident manager and full authority to employ and discharge men. Scribner testified that he had "never gone over Mr. Patton's head yet to deal directly with the employees."

[1] If it be conceded that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant, the substantial rights of the corporation were not prejudiced by the overruling of the demurrer, because it was under legal obligation to pay the whole amount due plaintiff. The fact that other persons were made defendants could not affect that obligation in any manner.

[2] The judgment against Scribner is erroneous. He was not sued on his liability as a stockholder, and, if he had been, such liability did not extend to the whole indebtedness. The evidence shows without conflict that he owned 51 per cent. of the capital stock for about the first two years of the life of the corporation, and all thereof thereafter. A stockholder "is individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him at the time the debt or liability was incurred bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation." Civ. Code, § 322.

The fact that a person acquires a part, or all, of the capital stock of a corporation does not make him liable as a stockholder for its past debts, but liability therefor rests upon the person who owned the stock at the time the debts were contracted. If Scribner was individually liable at all under the pleadings, it was for the small sum remaining unpaid, at the time the action was brought, on the indebtedness of the individual defendants, and which the corporation had agreed to pay.

[3] Appellants contend that the account sued on, as set forth in the amendment to conform to the evidence, and as shown by the evidence, is not an open book account. The book which contained the corporation accounts was produced at the trial. In the account therein with plaintiff, the corporation was charged with plaintiff's salary from month to month and credited with payments thereon as made from time to time; there being several such credits during every year up to January 1, 1920, the last being of date September 12, 1919. That such an account is an open book account is well settled. 1 C. J. 597; 1 R. C. L. 207; Furlow P. B. Co. v. Balboa L. & W. Co., 186 Cal. 754, 200 Pac. 625; Wright v. Loaiza, 177 Cal. 605, 171 Pac. 311; George Rice & Sons v. Cowan, 46 Cal. App. 225, 189 Pac. 132; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Doe, 26 Cal. App. 246, 146 Pac. 692. It is immaterial that the book account sued on was that of defendant corporation rather than of the plaintiff. Millet v. Bradbury, 109 Cal. 170, 173, 41 Pac. 865.

[4] The business was conducted under the name Diamond Ridge Ditches up to the time the corporation was formed. Thereafter the accounts were continued under the name Diamond Ridge Ditches as before. Appellant contends that, even if the account was an open book account with Diamond Ridge Ditches, it was not such an account with defendant corporation, relying upon the case of Wright v. Loaiza, supra. That case and this are not analogous. In that case the plaintiff sued upon an account kept by him with a person other than the defendant. A case more nearly in point is that of Furlow P. B. Co. v. Balboa L. & W. Co., supra, where it was held that an open book account in the name of one partner for partnership purposes was such an account as to his copartners within the meaning of the statute of limitations. It would be a startling rule which would permit a corporation to shorten the period of the statute of limitations in its own favor by keeping its books under a name other than its own.

[5] No part of the cause of action was barred. The last payment on the account was made September 12, 1919, within four months of the time the action was commenced. "Payment made and entered upon the open book account tolls the statute."

Furlow P. B. Co. v. Balboa L. & W. Co., supra.

[6] It is argued that the court erred in permitting plaintiff to amend to conform to the proofs by alleging that the sum sued for was a balance due upon an open book account. The indebtedness so alleged was the same indebtedness which was specifically set forth in the original and the third amended complaints. The account book was produced at the trial, and the items of the account read therefrom in evidence. It does not appear how any dispute relative thereto could arise, or in what manner the corporation's rights were prejudiced by the fact that the averment of an open book account was made after the trial rather than before. The evidence clearly shows that the plaintiff performed all the services required of him under an express contract, at an agreed compensation, and the judgment awards him the balance of such compensation remaining unpaid, and is a just judgment against the corporation.

The judgment against the defendant corporation is affirmed, and that against the defendant Scribner is reversed.

LICKLEY v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 4334.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. June 15, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨458(2)—Supersedeas ineffective to prevent improper hearing of charges against teacher by county board of education after appeal from judgment.

On application by a teacher to the superior court for a writ of prohibition restraining the county board of education from hearing charges against him, claiming that three board members were scheming to revoke his teaching certificate from motives of passion and prejudice, judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Held, on application for a writ of supersedeas to prevent the hearing, that, the judgment not requiring or prohibiting the doing of any act, there is nothing on which the writ can operate in the relief or aid of appellate jurisdiction, and it is therefore denied.

2. Courts ⇨207(5)—Original jurisdiction to issue in appellate court.

The appellate court has original jurisdiction to issue writs of prohibition.

3. Courts ⇨207(5)—Original jurisdiction of appellate court to issue writs of prohibition not applicable to cases brought on appeal.

The original jurisdiction of the appellate court to issue writs of prohibition does not apply to cases originating in the superior court, and brought up on appeal only.

4. Appeal and error ⇨458(1)—Confined to relief from proceedings based on judgment; "writ of supersedeas."

The only function of the writ of supersedeas is to restrain proceedings upon the judgment from which the appeal has been taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Supersedeas.]

Application by Ernest J. Lickley for a writ of supersedeas directed against the County Board of Education of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, and George T. Bush, Arthur C. Brown, Mark Keppel, J. N. Lacy, and J. T. Baker, as members of the County Board of Education of Los Angeles county, restraining them from proceeding with the hearing of certain charges against petitioner pending appeal from judgment sustaining demurrer to petition. Writ denied.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, Edward T. Bishop, Asst. Co. Counsel, and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff applied to the superior court for a writ of prohibition to restrain and prohibit the defendants from hearing or taking any further proceedings in connection with the hearing of certain charges filed with the county board of education of the county of Los Angeles against the plaintiff. In the petition for prohibition it was alleged that three certain members of the board were disqualified from hearing said charges by reason of bias, prejudice, and hatred toward the petitioner, and that said members prior to the hearing have determined out of such personal bias, hatred, and prejudice to revoke the certificates of the petitioner as a teacher, regardless of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the charges made against him or of any testimony in support thereof.

In their return to the writ respondents denied that said members have any prejudice against the petitioner, and denied that they have for said reasons, or at all, determined what action will follow the hearing of said charges.

Treating the return as constituting a demurrer as well as an answer, the court entered an order that the demurrer be sustained. Thereupon the court entered judgment wherein it was recited that it appeared to the court that the petition does not state facts sufficient to warrant the relief demanded, and ordered that the petition be denied. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed, and the transcript on appeal is now on file in this court.

[1] Appellant has now made application to this court for a writ of supersedeas. It is alleged that respondents are threatening to, and, unless restrained from so doing, will, proceed with the hearing upon said charges, and "that, unless said proceedings before said board are stayed pending the disposition of this appeal, the relief sought by petitioner on this appeal will be of no avail." The single question presented at the hearing of this application relates to the power of this court by writ of supersedeas to prevent respondents from proceeding with the hearing of said charges against appellant during the time of pendency of the appeal.

An alternative writ of prohibition was issued in the court below. Respondents contend that, upon the entry of judgment in the action, the alternative writ ceased to be effective, and that the judgment itself is not a judgment which either requires or prohibits the doing of any act. Therefore, they say that there is nothing upon which a writ of supersedeas could operate. This contention appears to be sustained by the decisions in this state. Thus in Southern Pacific Co. v. Smith, 171 Cal. 8, 151 Pac. 426, the Supreme Court said:

"The situation is simply that the superior court by final judgment has denied the injunctive relief sought, refusing to make any provision in such judgment by way of injunctive relief pending appeal. Any temporary injunction previously granted ipso facto terminated with the giving of judgment on the merits denying an injunction, unless in some way maintained by express provision in such judgment. It is thoroughly settled by our rulings that to grant any such relief as is here sought would not be relief in aid of our appellate jurisdiction, and that under our constitutional and statutory provisions we have no original jurisdiction in injunction matters."

[2, 3] We do have original jurisdiction to issue writs of prohibition, but in cases which originated in the superior court, and which are here only on appeal, we have no such original jurisdiction.

In the Matter of M. O. Graves (Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 386, recently decided by Division 2 of this district, appellant applied for supersedeas to stay, pending appeal, a superior court judgment of suspension from practice of law. The court held that—

A writ of supersedeas "will only be issued to restrain proceedings upon the judgment from which the appeal has been taken. * * * The general rule, therefore, is that supersedeas will not issue where the judgment does not command or permit any act to be done, or where it is not of a nature to be actively and affirmatively enforced by execution or otherwise."

In Wood v. Board of Fire Commissioners, 50 Cal. App. 594, 195 Pac. 739, appellant applied for a supersedeas during the pendency of his appeal from a judgment of the superior court denying a writ of prohibition against the Board of Fire Commissioners of the city of Los Angeles. In denying this application the court pointed out that the action sought to be enjoined by means of the supersedeas was not in execution of the judgment, but was entirely distinct and separate therefrom.

"The superior court adjudged merely that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief, and no process of the court is necessary to carry its judgment into effect. There is, therefore, nothing to supersede, and the writ would be ineffectual for any purpose. Tyler v. Presley, 72 Cal. 290."

The granting of the writ applied for in the case at bar, even though it were called a writ of supersedeas, would in legal effect be the granting of an alternative writ of prohibition, as if this court could now exercise original jurisdiction, although the case is here solely for the purposes of appeal. This we think this court is without authority to do.

Counsel for appellant have brought to our attention a decision of the Supreme Court of the state of Washington which appears to sustain their contention. State v. Board of Education of the City of Seattle, 19 Wash. 8, 52 Pac. 317, 40 L. R. A. 317, 67 Am. St. Rep. 706. In that action appellant sought to obtain from the superior court a writ of prohibition to halt a trial of charges against him as superintendent of public schools, it being alleged that one of the board of directors of the school district was disqualified by prejudice, etc., against appellant. An alternative writ issued, and thereafter the court sustained a demurrer to the petition and entered judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appealed and applied for a writ of supersedeas. The Supreme Court held that, in the exercise of its discretion, by virtue of its inherent power as an appellate tribunal, it had authority to issue an order of supersedeas "to preserve the status quo of the parties, pending the determination of the appeal upon its merits." The court discussed the matter at length, quoting from decisions rendered in Nebraska, Wisconsin, California, and elsewhere; but the California decisions there mentioned do not touch the question here at issue.

[4] We cannot fail to be impressed by the decision of the Supreme Court of Washington, in so far as it emphasizes the situation in which an appealing plaintiff finds himself in a case of this kind, where his application for the writ has been denied in the court below, and where the county board of education, regardless of the challenge to its jurisdiction, chooses to proceed with the trial of the charges. Nevertheless we are constrained to deny the application for a writ of supersedeas, because the decisions in this state have clearly and consistently held that the only function of that writ is to restrain proceedings upon the judgment from which the appeal has been taken.

The application for a writ of supersedeas is denied.

In re RAMEY'S ESTATE.

McLAUGHLIN et al. v. WELSH.

(Civ. 2607.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 6, July 5, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 2, 1923.)

1. Wills §55(1)—Evidence held not to warrant finding of testatrix's incompetency.

In a will contest, evidence held insufficient to warrant finding that testatrix was incompetent.

2. Wills §52(1)—In will contest burden of proving testator's incapacity on contestant.

In a will contest, the burden is on the contestant to prove testator's mental incapacity.

3. Wills §386—On conflicting evidence verdict in will contest not disturbed on appeal.

The rule that all questions of the weight of evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are for the jury and the trial court, and that if there be any substantial evidence to support the finding or verdict it cannot be set aside, is applicable to will contests.

4. Wills §50—Elements necessary to prove testator's mental incapacity stated.

In a will contest it is not sufficient for contestants to prove that testator was feeble in mind, suffering from disease and aged and infirm, but they must show that he was incapable of understanding the nature and substance of his property and of disposing thereof intelligently, and was not free from delusions affecting his actions.

5. Wills §158—Proof of undue influence must show overpowering pressure exercised when will executed.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, the proof of undue influence must be such as to show that there was pressure exercised which overpowered the mind and bore down the volition of the testator at the very time the will was made.

6. Wills §166(1)—Evidence held to warrant finding of undue influence.

In a will contest, evidence held sufficient to warrant finding of undue influence.

7. Wills §166(12)—Circumstantial evidence sufficient to show undue influence.

In building up a cause on circumstantial evidence in a will contest, it is not necessary that any single fact proved, standing alone, shall establish the issue of undue influence; but it is sufficient if all the facts and circumstances given in evidence considered together lead to a rational inference that the ultimate fact is as alleged.

8. Wills §384—Omissions from written contest not ground for reversal.

Though under Code Civ. Proc. § 1312, a written contest of a will is subject to demurrer, where the facts omitted from the contest were alleged in the petition for probate, the proponent was not injured by the omission, especially since written contest of other contestants alleged such facts, and the final judgment should therefore not be disturbed when overruling the demurrer.

9. Trial §256(6)—In absence of request for more specific instruction, charge correctly stating issues held properly given.

Where, in a will contest, the court correctly stated to the jury the issues to be determined, it in effect told them to disregard the other issues, and, in the absence of a request for a more specific instruction, contestants' contention that the jury should have been instructed to wholly disregard the other issues cannot be sustained.

10. Trial §241—In will contest held not improper for court to read statute defining undue influence.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, it was proper in instructing the jury to read Civ. Code, § 1575, defining "undue influence," and the fact that in reading the statute the court substituted the word "her" for "him" was harmless.

11. Wills §384—Instruction permitting jury to consider proponent's actions to determine issue of undue influence held not prejudicial.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, though the fact that proponent visited testatrix while she was in the hospital, at her request, could not be considered sufficient to show undue influence, an instruction that it is proper for the jury to take into consideration all the actions of proponent as shown by the evidence at and immediately prior to the execution of the will was not prejudicial.

12. Trial §194(9)—Instruction that inequalities in will could be considered on issue of undue influence and mental capacity did not violate Constitution.

In a will contest, an instruction that "inequality in the distribution of property among those who would inherit if no will had been made is not of itself evidence of undue influence or unsoundness of mind, yet it may be considered as a circumstance by the jury, together with all the other facts and circumstances shown by the evidence, as tending to establish undue influence or unsoundness of mind," did not violate Const. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting judges from instructing in regard to matters of fact.

13. Trial §251(1)—Not error to refuse instruction which, though correct in principal, was inapplicable to case.

It is not error to refuse an instruction which, though correctly stating the law, is not applicable under any theory of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Application by Charles E. Welsh for the probate of the will of Ellen E. Ramey, deceased, contested by May McLaughlin and others. From a decree denying probate, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

Crofton & Wetmore, of Marysville, for appellant.

A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, and Richard Belcher and W. H. Carlin, both of Marysville, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a judgment denying probate of the purported will of Ellen E. Ramey, deceased, entered April 1, 1922. The judgment was based upon the verdict of a jury in favor of contestants, finding: First, that the testatrix on March 1, 1921, the date of the execution of the will, was of unsound mind; and, second that she was then acting under the undue influence of proponent and appellant, Charles E. Welsh. The testatrix was a maiden lady of the age of 73 years at the time of her death in November, 1921. She left surviving her one brother and several children and grandchildren of deceased brothers and sisters as her sole heirs at law. She was the owner of personal property of the value of $14,000, consisting of bonds and money. For several years she had been subject to epileptic fits, but she was generally able to take care of herself, occupying for a long time prior to February 1, 1921, an apartment in the home of one Mrs. J. McFadden in Yuba City. At this latter date she became ill and needed and obtained the services of a physician, who advised her to go to a hospital. Acting upon his advice, she went to the Rideout Hospital in Marysville, remaining there for two or three week and then going to the Sutter county hospital as a pay patient, where she remained until March 7, 1921, when she went to the "King's Daughters Home" in Oakland, where she died in November following. When she became ill at Mrs. McFadden's she sent for her nephew, Charles E. Welsh, the appellant herein, who resided on his farm near Sutter City, and he went to see her, and from that time until she arrived at the "King's Daughters Home," he attended to all her business. When she was at the Rideout hospital she told appellant—according to his testimony—that she was getting too old to attend to business matters; that she wanted him to take care of her property interests and that she desired to get into some old people's home where she could spend the rest of her days and not be bothered any more about business matters. Thereupon she executed and delivered to him a power of attorney, on February 23, and at the same time gave to him a check for $4,029, the amount of her deposit in the First National Bank of Yuba City, which he cashed and deposited the amount in the same bank in his own name, and proceeded to draw checks against it for his and her expenses. In her will she made appellant the sole beneficiary and designated him her executor. To his application for admission of the will to probate and his appointment as executor a contest was filed, purporting to be that of May McLaughlin and Owen D. Welsh, a niece and nephew respectively of the decedent, alleging incompetency of the testatrix at the time of the execution of the will, but the contest as to Owen D. Welsh was unauthorized by him and at his request at the beginning of the trial it was dismissed. Minnie C. Clements, Clarence Clements, and Marion Clements, as "grandniece and grand-nephews, respectively, of said Ellen E. Ramey, deceased, being children of a deceased niece," jointly filed another contest, alleging: First, the incompetency of the deceased and unfitness of Charles E. Welsh to act as executor; second, the non-execution of the will; and, third, undue influence on the part of Charles E. Welsh. Demurrers to the contests were interposed but overruled, and answers were thereupon filed. At the close of contestants' case a motion for nonsuit was made by proponent and denied by the court. The findings of the jury were upon two special interrogatories submitted at the request of the contestants.

[1] According to the usual course of such trials proponent first offered proof of the due execution of the will. Waldo S. Johnson, a prominent attorney of Marysville, testified that on the morning of March 1 he was requested by M. T. Brittan, an attorney of Marysville, to act as a witness to the will in question; that he did not know Ellen E. Ramey, but was informed that she was an elderly lady and in the hospital; that he went there in a machine with Mr. Brittan and Charles E. Welsh, and he and Mr. Brittan were shown into her room; after some informal talk he stated that having understood she was a lady of advanced years he would like to satisfy himself as to her mental condition at the time. He was then left alone with her and the door was closed. He had the will with him, which he had received from Mr. Brittan. He took it up and discussed it in detail and asked her if she understood exactly what she was doing, how she was disposing of her property, and she said she did, that is the way she wanted it to go. He talked with her upon several subjects and formed his opinion as to her mental condition. He then called Mr. Brittan and told him to proceed. The will was thereupon executed according to the requirement of the statute and she retained it in her possession. The door was then thrown open and one of the nurses came in, and a little later the proponent, and they all sat there for 10 or 15 minutes more talking informally, and finally the testatrix handed the will to her nephew and told him to take care of it, that it was her last will and testament. She was of sound and disposing mind at the time; that she was up and dressed when she signed the will and had no fit while he was there; that he never heard of her having fits and that Mr. Welsh was not in the room when the will was executed.

Charles E. Welsh testified that he had known Ellen E. Ramey ever since he was old enough to remember, that he had seen her a great many times since 1919, and talked with her on those occasions. He used to go with her to transact her own business. She was of sound and disposing mind on March 1, when she executed the will. His reasons for so believing were based upon the manner in which she talked, the way she transacted her business, the care she took of her property, her knowledge of what property she had, and her demeanor and conversation generally. After testatrix became ill in the latter part of January, 1921, and while she was at the hospital, she told the witness that she wanted to go below and stay in the home and that she wanted him to handle her property; that she did not tell him she was going to make a will in his favor and that he never talked to her in any way about making a will; that she told him to bring or send out an attorney and he took Mr. Brittan to see her. After he talked with her, Mr. Brittan drew up the power of attorney, making the witness her attorney in fact; that she never told him she wanted an attorney to draw a will; that he had taken Mr. Brittan out on February 27 or 28, and he did not hear any of the conversation between them. He did not know what Mr. Brittan went there for until March 1; that after the execution of the will he was in the room with his aunt and Mr. Johnson and Mr. Brittan probably 15 minutes. The testatrix handed him the document and said, "Take care of that." In reply to a question on cross-examination to state all that his aunt said, he replied:

"I don't know as she said very much. She wanted to know how everybody was, handed me this paper, told me to take care of it, wanted to know if I had heard anything from the Home down there, when she could go; she was getting anxious to go; she was tired of that place. I told her I would find out as quickly as I could and let her know as quickly as I could find out."

M. T. Brittan, the other subscribing witness, testified substantially as the two foregoing in reference to the execution of the will; that Ellen E. Ramey appeared to him to be of sound and disposing mind at the time; that he had seen her concerning this document before he prepared it; that Mr. Welsh came to his office and told him that she wanted to see an attorney, but said nothing about her purpose.

Contestants thereupon called to the stand
Cal.Rep. 217-220 P.—5

Mrs. Elsie Horton Wilcoxson, one of their most important witnesses, who was the head nurse or matron at the Sutter county hospital. She testified that Ellen E. Ramey was an inmate of the hospital from February 19 to March 7, 1921; that during all that time her physical condition was very bad; that she had at least five or six epileptic fits while she was there. She knew her before she went to the hospital and observed her mental condition while she was a patient there. She was not in her opinion of sound and disposing mind. Her reasons for the opinion were that, after one of these convulsions, Miss Ramey would lie for several days without talking to any one, apparently in a semiconscious condition; sometimes she would know any one and sometimes not; she was in bed most of the time; her mental condition was about the same all the time she was there; she saw her frequently and Miss Ramey was under her charge; she talked with her every day; she observed her condition and general appearance and actions; from this she concluded that she was not of sound mind and that condition existed on March 1; testatrix talked with her only once about her business affairs; that was in the evening after the execution of the will; at that time testatrix stated to her that Mr. Welsh (Charles E. Welsh, proponent) intended to take care of her for the rest of her life and was preparing to take her to Oakland to a home; she stated she was sorry she had signed her name to any papers, but did not state what the papers were; she appeared to be nervous and looked very despondent; the attacks of epilepsy would last for several hours before she would become conscious, then she would lie in a semiconscious condition for several days after that, sometimes two or three days; witness could not remember how long prior to March 1 testatrix had one of these attacks. They did not recur at regular intervals, but she thought the patient had one between March 1 and 7. Between these dates inclusive the physical condition of testatrix was very weak; from February 19 to March 1 decedent was not able to take care of herself physically at any time; she would with help get up and sit in a chair a while; she would get up and fall down; by helping her, aiding her she could walk some, but she could not get up and walk around without some one helping her. She became weaker as the days went on, and as her physical condition sank so did her mind; she knew Mr. Johnson and Mr. Brittan were in the room with Miss Ramey on March 1; that she saw them enter and as far as she could remember Charles E. Welsh went in with them; she did not hear them talking in there as she did not stop to listen to their talking; they were there possibly half an hour and she saw them come out and go away together. She had seen Miss Ramey prior to the entrance of these gentlemen into the room, possibly an hour or so; she was then sitting in a rocking chair; she had been helped to be dressed and helped to a chair; she saw her a few minutes after the gentlemen left when she was helped to a bed, being then weak and apparently exhausted.

Mrs. Wilcoxson was followed by Dr. Allen E. Gray, the regular county physician, as well as the special physician for testatrix while she was in the county hospital. He testified that the physical condition of testatrix while she was there was not very good; she was weak and had a number of epileptic attacks; that she was able at times to walk about the grounds unassisted. As to her competency the record of his testimony is as follows:

"Q. What was her mental condition as to soundness of mind? A. Well, I didn't see there was any mental symptoms, that is any insanity or anything like that. Q. What was your answer? A. I didn't consider her insane. Q. You didn't consider her insane? A. No. Q. Did you consider her incompetent to transact business? A. At what time? Q. The time she was at the hospital. A. I did when she first entered the hospital, but afterwards I considered she was incompetent. Q. Was her condition getting worse or better while she was there—from the time she entered the hospital? A. I had her at the Rideout Hospital first. Q. I am speaking of along about March 1. A. There wasn't so much difference from the time that she entered until she left. Q. What was the condition of her mind during the last of February and March, 1921? The Court: As to being competent or incompetent. A. Well, the same question was brought out when the guardian was appointed. It was an act she did that made me think she was incompetent and that was around the latter part of February, that was the only act she did that made me believe she was incompetent."

The witness afterwards explained that the act to which he referred was the transfer of all her property to Mr. Welsh without any security. It may be added that the appointment of a guardian to which he alluded took place in September—more than six months after the execution of the will. He testified that the patient had several epileptic fits while at the hospital but he could not say just when. He would not state that she had one on March 1 or February 27 or 28, as he did not remember the date. He admitted that just before the power of attorney was executed to Mr. Welsh he advised him and his brother, Foster Welsh, that Miss Ramey was in his opinion perfectly competent to do business. These two were the only witnesses for the contestants who testified as to the physical or mental condition of testatrix while she was at the county hospital.

Henry Chism, an acquaintance of testatrix, expressed the opinion that she was of unsound mind. He had known her for some years, but his acquaintance with her was quite limited and he saw her infrequently. He could not say when was the last time he talked with her, but thought it was within the last five years. He admitted that he did not like her; that he never visited at her house socially, in a business way, or otherwise within four or five years prior to her death.

Mrs. Chism, the wife of Henry Chism, testified also that in her opinion Miss Ramey was of unsound mind within "the last two years of her life or one year for that matter." She saw testatrix frequently during the last two years of her life, as the witness resided just across the street from the McFadden home. Her reason for believing her incompetent was that she thought Miss Ramey did not speak intelligently at times; that "I found her mind was weakened all the time and in talking to her I could see that her mind was very poor."

C. A. Duncan testified that he knew testatrix a little more than 50 years. She lived most of the time at Miss McFadden's, near his place. He saw her occasionally. He did not particularly have conversation with her, but he used to carry groceries from his store to her when she would ask him to do so. During the last years of her life there was a change in her "physical or mental condition." He was asked the question, "Would you consider her as being of sound and disposing mind during the last part of her life, prior to March 1, 1921?" His reply was:

"Well, at times Miss Ramey seemed to be of sound mind; at other times she did not. She was subject to spells and after those spells she didn't seem to be just at herself."

Within the last two years of testatrix's life while he lived next door to her, he would see her quite often in the yard and he talked to her occasionally. He could not say that it was oftener than once a month that he talked to her; he never visited her home during that period, but she came to his house occasionally and visited with his wife. In ordering groceries she did not appear to be of unsound mind and in her conversation generally she would talk just like any other acquaintance, but sometimes she would talk in a rambling fashion, although not when she was ordering groceries.

Dr. A. J. Duncan, a practicing physician, testified that he knew Miss Ramey perhaps 20 years; that he would see her frequently; that at the request of Mr. Welsh he visited her while she was at the hospital, some time between February 22 and March 1; she was in bed and he stayed only a few minutes. When he went into the room she recognized him, called him by name, and he asked her how old she was and she told him. He knew at the time that she was subject to epileptic fits. After he found out who it was he declined to make any further examination, but from the examination he made and his knowledge of her case generally he did not consider her competent, and his reason for the opinion was: "I believe that a person that is subject to chronic epilepsy at her age deteriorates mentally." He admitted that at the time of his visit to her he did not consider himself competent as a physician and surgeon to pass upon the mental capacity of Miss Ramey and that apparently at that time she was perfectly rational.

The foregoing we consider a fair synopsis of the evidence before the court when the motion for nonsuit was made and denied.

Thereupon proponent called Mrs. J. McFadden, in whose house Miss Ramey had occupied apartments at different periods from March, 1910, to the latter part of January or first of February, 1921, when she went to the Rideout Hospital, two weeks before the execution of the will. The witness saw testatrix frequently during this period and had opportunity of observing her manner and actions and had conversations with her. She observed her as she would any one else under the same circumstances and was no more interested in her than in any one else. The witness declared that during the entire period Miss Ramey seemed to be of sound and disposing mind; that she did not see anything to the contrary; that Miss Ramey managed her own affairs, attended to her own business, and when she wanted to pay her rent she went down to the bank and got her money to pay it with. The witness saw testatrix three times after she went to the Rideout Hospital, where witness visited her. She went there because she thought Miss Ramey might be lonesome and she had conversations with her on these visits; she did not remember what the conversation was, but conversed with her as she would with any one else; that the only circumstance she remembered was that the hospital bills had been presented to Miss Ramey and the latter said she had no way of paying bills until Mr. Welsh came in and she would have him bring checks for her, and testatrix was worried that bills were presented to her when she expected him to attend to that matter. The witness remembered that previous to that, it might have been six months previous, when testatrix was somewhat indisposed, witness had at the request of testatrix written to Mr. Charles E. Welsh to come in when it was convenient to see Miss Ramey. As to the epilepsy, witness testified that testatrix would lapse into unconsciousness without any premonition at all that it was going to occur; testatrix told her that she did not know for a half minute beforehand that the spells were coming on; witness never saw her when she passed into unconsciousness, but was informed immediately or heard her and took occasion to have her placed upon the bed. Sometimes she would be six months free from them, then again she might have two very close together; testatrix never required a physician, but Dr. Gray had told her that she had better go to the Rideout Hospital, as she had no attendant in her room and she would improve faster in the hospital. While testatrix was ill at her home, witness visited her several times a day and she had no spasms or convulsions, and her physical condition when she visited her at the Rideout Hospital was about the same as when she left the home of witness.

As stated by appellant, Mrs. McFadden was apparently the closest and most intimate acquaintance of Miss Ramey during the period in which she knew her, and her testimony was clear and emphatic that testatrix was of sound and disposing mind at that time.

C. A. Emory, whose wife is a grandniece of Miss Ramey, knew the testatrix for about seven years; he was a grocery clerk in Yuba City most of the time from the fall of 1917 to the spring of 1920; before going to work in the store he would see her probably once in every two weeks, meet her on the street or at home, and had general conversations with her now and then; she did some of her trading at the store and he generally waited on her. He had opportunities to observe her conduct and manner generally and he would say that she was very much of sound mind; she knew exactly what she was coming to the store for, the price of everything she wanted, whether it was cheaper at one place than another, and could hold an ordinary conversation as well as any one as far as witness could state. The last time he saw her was in January, 1921, in front of the post office, and he had a conversation with her at that time, that she asked him how everything was, about the family, wife, and children. She named the wife and children. He observed nothing in her manner, speech, or conversation at that time indicating any difference in her mental condition from what it had been during the entire period that he knew her.

Dr. Fred B. Tapley testified that he had been a practicing physician since 1916 and had made a study of epilepsy and its effect upon the mind and body of the patient; he knew testatrix in her lifetime, for 15 or 20 years; he called to see her once about 10 years ago when she had an epileptic fit; the next time he saw her was in the Sutter county hospital about a year before the trial, between February 19 and March 7, 1921. He was called there to pass on her mental condition and as to that he stated:

"Well, after talking with her quite a while we decided there wasn't much wrong with her at that time outside of her age and feeble condition due to her age, found she was mentally competent."

When he made the examination he knew her history in a general way in reference to epilepsy; that epilepsy, even when chronic and extending over a considerable period of years, does not necessarily result in insanity, and does not frequently so result; that these fits did not render testatrix insane or of unsound mind.

He was followed by a large number of witnesses, including nephews and nieces of testatrix, a physician of experience in the treatment of epilepsy who was also acquainted with Miss Ramey, and other acquaintances, who testified that, in their opinion, she was of sound and disposing mind.

There was also evidence of some minor and incidental matters, but we deem it unnecessary to reproduce it.

We have thus called attention to the testimony at considerable length for the reason that appellant earnestly insists that it is utterly insufficient to sustain either finding of the jury, and also to indicate the significance of certain rulings of the court.

[2, 3] In considering the question of the support for the findings, certain legal principles must, of course, be regarded. We may mention only the following: The burden of proof is upon contestant, the presumption being manifestly, that the testatrix was of sound and disposing mind and free from undue influence. Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 Pac. 1070, 74 Pac. 441; Estate of Stone, 172 Cal. 215, 155 Pac. 992. However, in will contests the rule is the same as in other proceedings, that all questions of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are for the jury and the trial court, and if there be any substantial evidence to support the finding or verdict it cannot be set aside by the reviewing court, although said court might believe the great preponderance of the evidence was the other way. Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598.

[4] But as to the proof justifying a finding or verdict against the will upon the ground of unsoundness of mind, it must go further than to show that the testator was feeble in mind, suffering from disease, and aged and infirm, it must be sufficient to warrant the inference that he was incapable of understanding the nature and situation of his property and of disposing thereof intelligently and was not free from delusions affecting his action. Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 69 Pac. 294.

[5] Also the proof of undue influence must be such as to show that there was a pressure exercised and exerted "which overpowered the mind and bore down the volition of the testator at the very time the will was made." Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 Pac. 872.

[6] As to the claim of undue influence it is the contention of appellant that the record is destitute of any such showing. He points out that this issue was tendered, if at all, only in the contest of the Clements; that therein the sole specification of fact is that Welsh "by representing to said decedent that he would properly care for her in her sickness and that her other relations did not care what became of her and had no regard for her, he induced and persuaded her to make the said will." Appellant insists that there is no such evidence whatever. Assuredly, there is no direct evidence of any such representation. The nearest approach to a suggestion of that character is found in the testimony of Miss Wilcoxson that Miss Ramey stated to her that "Mr. Welsh intended to take care of her for the rest of her life and was preparing to take her to Oakland to a Home." Nothing was said, however, as to such promise having been made to induce her to make a will in his favor, and it would hardly be just to construe this apparently innocent and praiseworthy intention as evidence of a previous wicked and sinister design to take advantage of Miss Ramey in the disposition of her property.

Without attempting to reproduce the argument of appellant upon this branch of the case, we deem it sufficient to state that he insists that we find none of the usual "earmarks" of undue influence; there was no evidence that she had any particular regard or affection for any of her relatives other than proponent, unless it be her niece, Laura Stevenson, who testified for proponent, or that she was even acquainted with the Clements, the contestants who alleged undue influence; that, on the contrary, she relied upon proponent for several years for assistance when she needed it, and as persuasive evidence of her regard for and confidence in him she sent for Welsh when she became ill a few weeks before the will was executed as she had done on previous occasions; there was no evidence of any attempt at solicitation, coercion, or any misrepresentation of any kind; and if it be admitted that a confidential relation existed between the parties, this does not even raise a suspicion of undue influence. There must be some proof that such relation was used to take advantage of the testatrix, at the time the will was made, overcoming her free will and desire in order to invalidate the testament. Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 64 Pac. 294; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532.

While admitting that undue influence may be shown by circumstantial evidence—indeed, it can hardly ever be shown in any other way—appellant insists that the circumstances can do no more than excite suspicion that the proponent unfairly and unduly influenced the testatrix, and it is rightly said that suspicion is not sufficient. In fact, appellant asserts that every circumstance in the case accords with the hypothesis that the will was the free act of the mind of testatrix, and if some of the circumstances may be consistent with the theory of undue influence the view in favor of the validity of the will must prevail. In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101.

In reply to this challenge respondents group certain circumstances, which they claim are sufficient in their cumulative probative force to justify both findings. Of these we select only those that may have a bearing upon undue influence: (1) While Miss Ramey was at the county hospital she had five or six of these epileptic spasms or convulsions; she was sinking rapidly, both physically and mentally; was suffering from a fatal malady and at no time was entirely free from the effect of these epileptic attacks. (2) She had been through life a very economical and thrifty person and had saved an estate of the value of about $14,000. (3) After going to the Rideout Hospital, although she was ill, her life habit lingered, and, finding that she was paying $40 per week, she had herself taken to the Sutter county hospital, where she could obtain accommodations for $30 a week. (4) From the time she entered that institution on February 19 until and including March 1, 1921, proponent called upon and conversed with her nearly every day, and brought to see her at least four or five times the attorney, M. T. Brittan, who finally drew the supposed will. (5) On February 23 she drew a check in favor of respondent for the entire amount of her deposit in the bank, and on the same day in the presence of Brittan and proponent she executed the general power of attorney, which was afterward acknowledged by Brittan before Waldo S. Johnson. (6) Proponent deposited the check to his own credit in the bank and immediately began drawing out the money until the bank refused to honor any of his checks. (7) Having obtained control of all her property, he hunted up a home in Oakland for her, and, as respondents say, ascertaining "that he could place her there at $60 per month if she occupied a public ward and $70 in a private room and thriftily, of course, selected for her the public ward, thus saving $10 per month." (8) Having been unable to obtain all her property through the power of attorney and the check which she gave him, he goes out with Mr. Brittan and Mr. Johnson, and these three men were closeted with her for half an hour or an hour before the will was executed; thereafter Miss Ramey was exhausted and expressed regret that she had signed some papers.

(9) From various circumstances respondents claim it to be a fair inference that the supposed will was prepared in the office of attorney Brittan in the city of Marysville at the request of proponent Charles E. Welsh and that Attorney Johnson was called in and the three went out to Miss Ramey with the paper already drawn. (10) Something like a year prior to March 1, 1921, Miss Ramey had declared her intention to execute a will in favor of respondent May McLaughlin.

[7] Manifestly, as stated by this court recently in the Estate of Gallo, 214 Pac. 496:

"In building up a case on circumstantial evidence it is not necessary that any single fact proved, standing alone, shall establish the issue, but it is sufficient if all the facts and circumstances given in evidence, considered together, lead to a rational inference that the ultimate fact is, as alleged."

Some of the facts upon which respondents rely to justify their position are indeed of slight significance, but we think it should not be held by an appellate court that the entire showing is legally insufficient to warrant the finding of undue influence. Of course, as has often been stated, each case must stand or fall upon its own peculiar facts, and precedents are valuable largely for their exposition of the ruling principles in such consideration. Appellant thinks we should follow the teaching of the Missouri Supreme Court in the case of Doherty v. Gilmore, 136 Mo. 414, 37 S. W. 1127, wherein it was held that—

"In an action to set aside a will, evidence that defendant was a member of testator's family at the time the will was drawn, and for years prior thereto; that, at testator's request, he went after the attorney who drew the instrument; that he and his brother and sister were the principal beneficiaries; that testator was old and infirm, and in making the will ignored to a great extent a niece who had been his constant attendant for years; and that, prior to the execution of the will, defendant had drawn out, on testators' checks, all the money the latter then had in bank—does not show facts from which undue influence can be reasonably inferred; and a submission of the issue to the jury thereon is erroneous."

No doubt that court is entitled to great respect, but it is to be observed that the decision was not unanimous, that the adverse showing was not so formidable as herein, and it is quite probable that other courts of equal learning would decide that a sufficient case was made out to submit to the jury.

On the other hand, respondents cite Estate of Snowball, supra, and Estate of De Laveaga, 165 Cal. 607, 133 Pac. 307, to which they would now probably add Estate of Gallo, supra, as authoritative precedents for their contention. It must be admitted, however, that they involved certain facts for which there is no equivalent in the case at bar, but we think without an undue extension of the doctrine of these cases we may find therein sanction for the conclusion we have reached.

But it is claimed that the foregoing questionable incidents were all explained by proponent and that his explanation should have removed any implication of unfairness. It was for the jury and the trial court, though, to say whether his explanation was satisfactory and to believe a part of his testimony while disbelieving another portion, if their conscientious judgment so directed. They had the right to consider his interest in the case and his manner on the stand, and while not permitted to act capriciously or arbitrarily, yet if they believed that proponent was not telling the truth when stating that his aunt had sent for him and that the suggestions in reference to the disposition of the property came from her, they were authorized to reject it.

Nor is it sufficient reason for us to set aside the finding because we may consider the evidence consistent with good faith on the part of proponent. If there is an intimation to that effect in any of the decisions, it is undoubtedly ill-advised. The rule is, as before stated, that if a rational inference may be drawn from the evidence in favor of the finding of the jury the appellate court is bound by it, although it may believe that a contrary conclusion would have been more reasonable and satisfactory.

The other question seems less difficult of solution. It is apparent that the expression of opinion as to the competency of the testatrix by some of the witnesses for contestants is of no value by reason of their slight acquaintance with her and their infrequent opportunities to observe and converse with her. The reasons assigned for such opinion are also inadequate, and as stated by this court in the Estate of Campbell, 46 Cal. App. 612, 189 Pac. 812:

"The opinion of a witness that a person is of unsound mind can be no stronger than or of superior evidentiary weight to the reasons upon which he bases his opinion."

It is equally manifest that the testimony of the physicians in favor of contestants is of slight importance. It is apparent that they were very much in doubt in reference to her mental condition and their admissions were such as to deprive of any substantial probative force their expression of opinion that she was of unsound mind.

As to this issue respondents' case can be upheld only, if at all, upon the testimony of Mrs. Wilcoxson. But, as said by appellant, there is not a word in her testimony of any insanity, delirium, loss of memory or failure to know or understand, upon the part or the testatrix, on March 1, 1921, the day the will was executed, nor at any other time, except when she may have been, as the witness claimed, in an unconsciousness or semiconscious condition after one of these fits, and she certainly did not have one of these so-called fits on that day and could not have had one later than at least two days prior thereto according to the witness' own testimony. Appellant claims that the vital parts of her testimony are peculiarly "self-contradictory and inherently impossible," but granting that the jury was justified in fully crediting her statements, it nevertheless is true that her opinion of mental unsoundness was based upon the reason that in consequence of the epileptic fits Miss Ramey was unconscious or semiconscious, and that on the day in question she was not in such condition at all. Indeed, she talked with Miss Ramey on business matters on that day and she makes no claim that what was said or done or the appearance of testatrix indicated any mental infirmity. For further consideration of the legal aspect of the question involved, we may refer to the Estate of Campbell, supra; Estate of Guilbert, 46 Cal. App. 55, 188 Pac. 807; Estate of Nelson, supra; Estate of Motz, supra; Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 Pac. 57; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932; Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 Pac. 778; Estate of Fraser, 177 Cal. 266, 170 Pac. 601; Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 Pac. 1085.

To fortify their position as to mental incompetency respondents cite Estate of Olson, 19 Cal. App. 379, 126 Pac. 171; Estate of Snowball, supra; Estate of De Laveaga, 165 Cal. 607, 133 Pac. 307. The first of these treated only of the sufficiency of the pleadings and of the findings to support the judgment, the evidence not having been brought up. The estate of Snowball involved only the issue of undue influence, and the Supreme Court held that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding upon that question.

In the Estate of De Laveaga it was held, after an exhaustive review of the evidence, that it was sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial judge on both issues. But, as stated by the Supreme Court in reference to the mental competency of the testatrix:

"We find portrayed a woman utterly incompetent at any time to understandingly and intelligently consider her property with a view to its proper disposition by will, and moreover utterly incompetent alone and unaided to compose and write the admirably constructed document in so far as phraseology is concerned, which was offered for probate as her last will. Contestants' evidence tended to show, among other things, that as a girl and young woman she was unable to materially progress in so far as the simplest kind of education was concerned; that her mind remained to the time of her death as that of a child, unable to comprehend anything beyond the most simple matters."

Other considerations are set forth in the opinion which added weight to the inference that the testatrix was entirely without understanding of what she was doing at the time the supposed will was executed. The foregoing statement is sufficient to show the marked distinction between that case and this.

Objections are made to the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrers to the contests, to the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence, and of giving and refusing certain instructions.

[8] As to the two separate written contests it is plain that they are regarded as the first pleading in the action and are subject to the same grounds of demurrer as any other complaint. Section 1312, Code Civ. Proc. Each of them is undoubtedly defective, but, as we view it, the proponent was not prejudiced by the ruling. He claims that the contest of May McLaughlin was fatally defective in its failure to allege certain facts, which he enumerates. But they were alleged in the petition for the probate of the will, and while as a matter of good pleading, they should have been set out in the written contest, it is apparent after trial that appellant was not damaged by the omission. Besides, they were alleged in the contest of the Clements, and if the latter was sufficient, the final judgment should not be disturbed simply because of an erroneous ruling as to the other contest.

The only serious objection to the complaint of the Clements is that the allegation of undue influence is that of a legal conclusion, but when the whole of it is considered we are satisfied that sufficient facts appear to measure up to the requirement of the rule as stated in the Estate of Olson, supra. Here, again, we may say the case was fully tried upon the theory of the sufficiency of the pleadings and appellant was not misled nor injured by any of the supposed shortcomings.

[9] Complaint is made of the instruction by the court that the contest was upon two grounds, namely, unsoundness of mind and the undue influence of Charles E. Welsh. The contention is that two other grounds were attempted to be set up, to wit, the nonexecution of the will and that Charles E. Welsh was not a fit and proper person to be appointed as executor of the will, and as none of these had been withdrawn or dismissed, the court should have directed the jury "to wholly disregard all allegations of contest other than the one of soundness of mind and the question of undue influence." We see no merit in this criticism. The court in effect told the jury to disregard the other grounds when it confined the attention of the jury to the two which were mentioned. We may add that the matter was placed beyond controversy by the second instruction in which the court expressly stated that "the issues which you are to determine in this action are the following" (specifying the two already referred to). If appellant desired a more specific statement as to the other two supposed grounds, he should have requested it.

[10] It was proper to read section 1575 of the Civil Code as to what constitutes "undue influence." It cannot be supposed that the jury did not need such instruction and, as to the claim that it was not applicable to the facts, since there was no evidence that appellant took "an unfair advantage of the mental weakness of testatrix," we think there was a sufficient showing of circumstances to justify the instruction. The word "her" was substituted for "him" in the section, but manifestly this was harmless, as any application of the instruction would necessarily be to proponent's dealings with her, the testatrix. The masculine pronoun would have answered the purpose, of course, just as well, but the change was innocuous.

A similar objection is made to instruction No. 4 upon the ground that—

"There was absolutely no evidence of 'any improper pressure' or other unfair conduct exercised by Charles E. Welsh or any one else which would overcome the volition of the testatrix."

There was, manifestly, no such direct evidence; but, as already stated, the theory embodied in the instruction finds substantial support in the circumstances of the case. Appellant is entirely mistaken in the claim that the instruction "assumes, in its initial statement, that it is a fact that in this particular case 'improper pressure' and 'unfair conduct' had been used; in other words, that undue influence had been established." The language of the instruction is clearly hypothetical:

"A will is obtained by undue influence where improper pressure or other unfair conduct has overcome," etc.

It left to the jury to determine whether it was a case where such conduct existed. This is made even plainer by the concluding portion of the instruction.

[11] Appellant complains most bitterly of instruction No. 6. He says that—

"The mere fact that he visited testatrix frequently at the said hospital, and which was shown conclusively by the evidence was for the purpose of arranging her affairs at her own request, could not be considered as sufficient evidence at all of any undue influence."

Appellant is clearly right in that claim, but the court did not so instruct the jury. The instruction was that—

"It is proper for the jury to take into consideration all the actions of said Charles E. Welsh as shown by the evidence at and immediately prior to the execution of the instrument."

No specific mention was made of his visits to the hospital.

Nor did the instruction leave the jury at liberty to find undue influence because Charles E. Welsh "sent Mr. Brittan to testatrix, though at the request of testatrix, if they thought Mr. Brittan had exercised any influence over testatrix." It simply directed the jury that Welsh's relation to and connection with the attorney who drew the will might be considered as a circumstance in the case. There was no necessity for giving such instruction, but we can see no prejudicial error therein.

[12] Appellant, claiming that it violated section 19 of article 6 of the state Constitution prohibiting judges from charging jurors with respect to matters of fact, criticizes the action of the court in giving this instruction:

"The court instructs you that inequality in the distribution of property among those who would inherit if no will had been made, is not of itself evidence of undue influence or unsoundness of mind, yet it may be considered as a circumstance by the jury together with all the other facts and circumstances shown by the evidence as tending to establish undue influence or unsoundness of mind."

We do not consider the instruction as violative of said provisions of the Constitution. The court by said instruction did not direct the jury to consider said circumstance for such purpose, nor was there any intimation as to the weight that should be accorded it; but their attention was specifically directed to it as a part of the evidence which they might regard in the case as tending to establish the claim of respondents, leaving it to the jury, however, to say what importance they should attach to it. The instruction is self-contradictory, as the first part of it implies that such circumstance should not be considered as evidence at all, and, besides, that particular circumstance should not have been singled out for special attention; but we think that appellant was not prejudiced thereby.

Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give this proposed instruction:

"When fraud or fraudulent representations made to the testator are relied on as an element in undue influence, it must appear not only that the representations were false and believed to be true by the testator, but that they were made the basis of importunity and mental pressure upon the testator and that the testamentary act was the result thereof, before the jury can find that there was any fraud practiced upon the testator in the making of the will."

[13] While the foregoing embodies a sound legal principle, it was not applicable to the case, as there was no evidence of any false representations. In the absence of any evidence to that effect, it surely could not be said that such representations were relied on. It is not error to refuse an instruction which, however correct in principle, is not pertinent to any theory of the evidence.

Certain instructions as to mental soundness, given by the court, are assailed by appellant; but they need not be considered in view of our conclusion that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding upon that issue.

As to the rulings upon the admissibility of evidence we have examined all the assignments of error, and, while we think the ruling should have been the other way in some instances, yet we find nothing therein of sufficient gravity to demand a reversal.

As either finding would support the judgment (Estate of Baker, 176 Cal. 430, 168 Pac. 881), and we are of the opinion that there was a sufficient showing of undue influence, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, Justice pro tem.

FRENCH v. FREEMAN. (S. F. 10027.)(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1923.)1. Appeal and error ¶1010(1) — Appellate court bound by trial court's findings if supported by evidence.

The appellate court is bound by a trial court's findings if sufficient evidence supports them.

2. Vendor and purchaser ¶44—Evidence held to support finding in purchaser's favor in action for rescission.

In an action for rescission of contract of sale of land, evidence held to support findings in plaintiff's favor, and particularly the findings that defendant made the representation as to the character of the soil and that plaintiff was unfamiliar with farming pursuits, lands, and the qualities or fitness of the soils thereof.

3. Vendor and purchaser ¶33—What constitutes expression of opinion held question of fact for trial court.

What amounts to an expression of opinion as compared with a positive statement of fact depends upon all the circumstances of the case and is a question for the trial court to determine.

4. Vendor and purchaser ¶33—Statement, if based on facts, a statement of fact and not mere opinion.

A statement of what might otherwise be an opinion is, if based on alleged facts, a statement of fact and not a mere expression of opinion.

5. Vendor and purchaser ¶36(2) — Representation that land was finest sediment soil held statement of fact.

Though the statement that the land was good for raising pears might have been a mere expression of opinion, the representation that the land was the finest sediment soil was a statement of fact, especially where such representation was based upon the further statement that the soil had been analyzed, and that such analysis showed the land to be of the character represented and fitted for the production of pears.

6. Vendor and purchaser ¶36(2)—Purchaser viewing land, but ignorant as to fitness of soil, held not precluded from relying on vendor's representation as to character of soil.

Where a vendee was unacquainted with soils, the fact that he visited the land did not preclude him from saying that he relied upon vendor's statements as to the character of the soil.

7. Vendor and purchaser ¶123—Whether defrauded party rescinded promptly within statute held question primarily for trial court.

Whether a defrauded party has, within Civ. Code, § 1691, rescinded promptly upon discovering the facts entitling him to rescind, held a question of fact primarily for the trial court.

8. Vendor and purchaser ¶123—Whether fraud in one particular is constructive notice of other frauds held question for trial court.

Whether a person who has discovered that he has been cheated in one particular is put on inquiry as to other possible frauds held a question for the trial court.

9. Vendor and purchaser ¶123—Finding that purchaser offered to rescind within reasonable time after discovery of fraud held justified by evidence.

Finding that plaintiff purchaser offered to rescind within a reasonable time after discovery of facts entitling him to rescind, within Civ. Code, § 1691, held justified under the evidence.

10. Vendor and purchaser ¶123—Discovery, by purchaser of farm, of fraud in shortage of chickens, held not, as matter of law, constructive notice of other frauds.

Where plaintiff purchased a farm, including the chickens thereon, his discovery of a shortage of chickens held not sufficient, as a matter of law, to put him on constructive notice as to frauds, with reference to representations as to the character of the soil of the land.

11. Vendor and purchaser ¶123—Finding held equivalent to finding purchaser did not waive fraud.

A finding in an action for rescission of contract of sale of land that plaintiff did not, after the discovery of the fraud and falsity of representations which the court finds were made by defendant, waive said fraud or affirm the said contract or sale, as alleged in defendant's amendment to her answer, or by any other act or conduct on the part of plaintiff, held a sufficient finding that plaintiff did not waive the fraud.

12. Vendor and purchaser ¶45—Question whether purchaser has ratified voidable contract held for jury.

Whether a person has ratified a voidable contract or elected to affirm it rather than to rescind it depends primarily upon his intention which is shown by his declarations or his conduct, which are matters of fact for the jury.

13. Vendor and purchaser ¶123—Admission of evidence as to proceeds realized by vendor on sale of pear crop held proper as being within issues raised.

In an action for rescission of contract of sale of fruit lands, admission of evidence by plaintiff that defendant received $1,000 for pears raised and not $1,600, as represented to plaintiff, held proper as being within issue raised by pleadings.

14. Vendor and purchaser ¶126—Payment for value of use and occupation of premises precludes further charge for proceeds realized from raising crops.

Where, in an action for rescission of contract of sale of land, plaintiff was charged with the value of the use and occupation of premises for the time he was in possession, he could not also be charged with the proceeds of the crop of pears grown during his occupation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by John H. French against Addie V. Freeman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rea, Cassin & Caldwell, of San Jose, for appellant.

Louis Oneal, Maurice J. Rankin, and James P. Sex, all of San Jose, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for rescission of a contract of sale of 14 acres of land near San Jose, upon the ground of the alleged fraud of the defendant in inducing the plaintiff to enter into the contract.

Briefly, the facts of the case are as follows: The defendant inserted an advertisement in a local newspaper offering the land in question for sale for $18,000 and describing it as being the finest sediment soil and possessing the best artesian well in the county. Plaintiff saw this advertisement, and, accompanied by his wife and two men, none of whom were farmers by vocation, he called upon defendant at the farm on the morning of March 27, 1920. Defendant's son, Dr. Freeman, acting for her, showed the plaintiff and his friends about the place, and, in the course of the conversation which ensued, certain representations, charged to be untrue, were made. Plaintiff and his friends returned to the farm in the afternoon, when plaintiff paid a deposit of $200 on the purchase price, which was $18,000. On March 28, 1920, plaintiff moved on the land, and on this day he made a further payment of $7,300, and gave his note, secured by a trust deed, for the balance of the purchase price. On July 29, 1920, plaintiff, through his attorney, served on defendant a formal notice of rescission, claiming that the property did not conform to the representations made by the defendant. The following week defendant commenced proceedings to have the land sold under the terms of the trust deed, and shortly thereafter the present action was brought.

The alleged misrepresentations, as set out in the complaint as constituting the grounds of fraud, are: (1) That the character of the soil was suitable for raising pears and that it was "the finest sediment soil"; (2) that the land was well and abundantly watered by means of a well and pump which would supply sufficient water to sell to adjoining neighbors in addition to that needed for the irrigation of the entire tract of land; (3) that the poultry on said premises consisted of at least 250 chickens of good quality and breed; and (4) that said property had in the year 1919 produced pears of the reasonable value of $1,600, and that said crop was sold for $1,600.

The trial court, sitting with an advisory jury, found that to induce plaintiff to enter into said contract for the purchase of said property defendant, immediately prior to making the said contract and sale, represented and stated to plaintiff as follows: That all of said land was of the finest sediment soil, and that the said land was fitted for the growing and production of pear trees, and that pear trees would produce good crops of pears on all of said land; that said land and soil had been analyzed, and that a sample of same had been sent to the University at Berkeley, Cal.; that such analysis showed all of said land and soil to be the finest sediment soil and fitted for the growing of pear trees and the production of pears; and that defendant further represented and stated to plaintiff that said property had in the year 1919 produced pears of the reasonable market value of $1,600; that the pear crop produced by said property in the year 1919 was sold by defendant for the sum of $1,600; that $1,600 was paid to defendant for the said crop of pears on the trees; that said representations were of facts material to said contract and sale and materially affected the value of the said property sold to plaintiff, and plaintiff believed and relied on said representations and statements made by defendant as aforesaid and was induced by same to enter into said contract and to purchase said property; that all of said representations and statements so found to have been made by defendant to plaintiff were false and known by defendant to be false when made by her, and were made by her to deceive plaintiff and to induce him to enter into said contract and to purchase said property.

There were also findings that plaintiff had never been a farmer or orchardist by vocation or otherwise nor had experience in farming, fruit-raising or in the work of an orchardist, and at all times plaintiff was ignorant, unacquainted, and unfamiliar with farming, agricultural pursuits, fruit-raising, and lands and soils and the qualities or fitness thereof, and plaintiff was not capable of judging the character of said land for himself and did not know its true quality or character; that, three days prior to the said contract between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff's five-year-old son had died and the day before said agreement was made plaintiff had buried his said child, and because of the death and loss of his said child plaintiff was at the time when said representations were made by defendant and said land was purchased on the verge of a nervous breakdown and suffering from nervous and mental disturbances and was ill in body and mind, and not in condition of body or mind to properly investigate or determine the real value or character of said property, or the truth of the said representations of defendant; that if said land had been of sediment soil, as represented by defendant, all of it would have been reasonably worth $1,000 an acre, but that a portion of said land, consisting of 5.75 acres, which was and is alkali and marsh land, was and is not reasonably worth more than $100 an acre, and the entire property sold to plaintiff is not now and was not at the time of said sale reasonably worth more than $8,000.

In accordance with these findings judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff rescinding the contract, canceling the promissory note, and awarding plaintiff $7,200 in cash. It was also decreed that plaintiff restore to defendant all the property, real and personal, except the personal property which plaintiff had sold, and that the defendant be restrained from selling the real property under the terms of the trust deed.

[1, 2] Defendant strongly attacks the findings of the court as unsupported by the evidence, but we are bound by these findings, if there is sufficient evidence in the record to support them. Plaintiff testified as follows:

"The defendant told my wife when I bought the place that I would buy all the finest sediment soil; I seen the ad 'Sediment soil,' and she said it was sediment soil; I was not accustomed to soils, and I had always heard sediment soil was good soil, and I thought it was A-1. She did not say it was only part sediment soil. * * * Dr. Freeman said it was all fine sediment soil; that he had it sent to Berkeley and had it analyzed, and got a report on it, and it was the best pear soil in the state. They did not say anything about the front portion of the land being different soil. This statement about the soil being analyzed was made in the presence of the defendant. * * * I made no further examination. I was broken down and sick over the death of my boy. I paid the $200 after I had heard the statements made by Dr. Freeman and the defendant concerning which I testified. I believed these statements. If I had not believed these statements to be true, I wouldn't have purchased the place. * * * I know nothing of soils. I never did any farming."

Plaintiff further testified that Dr. Freeman told him that he had sold the 1919 pear crop for $1,600 on the trees, and it was proved at the trial that defendant only received $1,000 for the 1919 pear crop on the trees.

These few extracts from the plaintiff's testimony show that there was sufficient evidence in the record to support those findings which we have quoted above, and particularly the findings that the defendant made the representations as to the character of the soil, and also to support the further finding that plaintiff was ignorant, unacquainted, and unfamiliar with farming, agricultural pursuits, fruit-raising, and lands and soils, and the qualities or fitness thereof.

[3] Defendant contends that the statement that the land was good for raising pears and that it was the finest sediment soil were matters of opinion. The statement that the land was good for raising pears might have been a mere expression of opinion, but we cannot say that the statement that the land was the finest sediment soil was an expression of opinion. What amounts to an expression of opinion as compared with a positive statement of fact depends upon all the circumstances of the case, and is a question for the trial court to determine. Hodgkins v. Dunham, 10 Cal. App. 690, 103 Pac. 351; Stockton v. Hind, 51 Cal. App. 131, 196 Pac. 122; 26 Cor. Jur. 1083. In Stockton v. Hind, supra, 51 Cal. App. at page 136, 196 Pac. at page 124, the court said:

"It is conceded that the general rule is that an expression of opinion or belief, if nothing more, and if so understood and intended, is not a representation of fact, and although false, does not amount to actionable fraud. Ordinarily a person has no right to rely upon such statements, and if he does so rely, he cannot treat them as fraudulent, either for the purpose of maintaining an action in damages for deceit, or for the purpose of rescinding the contract. Where there is any doubt as to whether or not a representation was intended and understood as a mere expression of opinion or a statement of fact, the question is one not of law but of act for the court or jury."

[4, 5] The trial court here found that defendant stated, as a fact, that the soil was the finest sediment soil, and we are bound by that finding. Furthermore, the misrepresentations of the defendant relative to the character of this land were based upon the further statement that the soil had been analyzed, and that such analysis showed the land to be of the character represented, and fitted for the production of pears. And it is well established that a statement of what might otherwise be an opinion, if based on alleged facts, is a statement of fact and not a statement merely of an opinion. Tracy v. Smith, 175 Cal. 161, 165, 165 Pac. 535; Brandt v. Krogh, 14 Cal. App. 39, 49, 111 Pac. 275; Winkler v. Jerrue, 20 Cal. App. 555, 560, 129 Pac. 804. In Tracy v. Smith the court said:

"Hence, considered alone, the statement that the land was 'absolutely free from frost' might be deemed merely a prediction or an expression of Mizener that in his opinion the locality would never be subject to frost. It was, however, a positive representation by one assuming to have knowledge of the subject, based upon a statement known by him to be false in fact, that 'a damaging frost had never been known in that neighborhood,' which, if true, when made in connection with the statement that the property was absolutely frostless, warranted the making of the latter and gave it the character of a like statement of fact rather than a mere opinion."

[6] Plaintiff testified that he relied on these representations, and we do not believe that he was under any obligations to investigate and to verify their truth. In Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, at page 670, 154 Pac. 851, at page 852, it is said:

"We think it must be held that the court erred in directing the jury, as it did in effect, that a party who has relied upon a misrepresentation made by another and has suffered injury thereby is precluded from recovering, if he had an opportunity, and did not avail himself thereof, to test the truth of the representations by independent investigation. Some of the earlier cases state the rule in this broad way, but, as Mr. Bigelow says in his work on Fraud, volume 1, page 523, 'the proposition has now become very widely accepted, at law as well as in equity, at least as general doctrine, that a man may act upon a positive representation of fact, notwithstanding the fact that the means of knowledge were specially open to him. * * *' Similarly in Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, section 896 [895], it is said that 'whenever a positive representation of fact is made, the party receiving it is, in general, entitled to rely and act upon it, and is not bound to verify it by an independent investigation. Where a representation is made of facts which are or may be assumed to be within the knowledge of the party making it, the knowledge of the receiving party concerning the real facts, which shall prevent his relying on and being misled by it, must be clearly and conclusively established by the evidence. The mere existence of opportunities for examination, or of sources of information, is not sufficient, even though by means of these opportunities and sources, in the absence of any representation at all, a constructive notice to the party would be inferred; the doctrine of constructive notice does not apply where there has been such a representation of fact.'"

Defendant argues that in the case of Teague v. Hall, supra, no inspection of the land was made; hence the rule there laid down, that a vendee has a right to rely on the express statement of the vendor, is not applicable. This contention is untenable. If the defrauded party is not competent to judge the quality of the land, we do not see that it can make any difference whether or not he actually visits the premises. Assuming that if plaintiff had not visited the land he would be entitled to rely upon the representations, it would be unreasonable to say that he would not likewise be entitled to rely upon the representations, even though he visited the land, if as a matter of fact, by reason of his inexperience and ignorance, he was incompetent to judge the quality of the soil. In other words, the fact that the vendee visited the land is important in determining whether he relied and was entitled to rely upon the statements of the vendor. It is apparent that a vendee who actually knew the character of the soil on the land which he inspected would not be heard to say that he relied upon the statements of the vendor; but, where it is shown that the vendee was unacquainted with soils, the fact that he visited the land does not preclude him from saying that he relied upon the vendor's statements. In Beggs v. Spalding (Cal. App.) 204 Pac. 429, cited by the defendant, the person claiming to have been defrauded, not only visited the land, but had experts inspect and examine it. The people who accompanied plaintiff on his inspection of the land were not experienced farmers, nor is there any showing made that they were there to assist plaintiff, so the court was justified in believing that plaintiff relied upon defendant's representations.

In her amended answer defendant set up as a special defense that after the discovery of the alleged fraud plaintiff affirmed the contract by requesting of said defendant that she remit $2,500 of the purchase price due under said contract, and by requesting of said defendant and accepting from her extensions of time for the making of said payments of $2,500, and by selling the pear crop on July 22, 1920, and by selling part of the personal property conveyed to him by said contract and sale, and by offering the land in question for sale.

The evidence on this branch of the case was that soon after he entered into possession of the land plaintiff had trouble with the well and pump, and he discovered that he had not as many chickens as was represented. In the latter part of April, or the early part of May, 1920, plaintiff testified that he was informed by a Portuguese that the land was not sediment soil. Plaintiff sold a cow and some pigs, and in June listed the property for sale. About May 30, 1920, an installment of $2,500 became due, which was never paid. On July 3, 1920, Dr. Freeman visited plaintiff, who complained that various things were not as represented, but plaintiff told Dr. Freeman that he would try to borrow some money in order to meet the installment. Three days later plaintiff wrote to the defendant. In the concluding paragraph of this letter plaintiff said:

"I think you people have taken advantage of me when my mind was not sound and I fíger that I paid you all the place was worth and about $5,000 more as nothing is as you said. I am getting desperat a I have to hal water for everything on the place. A man from Hunts packing co told me that you were almost crazy last year because you could not get water. If you are honest and mean to do right with me you should give me a chance and make good all this representation. There will have to be a pit dug or a new pump which is going to be a great expence and I think you had better let that 2,500 off as I have tried to sell the place for $15,000 and eight different people looked at and would not even consider. And if the place is worth that much to you I will give you the chance to make $3,000. Please give this your attention as I want to hear from you at once."

On July 18, 1920, plaintiff learned for the first time that the defendant received only $1,000 for the 1919 pear crop. He was told this by the purchaser of the 1919 crop. On July 22, 1920, plaintiff sold the pear crop for $1,075, and seven days later the formal notice of rescission was sent to the defendant.

[7-10] Section 1691 of the Civil Code requires the party entitled to rescind "to rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind." Whether or not the defrauded party has rescinded "promptly" will depend upon all the circumstances of the particular case, and is, of course, a question primarily for the trial court. As has been pointed out, there was evidence that plaintiff did not learn of the true character of the soil until the latter part of April, or the first of May, and that in July he learned for the first time that the 1919 crop was sold for $1,000. It is true that plaintiff found out earlier that other things were not as defendant had represented, such as the number of chickens, and that the well was not sufficient to supply the farm. But we may reasonably presume that plaintiff decided that he would put up with these things; and had the farm been of "the finest sediment soil" it might have been worth $18,000; so plaintiff would no doubt hesitate to repudiate his contract for slight cause. There was evidence that all wells in the region of San Jose were low during the summer of 1920, and plaintiff no doubt took this into consideration when he discovered the shortage of water. Further there were no findings with reference to the well or the chickens, so we may presume that the court did not think that they amounted to misrepresentations. We cannot say as a matter of law that when plaintiff discovered the shortage of chickens he was put on constructive notice as to the other frauds. The rule that a person who has discovered that he has been cheated in one particular is put on inquiry as to other possible frauds must be applied with reference to all the circumstances of the case, and is, of course, a question for the trial court to determine. Therefore it would seem that the court was justified in holding that plaintiff offered to rescind within a reasonable time after he discovered the facts which entitled him to rescind.

[11, 12] The findings of the court with reference to the alleged waiver were:

"That plaintiff did not, after the discovery of the said fraud and falsity of the representations which the court finds were made by defendant waive said fraud or affirm the said contract or sale as alleged in defendant's amendment to her answer filed herein or by any other act or conduct on the part of plaintiff."

We consider this a sufficient finding that the plaintiff did not waive the fraud. The question of waiver or nonwaiver was one of fact for the trial court to pass upon, and the acts or conduct which defendant claims constituted said waiver were the evidence to be considered in determining the ultimate fact of waiver or nonwaiver. We have already referred to these acts of the plaintiff, after discovering the alleged fraud, in discussing the question of laches, which is practically the same as the alleged waiver. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that plaintiff intended to and did waive the fraud herein complained of. Whether or not a person has ratified a voidable contract, or elected to affirm it rather than to rescind it, depends primarily upon his intention, and this is shown by his declarations, his acts, or his conduct, which are matters of fact. The question is therefore a question of fact for the determination of the jury. Del Vecchio v. Savelli, 10 Cal. App. 79, 82, 101 Pac. 32; Wilder v. Beede, 119 Cal. 646, 651, 51 Pac. 1083; 27 Cor. Jur. 22, 77.

[13] It is not necessary to discuss all the various alleged errors of law committed by the trial court. The evidence that the defendant received $1,000 for the pears "on the trees" in 1919 was properly admissible, being within the issue raised by the denial of the allegations of the complaint that the defendant stated to plaintiff that said property had, in the year 1919, produced pears of the reasonable value of $1,600, and which were sold for that sum; that such statements were false; and that said crop sold for a sum not exceeding $1,000.

Nor was it necessary that the court should make a finding as to each ground of fraud alleged in the complaint, since, if the findings in plaintiff's favor as made support the judgment (and we are of the opinion that they do), a finding against him upon the remaining charges of fraud would not affect his right to the relief given.

[14] Although there was no specific finding as to the fact that plaintiff received the sum of $1,075 for the 1920 pear crop, plaintiff had so testified, and we must presume that the court took this into consideration when it found—"that there is due from plaintiff to defendant the sum of $300, being the difference between the value of the said personal property sold by plaintiff, together with the value of the use by plaintiff of all the property conveyed to plaintiff by defendant, and, the interest due to plaintiff on the purchase price paid by him to defendant."

In any event, since the plaintiff, in the calculation by which the amount of the offset due to the defendant was found, was charged with the value of the use and occupation of the premises for the time he was in possession, he could not also be charged with the proceeds of said crop of pears.

The judgment is affirmed.

SANTA CRUZ PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v.
SANTA CLARA COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 10394.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1923.)

Courts ⚡90(6)—Decision of Supreme Court that stop notice statute was not applicable to work on public highway adhered to under principle of stare decisis.

Where Supreme Court's decision that Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, providing for a notice to owner to stop payments to contractor, did not apply to work on public highway, has been followed in subsequent decisions and has resulted in an amendment to the statute by enactment of St. 1921, p. 144, making the statute applicable to work on public highways, and, where all the work done on public highways and all payments and adjustments thereunder have been made upon the faith of such decisions, the Supreme Court will adhere to the decision on the principle of stare decisis, regardless of its opinion as to correctness thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by the Santa Cruz Portland Cement Company against the County of Santa Clara and the E. B. & A. L. Stone Company, in which the last-named defendant filed a cross-action against the plaintiff and the first-named defendant. From the judgment rendered, the plaintiff and the last-named defendant both appeal. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, and Louis Oneal and Wm. F. James, both of San Jose (J. F. Shuman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Rea, Cassin & Caldwell and C. C. Coolidge, all of San Jose, and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The appellants in this case concede that the judgment of the trial court is correct and must be affirmed, unless we overrule the decision of Slayden v. O'Dea, 182 Cal. 500, 189 Pac. 1066, to the effect that a stop notice under section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, does not apply to work done in grading a public highway. That decision has been frequently referred to and followed in subsequent decisions, and has resulted in an amendment to section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure. Stats. 1921, p. 144; Hunt v. Empire Securities Co., 50 Cal. App. 43, 194 Pac. 744; Cotton-Macauley Co. v. De Shields (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 386; McMorry v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. App. 76, 201 Pac. 797; County of Sutter v. Sup. Court of Sacramento Co. (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 849. Under these circumstances, even if we considered that that decision was erroneous, as applied to public streets, we must now adhere to the decision upon the principle of stare decisis, particularly as all of the work done upon public streets, and all payments and adjustments thereunder have been made upon the faith of that decision. This, respondents contend, was done in this case. Judgment affirmed.

SATO v. HALL, County Clerk. (Sac. 3249.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1923.)

1. Aliens ⚡68—Judgment naturalizing person appearing on face of judgment to be Japanese void.

Where it appears on the face of a judgment admitting a person to citizenship that he is a member of the Japanese race, the court was without jurisdiction, and its judgment is void.

2. Aliens ⚡67—Though naturalization exclusively within control of federal government, jurisdiction thereof is conferred by Congress on federal and state courts.

Though the naturalization of aliens is exclusively within the control of the federal government, under Act Cong. June 29, 1906, § 3 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4351), jurisdiction to naturalize aliens as citizens of the United States is conferred alike on federal and state courts.

3. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 829(1)—Judgment of federal court, invalid on face, may be disregarded by state court.

The rule that a judgment, invalid on its face, may be assailed in any court is applicable to a judgment by a federal court, and the state court may refuse to recognize such void judgment.

4. Aliens $\Leftrightarrow$ 65—1918 amendment of Naturalization Act does not authorize naturalization of Japanese who served in army; "any alien."

Act Cong. May 9, 1918, amending Act Cong. June 29, 1906, § 4, subd. 7 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 4352), so as to authorize naturalization of Filipinos and Porto Ricans who served in the military forces of the United States and permitting naturalization of any aliens who had so served without compliance with many formalities required of others, section 2 of which repealed inconsistent acts, with a proviso that it should not repeal or enlarge Rev. St. § 2169 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4358), limiting naturalization to free white persons and persons of African descent, except as specified in subdivision 7, in view of the fact that by judicial interpretation "any alien" means any alien of the white or black races, did not enlarge the right to naturalization except in the case of Filipinos and Porto Ricans, and therefore did not authorize the naturalization of a Japanese honorably discharged after service in the United States army.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Any.]

5. Statutes $\Leftrightarrow$ 217—Ambiguous statute construed with aid of debates and discussion attending its passage.

Where a statute is ambiguous, the courts may ascertain the legislative intent by examining the debates and discussions attending its passage.

6. Aliens $\Leftrightarrow$ 65—Act July 19, 1919, did not authorize naturalization of Japanese who served in army.

Act Cong. July 19, 1919, § 1, giving to any alien who served in the forces of the United States during the World War the benefits of Act Cong. June 29, 1906, § 4, subd. 7, as amended (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 4352), which subdivision authorized the naturalization of aliens who had served during the World War, without many of the formalities required of other aliens, does not relax the provisions of previous amendments under which naturalization was limited to Filipinos and Porto Ricans, in addition to persons of the white and African races, and therefore did not authorize the naturalization of a Japanese who served in the army.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Application for mandamus by Ichizo Sato against Harry W. Hall, to compel respondent, as Clerk of the County of Sacramento, to place petitioner's name on the register of voters. From a judgment refusing to permit registration, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Fenstermacher, of Fresno, for appellant.

Albert H. Elliot, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Petitioner appeals from a judgment of the superior court refusing to issue a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, the county clerk of Sacramento county, to place petitioner's name on the register of voters.

On January 21, 1919, petitioner was admitted to citizenship by the United States District Court of the Territory of Hawaii, and a certificate of citizenship was thereupon issued to him. This certificate recites that he is a member of the yellow race, and that at the time of his admission he was a subject of the Emperor of Japan. Petitioner presented his certificate to defendant, and demanded that his name be placed on the register in order to qualify him to vote. The clerk declined to accede to this demand, and pleads as a justification for his action that members of the yellow race are not entitled to naturalization, and that the order admitting petitioner to citizenship is void on its face.

[1] The appellant contends that the order admitting him to citizenship is a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and that this judgment is conclusive as against collateral attack.

This position is untenable. The judgment or certificate shows that the petitioner is a member of a yellow race, and this showing renders the judgment void unless its integrity is preserved by some one of the acts to be hereafter noted. If petitioner were ineligible to citizenship, and this ineligibility appeared upon the face of the judgment of the court admitting him to citizenship, that court was without jurisdiction and its judgment was void.

In Yamashita v. Hinkle, 260 U. S. 199, 43 Sup. Ct. 69, 67 L. Ed. —, recently decided, certificates of naturalization were issued to two Japanese by the superior court of the state of Washington prior to 1906. The secretary of state of the state of Washington refused to receive and file articles of incorporation executed by the two Japanese upon the ground that they were not at the time of their naturalization and never had been entitled to naturalization under the laws of the United States, and therefore were not qualified to form the corporation proposed. The Supreme Court of the state refused a writ of mandamus to compel the secretary of state to issue and file the articles of incorporation, and the case was taken by a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States, where Mr. Justice Sutherland, speaking for the court, said:

"Upon the authority of Takao Ozawa v. United States, supra (43 Sup. Ct. 65), we must hold that the petitioners were not eligible to naturalization, and as this ineligibility appeared upon the face of the judgment of the superior court, admitting petitioners to citizenship, that court was without jurisdiction and its judgment was void. In re Gee Hop (D. C.) 71 Fed. 274; In re Yamashita, 30 Wash. 234, 70 Pac. 482."

[2] Petitioner's next contention is that, assuming that a federal court can set aside as void a certificate of naturalization issued by a state court, there are no cases in which a state court has declared void any certificate of naturalization issued by a federal court.

This contention is also without merit. Jurisdiction to naturalize aliens as citizens of the United States is conferred alike upon federal and state courts (Act of June 29, 1906, § 3, 34 Stats. at Large, 596 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4351]), so we cannot see that it makes any difference whether it is a federal or a state court which issues the void certificate. In either case, if the certificate is void, no rights are created under it, and no one is obliged to recognize it. It is true that the matter of naturalization is exclusively within the control of the government of the United States, but in determining whether or not a state officer has acted properly in refusing to recognize a certificate of naturalization, alleged to be void upon its face, the state court must of necessity inquire whether the court issuing the certificate had jurisdiction.

[3] We therefore hold that the rule that a judgment which shows on its face that it is invalid may be assailed in any court, is applicable to judgments rendered by federal courts.

[4] We then come to the question of whether petitioner is entitled under the general naturalization laws to the privilege of citizenship.

On May 9, 1918 (40 Stats. at Large, 542 [U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 4352]), Congress amended the naturalization laws by adding seven new subdivisions to section 4 of the Naturalization Act of 1906. This Act of June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," consists of 31 sections, and deals primarily with the subject of procedure, and it did not change the fundamental principles of existing law governing in such matters. Ozawa v. United States, supra. We will quote that portion of the seventh subdivision of section 4 of the act of 1906, as amended by the act of 1918, pertinent to our inquiry:

"Any native-born Filipino of the age of twenty-one years and upward who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States and who has enlisted or may hereafter enlist in the United States navy or marine corps or the naval auxiliary service, and who, after service of not less than three years, may be honorably discharged therefrom, or who may receive an ordinary discharge with recommendation for re-enlistment; or any alien, or any Porto Rican not a citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has enlisted or entered or may hereafter enlist in or enter the armies of the United States, either the regular or the volunteer forces, or the national army * * * may, on presentation of the required declaration of intention petition for naturalization without proof of the required five years' residence within the United States. * * * Any alien serving in the military or naval service of the United States during the time this country is engaged in the present war may file his petition for naturalization without making the preliminary declaration of intention and without proof of the required five years' residence within the United States; * * * and any alien, or any person owing permanent allegiance to the United States embraced within this subdivision, may file his petition for naturalization in the most convenient court without proof of residence within its jurisdiction, * * * provided he appears with his two witnesses before the appropriate representative of the Bureau of Naturalization and passes the preliminary examination hereby required before filing his petition for naturalization in the office of the clerk of the court. * * *"

Section 2 of the Act of May 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 547), which we will hereafter refer to as section 2, provides that:

"All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; but nothing in this act shall repeal or in any way enlarge section twenty-one hundred and sixty-nine of the Revised Statutes, except as specified in the seventh subdivision of this act and under the limitation therein defined. * * *"

Section 2169 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. § 4358), referred to in section 2 of the Act of May 9, 1918, reads as follows:

"The provisions of this title shall apply to aliens being free white persons, and to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent."

In all of the naturalization acts from 1790 to 1906 the privilege of naturalization was confined to white persons (with the addition in 1870 of those of African nativity and descent), although the exact wording of the various statutes was not always the same. See Ozawa v. United States, 260 U. S. 178, 43 Sup. Ct. 65, 67 L. Ed. —.

The term "any alien" used in the seventh subdivision of the act of 1918, standing by itself, would certainly be broad enough to include the petitioner; but as this term had been used in prior acts we must assume that Congress, in passing this law, acted with knowledge of all previous legislation and of its interpretation by the courts. We will refer to two acts of Congress granting the privilege of naturalization to aliens who had engaged in military service. The first of these, the Act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stats. at Large, 597), carried into the Revised Statutes as section 2166, and repealed by the Act of May 9, 1918, read as follows:

"Any alien, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has enlisted, or may enlist, in the armies of the United States, either the regular or the volunteer forces, and has been, or may be hereafter, honorably discharged, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become such. * * *

In 1908 a Japanese made application under this section, and it was held that section 2169 was controlling, and limited the privilege of naturalization to white persons and to those of African nativity or descent, and that it did not extend the right of naturalization to a person of the Japanese race, although having an honorable discharge. In re Buntaro Kumagai (D. C.) 163 Fed. 922.

A statute of like import was passed by Congress and approved July 26, 1894, 28 Stats. at Large, 123, 124. In Bessho v. United States, 178 Fed. 245, 101 C. C. A. 605, the Circuit Court of Appeals had before it this act of 1894, authorizing the naturalization of "any alien" 21 years or more of age who had served in the United States navy or marine corps, as therein provided. The court held that this act was limited by the provisions of section 2169, Revised Statutes, in view of the fact that in section 26 of the General Naturalization Act of 1906 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4381), Congress expressly repealed a number of sections of the act of 1873 (as amended in 1875), but it did not mention as repealed section 2169, above quoted. The court construed this omission as a legislative implication that section 2169 was to continue as the law. This was in 1906, and, of course, long after the enactment of the statute of 1894, under which Bessho claimed the right of naturalization. The court denied the petition upon the ground that, although he was a Japanese subject who came within the terms of the act of 1894 as having served in the navy of the United States, he was not entitled to naturalization because he was a member of a race other than the white or black races.

We have, then, this highly suggestive condition: The acts of 1862 (section 2166, Rev. Stats.), 1894, and 1918 all use the common term "any alien," and all of them refer to aliens who have served in the army or navy.

We have shown that under the acts of 1862 and of 1894 there is no question that the words "any alien" mean any alien of the white or black races. The matter stood in this shape when Congress enacted the act of 1918. Since we know that these words in the earlier acts are limited to aliens of the white and black races, we are compelled to assume with equal certainty that the words are used throughout in the same sense. Congress cannot have deliberately enacted the statute of 1918 with the expectation that a new and special meaning should be accorded to these words. If these decisions were, as asserted by petitioner, erroneous, it seems to us all the more reason why Congress would have used in the act of 1918 some phrase other than "any alien" in order to show that it disapproved of these decisions; but as Congress did not do so, we must presume that it used the term "any alien" in the sense in which it had been judicially interpreted.

This brings us to a consideration of the meaning of section 2 of the act of 1918, to which we have referred above, and which provides that nothing in that act shall repeal or in any way enlarge section 2169, Revised Statutes, except as specified in the seventh subdivision of the act and under the limitation therein defined. The clear implication is that section 2169 is not to be repealed, except as it is enlarged by the specifications and limitations contained in the seventh subdivision. In the seventh subdivision, Filipinos, who are neither aliens nor citizens (In re Alverto [D. C.] 198 Fed. 688), and those Porto Ricans not citizens are given the privilege of citizenship. Thus we find an enlargement of section 2169, extending the right to persons who are neither aliens nor white persons. Petitioner, in order to rebut the inference that Congress intended to make Filipino and Porto Rican soldiers and sailors the only ones excepted from the restrictions of section 2169, Revised Statutes, contends that since the expression "any alien" did not include Filipinos and Porto Ricans, it was necessary for Congress to specifically mention them in subdivision 7, in order that they would share the same privileges as "any alien."

This argument is not sound. If Congress mentioned Filipinos and Porto Ricans in subdivision 7 merely to put them on an equality with "any alien," why were the provisions regarding their naturalization stricter than those terms upon which "any alien" could be naturalized? It will be noticed that, in order to come within the purview of the act of 1918, both Filipinos and Porto Ricans must have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and Filipinos must also have had three years' military service, while "any alien serving in the military or naval service of the United States during the time this country is engaged in the present war may file his petition for naturalization without making the preliminary declaration of intention and without proof of the required five years' residence within the United States."

Further, if petitioner's interpretation is correct, it was only necessary for Congress to say in section 2, "That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of this act are hereby repealed;" and section 2169 would be repealed in so far as "aliens, Filipinos, and Porto Ricans" who had seen the required military service were concerned. But when Congress continued and said, "but nothing in this act shall repeal or in any way enlarge section 2169 of the Revised Statutes, except as specified in the seventh subdivision of this act and under the limitation therein defined," it is clear that section 2169, Revised Statutes, is to stand, except as to Filipinos and Porto Ricans. (Italics ours.) In short, after having said that section 2169 was not to be repealed, it was necessary for Congress to add, "except," etc., because as a matter of fact there were two classes mentioned in subdivision 7, namely, Filipinos and Porto Ricans, who were neither free white persons nor of African descent or nativity.

We are not without authority for this construction of the act of 1918. In the Petition of Charr (D. C.) 273 Fed. 207, recently decided, it was held that petitioner, a Korean, a subject of Japan, who had been in the military service, was not entitled to citizenship under the act of 1918. Referring to the effect of section 2, the court said:

"The exceptions referred to must have been the races especially mentioned in the seventh subdivision, and the limitation was the military or naval service performed. In other words, under the general law, neither a Filipino nor a Porto Rican could necessarily have been admitted to citizenship. Under this subdivision, he may be, irrespective of race, if he has performed the service specified."

In Re Para (D. C.) 269 Fed. 643, the court reached the same result, denying certificates to a South American Indian and to a Japanese, who had served in our military forces during the late war. In the course of its opinion, the court said:

"If the words 'any alien' are to be taken literally, not only would a meaning be given wholly contrary to existing judicial interpretation, but all the definitions of section 2169 would be rendered meaningless, and even Chinese who had served in the army could be naturalized, in spite of the express language to the contrary. However worthy may have been the military services of the petitioners, I can find no warrant in the statutes for their naturalization. The words 'any alien,' appearing in the act of May 9, 1918, are subject to prior judicial interpretation, and in my opinion embrace only such aliens as could theretofore have been admitted to citizenship, and merely provide more expeditious and favorable terms of admission than before existed."

In this contention, it is significant to note that in Ozawa v. United States, supra, in which it was held that one of the Japanese race and born in Japan was not eligible to citizenship under our naturalization laws, one of the questions certified to the Supreme Court by the Circuit Court of Appeals was, "If said act of June 29, 1906, is limited by section 2169, and naturalization is limited to aliens being free white persons and to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent, is one of the Japanese race, born in Japan, under any circumstances eligible to naturalization?" The answer given to this question by the Supreme Court of the United States was "No." In view of the fact that many courts were being called upon to decide the status of Japanese who had seen military service, we are convinced that the Supreme Court had such Japanese in mind when it said that under no conditions could a Japanese born in Japan be eligible to naturalization.

[5] If the act of 1918 is ambiguous, then, according to well-recognized principles of statutory interpretation, in order to ascertain the intention of Congress, we may look to the debates and discussions attending the passing of the act. Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 12 Sup. Ct. 511, 36 L. Ed. 226; Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold, etc., 93 U. S. 634, 23 L. Ed. 995. A careful reading of the Congressional Record will show that the committee which reported the bill to Congress, in response to questions from the floor, repeatedly said that the act would not apply to those not capable of citizenship. We will quote a paragraph from a speech in Congress by one of the framers of the bill. He said in part:

"Subdivision 7 has been prepared for the purpose of unifying the rules of exemptions extended to certain aliens, who have received military training in armies of the United States and in the Philippine Islands as well as those serving on vessels of the United States Government and American merchant marine. It also makes the first enlargement ever authorized of the provisions of section 2169, by allowing Filipinos who have served in the United States navy or marine corps or the naval auxiliary service, and have been honorably discharged therefrom after the term of enlistment specified in the petition for naturalization under the conditions and limitations defined in the seventh subdivision, and includes all those who are at present in the military service of the United States, whether they have declared their intention or not. * * * In the general repealing portion of the section the provision as to the effect of this act upon section 2169 of the Revised Statutes, is clearly shown not to enlarge it in any way except as to the Filipinos who have performed the service in the navy as defined in subdivision 7." Congressional Record, May 3, 1918, pp. 6022, 6023.

It appears also from the discussion before the committee which drafted the amendment that it was clearly intended to give the amendment the construction herein reached.

[6] Our attention has been called to the Act of July 19, 1919 (41 Stats. at Large, 222), which reads as follows:

"Any person of foreign birth who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the present war, after final examination and acceptance by the said military or naval authorities, and shall have been honorably discharged after such acceptance and service, shall have the benefits of the seventh subdivision of section 4 of the Act of June 29, 1906, Thirty Four Statutes at Large, part, 1, page 596, as amended, and shall not be required to pay any fee therefor; and this provision shall continue for the period of one year after all the American troops are returned to the United States."

It will be noticed that petitioner's naturalization preceded the enactment of this statute, but it is claimed that this statute being the latest legislative expression of this subject-matter, evinces a congressional intent to include all aliens, soldiers, and sailors who complied with the terms of the statute. This act appears to extend the period of six months specified in said subdivision 7 to one year, to extend its provisions to aliens serving during the present war to one year after their discharge, and to dispense with the payment by them of any fee. It makes no other changes. In the Petition of Charr, supra, in speaking of the act of 1919, the court said:

"Because of the importance of the question involved and the earnestness of counsel, the court has made further investigation of the proceedings in Congress attending this legislation, in order, if possible, to ascertain the intent and purpose of that body in view of the claimed ambiguity in the language employed. This enactment appears in the naturalization section of the Sundry Civil Act, Public No. 21, 66th Congress. It is not mentioned in the report on the bill, and a search of the Congressional Record discloses that it was not mentioned in any of the debates, either in the House or Senate, and therefore there is nothing in the records of Congress to show the intent of Congress as to this particular section. * * * It would seem, therefore, that this clause of the naturalization section of the act approved July 19, 1919, was simply attached as a rider to an appropriation bill, and went through without scrutiny or debate by either house. It cannot, therefore, in the absence of language clearly expressing that purpose, be held to relax the provisions of the prior Act of May 9, 1918, which have been duly considered."

In view of the fact that the discussions preceding the enactment of the act of 1918 emphatically show that Congress did not intend to include within the scope of that act persons not otherwise entitled to citizenship, we cannot believe that it would have changed this policy after the war was over, without mature consideration. Therefore we do not regard the act of 1919 as expressing a different legislative intent from that of the previous acts.

As was said in a recent case, it may be conceded that the services rendered by the petitioner should be appropriately rewarded; but the privilege of citizenship resting with Congress, and with Congress alone, the courts have no power to alter or extend the provisions of law to that end.

We are constrained to hold that the petition was properly denied and accordingly the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

IN RE BRYSON'S ESTATE.

ASHBY v. BRYSON et al.

1. Wills $\S$ 166(1) — Evidence held not to prove undue influence.

In a will contest, evidence held insufficient to make out a prima facie case of undue influence.

2. Wills $\S$ 165(2)—Testimony of conversation with testatrix eight years after execution of will held properly excluded.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, a question whether witness had a conversation with testatrix relative to her property on a certain date eight years after the will and codicils were executed was too remote, and had no tendency to prove undue influence at the time of execution, and was properly excluded.

3. Wills $\S$ 384—Testimony of attesting witness that testatrix was free from undue influence, though improperly admitted, harmless.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, testimony of an attesting witness that testatrix was acting of her own free will, and not under undue influence or fraud, even if erroneously admitted in the absence of an issue of insanity, was harmless.

4. Wills $\S$ 163(1)—Fraud must be proved, and cannot be presumed.

Fraud must be proved, and cannot be presumed.

5. Wills $\S$ 159—Necessary that undue influence produce effect.

To prove undue influence in procuring the execution of a will, it is necessary to show that the undue influence was exercised at the very time the will was executed, and that it produced an effect on testator's mind by which the will he executed was not an expression of his own desires.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Application by Isaac H. Bryson and another for the probate of the will of Evaline Bryson, deceased, contested by John Bryson Ashby. From a judgment of nonsuit, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Newby & Palmer and O. L. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ingall W. Bull, Henry T. Gage, and Harold Larson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. At the close of appellant's case respondents moved for a nonsuit, which motion was granted. The appeal is from the judgment entered thereon.

Evaline Bryson died testate on or about June 17, 1920, in the county of Los Angeles, a resident of said county, this state, leaving personal and real property of the value of about $91,000. Decedent's will was executed November 1, 1909. Two codicils, the first of which was dated February 22, 1915, and the second April 2, 1915, were executed. All of the children living, and the representatives of deceased children of the marriage of John Bryson, Sr., and Evaline Bryson, were made beneficiaries under the provisions of said will. Evaline Bryson survived her husband by several years.

The Bryson Block, a very valuable piece of property, situate in the city of Los Angeles, and acquired a number of years prior to the execution of said will, was the principal source of the elder Bryson's wealth, and the accumulated earnings therefrom constitute the greater portion of decedent's estate, the distribution of which is contested. Isaac H. Bryson and John Henry Bryson, son and nephew, respectively, of decedent, were named in said will executors without bonds. They filed a petition praying that said will and codicils be admitted to probate, and that letters testamentary be issued to them. Objections and a contest to the probate thereof were filed by John Bryson Ashby, a grandson, July 20, 1920, alleging that the will and codicils are the products of undue influence exercised and brought to bear upon the mind of decedent by her son, Isaac H. Bryson. The facts specifically alleged by contestant are that decedent was unfamiliar with business affairs, and for a period of 20 years prior to her death, by reason of her advanced years, she had been and continued until her death to be weak in body and mind, unable to transact business or care for her property, and that she was in constant need of personal care and attention; that during all of said period she resided with and was cared for by her son, Isaac H. Bryson, at decedent's home, and was entirely dependent upon him for care and attention; that, by reason of her advanced years, lack of business experience, and also by reason of her dependency upon her said son for care and attention, said son acquired and had at the time of the formal execution of said will and codicils a great and controlling influence over her mind and will, and was able thereby to, and did, direct and dictate to her in matters relative to her property; that said Isaac H. Bryson possessed, and for many years prior to the execution of said will and codicils possessed, a most violent temper, and at many times prior to, and about the time of the execution of said will and codicils, displayed in the presence of testatrix fits of anger when she did anything that displeased him, and he raved at and scolded decedent to the extent that she was in fear and dread of his wrath; that while she was in the condition of body and mind described, and under the domination and control of her said son, he, with the intent and for the purpose of procuring the said Evaline Bryson to execute said purported will and codicils, and for the purpose of "taking an undue and unfair advantage of her said condition and of his domination and control of her, as aforesaid, and taking a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of her necessities and distress of mind and body, at, and many times before, the time of the formal execution of said purported will * * * and codicils, did present to the said Evaline Bryson papers and documents for her signature, and did not read or explain to said decedent what the documents were, and said decedent had confidence in and depended entirely upon her said son, Isaac H. Bryson, for the handling of and the transacting of all her said business"; that said son stated to her that her children were spendthrifts, and could not preserve or care for any property which they might receive from her estate, and that they had no filial affection for her, but were anxiously awaiting her death to obtain and squander her property; that said son, Isaac H. Bryson, demanded of decedent that "she should by codicils declare a complete settlement with him [Isaac H. Bryson], and provide in said will a condition of forfeiture if any of the heirs should attempt to contest the same"; that, by means of the statements and demands hereinbefore set out, said Isaac H. Bryson prevailed upon said decedent while she was in said weakened condition, and so under his domination and control as to be unable to resist his influence upon her, both at the time of the execution of said will and said codicils, and did thereby influence her against her will and wishes to execute in form said purported will and codicils; that all of said statements made by said Isaac H. Bryson to influence said decedent were untrue, and were known by said Isaac H. Bryson to be untrue at the time the same were made, and were intended to and did prejudice testatrix against her children and grandchildren; that by reason of her weakened mental and bodily conditions she was unable to resist said undue influence of said Isaac H. Bryson, and that said will and codicils are the product of said undue influence; that, had she been free from said undue influence, she would not have executed said will and codicils, or either.

As a second ground of contest it is alleged that many years prior to the execution of the will or codicils said Isaac H. Bryson had complete control of all the business affairs of decedent, and controlled her property and money as his own, and so great was her confidence in him that she signed papers and documents prepared or caused to be prepared by him without reading them or knowing the contents thereof; that for the 10 years preceding her death she kept no account of her property, and at the time of the execution of said codicils she did not know what property stood in her name; that on the 10th day of February, 1915, with the intention of defrauding said decedent he caused her to convey by grant deed to him, Isaac H. Bryson, and to Susan E. Bryson, his wife, as joint tenants, certain described Kern county lands; that since 1907 large sums of money belonging to said Evaline Bryson came into the hands of said Isaac H. Bryson as her agent, which moneys were handled and controlled by him for her; that the said Evaline Bryson depended upon and trusted the said Isaac H. Bryson in the handling thereof; that, if the said Evaline Bryson had known the facts about her money and property and the amount expended by the said Isaac H. Bryson, she would not have executed the codicil declaring a full settlement with him; that it was because of a lack of knowledge in this respect that she was induced by the said Isaac H. Bryson to declare a full settlement with him, and to declare an exoneration of the moneys and property used and held by him, and she was thereby influenced to declare in her said codicil that he was the owner of the real estate heretofore referred to; that, believing and relying upon said Isaac H. Bryson in the handling of said property, and believing that said property would be accounted for, she was induced to execute the said purported codicil, which she would not have done had she known the real facts concerning her property.

All of the material allegations laid as a basis for the charges of undue influence, or which may be claimed to show mental weakness, are specifically denied. It is admitted by petitioners that since about the year 1907, in obedience to the earnest request and wish of Evaline Bryson, her said son, Isaac H. Bryson, took up his residence with her, and thereafter resided continuously at her home in the city of Los Angeles until her death, and gave her all proper care and attention of which she was in need, and which he as a dutiful son should have given, but it is denied that she at any time entirely depended upon him solely because of the care and attention he gave her as a son. It is also admitted that Evaline Bryson had confidence in said Isaac H. Bryson during the time he was handling and transacting all of her business which she voluntarily intrusted to his care, but it is alleged that she at all times did receive from him proper accounts and reports of all business handled or transacted by him, and that she personally examined said reports and accounts, and approved the same when correct, and that she was at all times mentally capable of doing so. It is denied that Isaac H. Bryson had control of her property or that she signed papers or documents without a knowledge of the contents thereof. It is affirmatively alleged that she was at all times acting freely and voluntarily in all matters of business and otherwise, and that at the time of the execution of said will and codicils she was of sound and disposing mind and memory, free from duress, menace, undue influence, or deceit of any kind whatsoever.

Testatrix by her will gave to her daughter, Margaret Jane Krause, mother of contestant, the piano then at the home of the latter, and all jewelry she should own at the time of her death. To Nettie E. Bryson, widow of her deceased son, William, she gave $2,000. In the event of her death this bequest was to be distributed to the other legatees in equal shares. To her sons Isaac H., John M., James F. and to her daughter, Margaret Jane Krause, and to Nettie E. Bryson, widow of her deceased son Edward Bryson, and to Alice Bryson, widow of her deceased son Albert F. Bryson, she gave an undivided one-sixth interest in the piano and all the furniture which she should own at the time of her death. Upon the death of Isaac H. Bryson, his wife, Susan E. Bryson, was to succeed to his one-sixth interest in said furniture. Any disagreements between said heirs as to the selection of particular articles or pieces of furniture was to be overcome by the sale of such particular piece or pieces in disagreement, and the proceeds were to be divided proportionately among said heirs. All existing notes, accounts, and debts, with legal interest due thereon, owing to her by any of her beneficiaries, whether barred or not by the statute of limitations, were to be treated as advancements made to said beneficiaries respectively, and deducted from his or her share of decedent's estate. The executors were instructed not to sue for the collection of said indebtednesses, but to inventory the same, and cause the proper deductions to be made from the distributive share of such beneficiaries as may be shown to be her debtors, and not expressly released from their obligation. Specific instructions were given that the indebtedness of Margaret J. Krause should be deducted from her share. This indebtedness was evidenced by two promissory notes, one of which was dated August 15, 1905, and was given for the payment of the sum of $1,410, signed by Margaret J.

Krause and O. W. Krause; the other bore date June 2, 1902, and was for the payment of a note in the sum of $1,705, executed by John B. Ashby, contestant herein, and his mother, Margaret Jane Krause. The will declares that all of testatrix's heirs had been theretofore provided for by a deed and trust agreement executed by her and her predeceased husband, John Bryson, Sr., by the terms of which the remainder in fee of a very valuable piece of property situate in the city of Los Angeles, known as the Bryson Block, was conveyed to the Bryson Estate Company, a corporation, for the benefit of said heirs subject to certain trusts. John Bryson, Sr., had, some time prior to the incorporation of said trust estate company and prior to the execution of said will, executed a mortgage upon his undivided one-half interest in said property to the Title Trust & Guaranty Company, a corporation of the city of Los Angeles, as security for the payment of $25,000, which principal sum was still unpaid at the time the will was executed. Apprehensive that said heirs would be unwilling or unable to discharge this mortgage indebtedness at maturity, and to the end that said Bryson Block might be preserved to her said heirs, and to prevent the foreclosure of said mortgage, she bequeathed and devised to her executors herein, in trust, the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate, with full power to collect, receive, and accumulate all the rents and profits of said property, and to pay from the net income of said property the balance of the principal and interest as may become due upon the maturity of said note and mortgage given by John Bryson, Sr., to said Title Trust & Guaranty Company, with full authority to pay the note and to discharge the mortgage in such manner as they may deem fit and proper. Subject to said trust created by will, and in the event of its failure or termination, said testatrix devised and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate to the heirs above named in undivided one-sixth interests. In the event of the death of Isaac H. his wife was to succeed to his interest. Mrs. Nettie E. Bryson, widow of a deceased son, was to enjoy her interest during widowhood, the remainder upon remarriage or death to vest in her two children. All other devises or bequests were absolute. In the event that said mortgage was fully paid before the close of the administration of her estate the income from said Bryson Block was to be equally divided, and be payable monthly to said heirs. Testatrix declared that her son, Isaac H., named as one of the executors of her will was not indebted to her in any sum whatever, and she expressly stated that she did not wish, in any event, that any deduction should be made from his share on account of any claim or any pretended advancement made to him.

Clause "Seventh" of said will provides that, in order to guard against waste and willful or negligent expense to her estate caused by litigation, and to the end that the beneficiaries named in her will who are satisfied to abide by its provisions may receive their respective allotted shares undiminished by the expense caused by dissatisfied heirs or legatees, each devise and bequest is made subject to the provisions of said clause "Seventh," which in effect provides that, should any of said heirs, legatees, or devisees, or any of their heirs or descendants entitled to succeed to his or her share under said will, individually or jointly, bring, instigate, or maintain any contest or court proceedings for the revocation of or against the probate of said will, or who shall refuse to abide by all or any of its provisions, such heir, devisee, or legatee shall bear the costs, expenses, charges, and attorneys' fees which said estate may incur in the defense of said contest or opposition should the same prove unsuccessful, and the executors are authorized and directed to deduct said costs of defense, including attorneys' fees, from the distributive share or shares of such heir or heirs as should contest.

Said Isaac H. Bryson and John Henry Bryson, named executors without bonds, are authorized to sell, mortgage, or lease any or all of decedent's property, real, personal, or mixed, without being first required to obtain an order of court so to do or to file any petition therefor, and are empowered to make sales, mortgages, or leases in such manner as may seem to them to be for the best interests of said estate.

On February 22, 1915, decedent executed a codicil to said will whereby she revoked the legacy giving to Margaret Jane Krause all of the jewelry which she might own at the time of her death. She explained that this change was made necessary for the reason that, since the execution of said will, she had made presents of diamonds and valuable jewelry to certain of her children, and only trinkets and inconsequential pieces of jewelry such as she might own at the time of her death were to be distributed to said heirs on the same terms as were prescribed for the distribution of her furniture. It was also provided that the following gifts should not be treated as advancements: The house and lot situate at Tropic, county of Los Angeles, deeded to John F. Bryson; the house and lot, being No. 158, South Oxford avenue, Los Angeles city, granted to John M. Bryson; certain land situate in Kern county granted to Isaac H. Bryson and wife. It was also expressly directed that the bequests of $25,000 theretofore given to each of her children then living (including the mother of contestant) and to the wives of deceased sons should not be deemed advancements. Clause "Seventh" of said will was modified so as to provide that, should any heir, devisee, or legatee under said will, maintain, instigate, and contest or bring any action for the revocation thereof, individually or jointly, such heir or heirs should not share in her estate, and the share of such contestant shall be distributed ratably to the residuary devisees and legatees who had taken no part in instigating or conducting such contest or litigation. It is provided, ex industria, that, in the event that the children of Margaret Jane Krause and Alice Bryson shall bring any action or contest or claim against her estate, the provisions made by her will for the said Margaret Jane Krause and Alice Bryson shall fail, and the share of each shall be ratably apportioned among such remaining residuary legatees and devisees as shall not take part in or instigate such contest or opposition. The legacy of $2,000 made to Nettie E. Bryson was withdrawn by the codicil for the reason that substantial advancements had been made to her since the execution of said will.

All of the devises and bequests were made subject to the forfeiture clause. On this subject the testatrix made the following observations:

"Said provisions made for my said beneficiaries are conditioned upon their acceptance without question of these my last wishes, and are especially subject to this [forfeiture] clause. During my life I have treated all of my relatives affectionately and as fairly and justly as my best judgment permitted, and I have often made not altogether slight sacrifices for many of them, and if my trust in their sense of duty and gratitude shall be disappointed by unseemly and troublesome litigation after my death, I desire that my executors shall enforce this provision to the fullest extent according to law. My abiding faith in God bids me hope, however, that each and all of my heirs, legatees and devisees, and their children, will respect my judgment, name and memory by abstaining from selfish litigation over the small residue left of my estate in consideration of my liberal allowances and benefactions during my long, but not always, happy life."

The only change or modification made to the will by the second codicil consisted in the transfer of the share given to John M. Bryson to his son, Frank Bryson. The cause for this change was the death of John M. Bryson, occurring since the execution of the codicil dated February 22, 1915.

The pleadings are set out at considerable length for the purpose of showing the character of the acts, circumstances, relations, and transactions from which it is claimed the web of undue influence was woven. The allegations of the petition are somewhat vague, and in some instances the allegations of fact relied upon to establish a ground of contest on a particular theory conflict with and are repugnant to the statement of facts essential to and elsewhere pleaded for the purpose of establishing a different theory. The provisions of the will are also set out at large, as they furnish the best answer that may be made to contestant's charges of undue influence. There is nothing about the will or its codicils that suggests the indulgence of unreasonable preferences made in favor of one heir over another or an unfair or inequitable distribution of testatrix's estate among her children then living and the representatives of those deceased. If the proponent, Isaac H. Bryson, attempted to unduly influence testatrix in the disposal of her property, his efforts for some reason were rendered futile and his plans signally miscarried. The contestant was but a grandchild, and, so far as the record shows, had no reason to expect that he would be made the object of her bounty. In 1902 he borrowed from her, as evidenced by a promissory note executed by himself and his mother, the sum of $1,705, which he never paid, and it was this indebtedness that testatrix in her will provided should be treated as an advancement made to contestant's mother, and deducted, together with another note made jointly by her and C. W. Krause, from her share of the estate. There is no evidence in the record showing that he held any deep affection for her, or that he was exceptionally considerate of her pleasure and happiness. The record does show, however, that until 1913 he frequently importuned his grandmother for moneys and property on behalf of himself and his mother. From the year 1913 to the year of her death—a period of seven years—he paid but two or three visits to the home of the testatrix. The principal basis of contestant's claim, as we gather it from the record, is to be found in the fact that his own and his mother's indebtedness, amounting to $3,115, was not forgiven by testatrix. Another cause of grievance arises from the fact that the testatrix did not give his mother, Margaret Jane Krause, a home, inasmuch as she had given homes to three or four of the children. There can be no possible doubt but that Mrs. Krause was attentively cared for by her mother, who seems to have made frequent contributions of money to her, and was at all times solicitous of her comfort. Besides, Mrs. Krause lived on her mother's property for a considerable portion of time, visited her house frequently, received gifts of jewelry and diamonds, and was treated by testatrix in a fair and generous manner. This appears not only from the evidence, but also from the observations made by testatrix as set forth in her will, and which stand undenied. Mrs. Krause had received, as had each of the children, a gift of $25,000 in cash. By the will she shared equally with the balance in all the property that testatrix left. She was called upon, however, to pay from her legacy the debts that she and contestant justly owed the estate. This requirement on the part of testatrix seems to constitute, so far as contestant is concerned, the real "head and front of her offending." Neither contestant nor his mother contributed especially to, or aided in the accumulation of the estate which contestant would now have distributed in a manner contrary to the wishes of testatrix. She, better than any one else, knew of the many benevolences she had bestowed upon each of her children and the justice of the situation which should direct her course. Running through the whole case may be traced the thread of suspicion that Isaac H. Bryson took a dishonest advantage of the confidence that was reposed in him. His mother unquestionably had abiding faith in his integrity and his business judgment. In 1907 he displaced as manager of the Bryson Block a brother whose management had been very unsatisfactory. He was also made vice president of the Bryson Estate Company, of which his mother was president. He held her general power of attorney and transacted practically all her business. From 1907 until her death he and his wife resided at her home. For a time he paid for himself and wife $70 a month as board and also contributed toward supplying household provisions. Full and complete reports of the receipts and disbursements in the management of the Bryson Block and the business transacted for his mother were made monthly. Books of account were kept in perfect shape, and showed the full volume of business transacted in the management of said Bryson estate, as well as for and on behalf of the mother. The record does not contain one transaction that would justify the inference of dishonesty on his part. All funds were accounted for. While he and his wife were residing with testatrix other members of her family often visited the home, consulting and advising with testatrix as freely as they desired.

[1] The directors of the Estate Company consisted of the members of testatrix's family—sons and daughters, and in some instances wives of deceased sons and grandchildren. They met in large numbers at testatrix's home to transact the business of the company. These meetings furnished the occasion not only for the discussion of business matters, but family affairs as well. On numerous occasions discord prevailed. Harsh accusations and bitter denunciations, occasioned by jealousies, suspicions, and fears that Isaac H. Bryson or some one of the heirs had ingratiated himself or herself into the favor of the mother, and was receiving more than an equal share of the estate, were not infrequently heard. Much anxiety was manifested by certain of the heirs as to whether or not testatrix had made a will, and, if so, the nature of its provisions. It was at these meetings that most all of the statements relied upon to sustain the charge of undue influence were made by Isaac H. Bryson. The statements charged against him were, no doubt, in some instances caused by provocative circumstances. In other instances they were made by way of disapproval of the personal conduct of some one of the heirs, or their descendants, or in resentment of an attempt on the part of certain heirs to frustrate some business policy advanced by him. All of the statements were made during open discussions, in a loud voice, in the presence of a number of the heirs, and were at no time made with the slightest regard of secrecy. It is not to be wondered at that such inartful and uncrafty methods as shown by the testimony should have failed to unduly influence, if such was the intent. It is contrary to the experience of life that a person moved by a design to unduly influence one to the hurt of others openly forewarns his intended victim of his purpose.

A few quotations from and references to the testimony will serve to illustrate the language used by Isaac H. Bryson to his mother and to other members of the family in her presence upon which contestant relies very largely to make out a case of undue influence.

Mrs. Lillian Burns, a witness personally unfriendly to respondent Bryson, who had resided at testatrix's house for a short time either in 1913 or 1916 (she was uncertain as to time), testified that she had heard respondent say to his mother concerning the visits made by other members of the family to the Bryson home, "What do you want them for; what are they coming here for; they want your money; they are always after your money," and the mother would reply, "Not necessarily." Isaac would say: "He didn't want them to come; he disliked them and they were not fit to associate with." He spoke of Ashby as a dishonest man; he couldn't do anything that was right; he never did do anything that was right, honest, and upright; he didn't wish him to come to the house." He also stated that he would be glad when the Bryson property should be sold for taxes; that it would be sold for taxes, and that the young people would be through with it. He further said that the sooner "we get through with the property the sooner they will have less to fight about." Witness heard testatrix say that she expected to give each one of her children a home. Isaac remarked to his mother that if she was not careful they would go to the poor-house; that they were spending money carelessly.

Louise Gerstmann did the housework at the Bryson home from February, 1907, to February, 1918. During the first two or three years of her connection with the family she heard frequent conversations with Isaac and his mother. "I heard them talk about the will, because you know they never had any secrets; they just told everything; everything was open; everybody knew what I know. They told me that Mrs. Krause was going to get the diamonds." The witness believed that it was in 1909 she heard them talking about the will. Mrs. Isaac Bryson told her that Mother Bryson had made a will. Isaac never talked with the witness about his business. She could not state what Isaac had said about the execution of the will. The making of the will was discussed at the table in the presence of company. She heard Mrs. Krause say that Mother Bryson had made a will. Isaac said that Mrs. Krause was to get the diamonds. "That is all [diamonds] I remember about that will. I don't know if there was anything else in it." Isaac said the rest of the family would "go through with everything; they would spend everything." The witness stated that "there was always trouble among the relatives; somebody always done something or said something." There was always turmoil. She heard Isaac say that if it was not for him the mother would not have anything, as the others did not save, and he saw to it that she had plenty of money. When the question was raised by Isaac about the selling of the Bryson Block there was a big "fuss." She heard him say that Mrs. Krause had received too much money already; that they had been supporting her right along. He also made the statement that contestant drank, and that he was "just like his father." The witness said there were six or seven at the table at every meal. She heard Isaac denounce Mrs. Webber, Mrs. Krause's daughter. He was angry at other members of the family, but never at his mother. He was always kind to her. He did not want the other members of the family to visit so often. Mrs. Krause was given money by her mother; if she did not come to the house it was sent to her. Witness thought she was given about $5 per week. Witness heard Mrs. Krause complain to her mother that Mrs. Isaac Bryson knew the contents of her will, and she, a daughter, should also know the provisions of her will. The mother said: "Maggie, Isaac will do the right thing." Testatrix also said that if it was not for Isaac she would not have anything; that she depended upon him because he was honest. She heard her say: "I hope Isaac will outlive me, for I wouldn't know what to do without him." She never knew his mother to oppose him.

Mrs. Alice Bryson Ashby, the wife of contestant, testified that she heard testatrix state to Mrs. Krause that she would do anything in the world for her, but she could not give her money because Isaac would not let her have it; that he took care of her business. Mrs. Krause had commenced a suit against her father, John Bryson, Sr., which made Isaac very angry, and he told contestant that if he did not have his mother withdraw the suit he did not want him or his wife to ever again speak to him; that "if he didn't have his mother withdraw the suit she wouldn't get a cent of father's or mother's money; we will have them cut out of the will without a dollar." This occurred in 1895.

Ella H. Fisher, a daughter of Jane Bryson, who resided in Colorado, visited testatrix in 1902. She had not been in the house more than two weeks before she had a "fuss" with Isaac. She took exception to the location of the home testatrix had purchased for witness' mother and father. This ended in angry words with Isaac, who made reference to her in uncomplimentary terms.

Hattie Bryson, wife of James S. Bryson, testified that in 1910 testatrix said that she was going to give each of her children $5,000 with which to purchase a home. John had already received that amount, and witness received $3,500 to pay on a home.

In 1913 Lillian Webber, contestant's sister, visited the Bryson home in company with her mother, Mrs. Krause, and asked testatrix if she intended to give her mother a home. Testatrix said: "You will have to ask Uncle Isaac." Isaac became angry, "and told us both to get up and get out; he wasn't going to be annoyed by us." Testatrix said she was poor, and had no money. Mrs. Webber replied by stating that testatrix was receiving $1,500 or $1,600 a month from the Bryson Block. Testatrix said, "I haven't got it." The witness related a difficulty that occurred between her and Isaac concerning the release of a $6,000 mortgage made by Henry Bryson to testatrix. Isaac said the mortgage had not been released, and witness said it had been satisfied, citing the page and book of the records. Isaac said he would rather see the beggars in the street have it than to have any of "you people get any of this money." He said the notes held against contestant and his mother would be paid, all right; that they would be deducted from Mrs. Krause's interest in the estate.

Vernon H. Peck, a real estate agent, gave testimony to the effect that in the year 1915, while calling in a social way at the residence of testatrix she stated that she wanted to get a couple or three homes—one for Maggie, one for John and Lizzie, and she might want to get a third one. On his fourth call in respect to the matter she told him that she was disappointed; that Isaac would not let her buy anything because he said there was not any money. The purchase price of one of the houses submitted was $8,400. The witness had formerly been associated with contestant in a business way.

Joseph Sentman Bryson, a son of Samuel Albert Bryson, was asked by his grandmother to become a director of the Bryson Estate Company. He said that if he became a director he wanted it understood that he would not take orders from any one. Isaac asked him why he would refuse to take orders from him. He said that he thought he was biased towards certain members of the family, and, if elected a director, he would do what was just and right. Isaac said that taking orders from him was not worse than taking money from the company, as his father had done when he was agent for the Bryson building. This reference to an unpleasant subject caused testatrix to begin to cry, and she said: "Yes; your father took money while he was agent of the Bryson building, and Isaac can prove it." Witness was not elected a director, but Henry Bryson was elected to fill the vacancy. He had also heard Isaac speak many times of the $1,700 that John Ashby owed testatrix, and had heard him use bad names when speaking about him. The witness, however, was elected a director of the Bryson Estate Company in 1909 and continued thereafter to serve with Isaac as such. He said that Isaac put all the motions that were voted on at the directors' meetings. Isaac claimed that the property was depreciating in value, and, as there were many untenanted rooms, he advocated dissolving the trust and giving each heir $10,000 for his or her interest. This was opposed by certain of the heirs. Upon the defeat of his plans he said: "All they are waiting for is for you to die to get your money, and that the block might be sold for taxes." He also said the mother might have to go to the poorhouse, and if the heirs received their money they would go through it in a short time. He had heard Isaac in conversation with his mother upon many occasions, as witness was in the habit of visiting the Bryson home almost daily, and took part in the conversations. He had seen Isaac arise when anything displeased him and clench his fist and use profanity. Witness heard him say that John Bryson was a crook and a deadbeat. On one occasion, as John Ashby was passing out of testatrix's house, Isaac cried: "There comes that God damn deadbeat all dressed up like a millionaire; if he would pay his bills he would not be able to dress that way."

John F. Bryson, son of testatrix, repeated very largely the testimony already given. He spoke of Isaac's dislike of Mrs. Krause, and had heard him say that she was "no good," and disparage her character. He also spoke very disapprovingly of John Ashby.

Several instances were related by members of the Bryson family showing what is claimed to have been outbursts of anger on the part of Isaac. No doubt those instances were related to show that they must have produced a coercive or terrorizing influence upon the mother's mind. The few exhibitions of temper described occurred at meetings of the family, and were provoked in the discussion of business affairs. They also arose out of the resistance offered by Isaac to the efforts of certain heirs to obtain money or property from testatrix, or criticisms of his management of the estate, or were the effect of insinuations made affecting his honesty and motives. In no sense was the display of temper calculated to influence nor could it have had the effect of unduly influencing the mother to disinherit a single member of her family. She was by no means in fear of her son Isaac. Every witness who spoke on the subject admitted that he was always kind to her, and never spoke in harsh terms to her. The evidence has impressed us, as it did the trial judge, that he was a dutiful and affectionate son.

Much of the evidence introduced into the case would have been relevant in an action for an accounting—a theory on which a pleading was at one time framed—but was wholly immaterial to the issue of undue influence. A good part of it was directed to conversations had a long time after the execution of the will and codicils.

The suggestion that testatrix did not know that she owned property or what its value was or the kind and character of such property at any time during her life is an absurd contention in the face of the testimony and the statements of those who were importuning her for favors. It is true that she told real estate agents, who doubtless were using their best efforts to persuade her to purchase rather expensive homes for certain children, that Isaac had said there was no money, or that she told them she was poor. It is a fair and natural inference to be drawn from the history of the family transactions that testatrix made Isaac her business agent and attorney for the purpose of protecting herself from both the stress of importuning heirs and from the annoyances of business life. Testatrix was 82 years past at the time Isaac became her attorney and agent; she was 84 years of age when she executed her will, 90 when she executed the codicils, and 95 at the time of her death. Witnesses who had known her long and well and had seen her often in her later life wondered at her strength of mind. Henry T. Gage, a former Governor of this state, said of her: "She was a woman of remarkably clear mind, a bright woman; remarkably bright for a woman of her years or not of her years." Witnesses to the execution of the will and codicils testified to the same effect. Louise Gerstmann, the lady in charge of her household affairs from 1907 to 1920, testified that "she was the dearest old lady that ever was, and very patient. She seemed to be a sensible old lady; the dearest lady I ever knew." No attempt was made to show that her mind had weakened or become impaired under the weight of years. Physically she grew more or less feeble, but her mental powers were not questioned by a single witness. She took occasional distant trips, rode a great deal in her automobile, discussed all her business affairs with her son Isaac, as testified to by Louise Gerstmann, and was mentally alert. That she took pains to husband her strength and protect herself against embarrassing and annoying situations is additional evidence of a sound mental condition.

The transaction in which testatrix deeded 400 acres of Kern county land, acquired in 1914 by an exchange of properties, to Isaac, is offered as a circumstance pointing to undue influence. The value of the land is not shown, and we conclude that it was not of great value. The uncontradicted evidence is that Isaac did not want the land, told his mother that he did not want it, but she said she wanted to give him a home, as she had given homes to the other children. He afterwards deeded the largest part of this land to John Henry Bryson, a nephew, for a home. This was done before testatrix's death, and it met with her approval.

The claims of contestant are thus answered: If Isaac attempted to keep other members of the family from the home of testatrix, he failed, for they came in large numbers; if it was his will that the mother should refuse to give them money or property while living, he suffered disappointment, because she gave to each one of her children either personal or valuable real property; if he attempted to influence her unduly in her testamentary disposition, he again failed. The will itself is indisputable evidence of a rational disposition of her estate. That Isaac's indebtedness, if any, was forgiven, was a matter for the determination of testatrix, and no one else. Under the evidence it was not an unnatural thing for her to have done.

[2] Only two assignments of error are noticed in the briefs of appellant. The first is on the ruling of the court sustaining an objection to a question asked by appellant as appears below:

"Q. Did you have a conversation with Evelyn Bryson in May, 1913, relative to her property? A. I did.

"Q. State to the court what was said."

An objection was made and sustained to the question. It will be noted that the time fixed was eight years after the execution of the will and two years after the execution of the codicils. The reason assigned for the materiality of the question was that, "if decedent had fully known about her property, the condition and amount thereof, she might have executed another codicil to her will." We see no merit in this contention. No claim is made of unsoundness of mind, and we can see no reason, in the light of the pleadings and the theory of the case, why the inquiry as to the sole issue of undue influence should have been directed to a remote subsequent period of time, rather than confined to a period at or near the time when the act complained of was consummated. The question presented in Estate of Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 194 Pac. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239, to which appellant directs our attention bears no resemblance to the question or situation before us, and it is therefore passed with a mere reference.

[3] The second assignment arises upon an objection raised to a question asked Joseph Smith, a subscribing witness to the will, under the following circumstances:

"Q. At that time [when she executed the will] was Mrs. Bryson acting of her own free will, not acting under duress, or undue influence, or fraud?

"Mr. Himrod: Just a moment. We object to that as calling for a conclusion of the witness.

"The Court: You may answer so far as you know.

"A. So far as I know she was acting freely.

"The Court. And not under undue influence? A. Not under undue influence.

"Mr. Bull: Q. Or fraud? A. Or fraud of any one."

Counsel, in discussing this ruling in his brief, suggests that, as the question of insanity was not involved, the opinion of a subscribing witness was not particularly material so far as the issues of the contest were concerned. If this is true, no harm was done. The witness, however, was closely examined on all that was done and said by testatrix at the time the will was executed, and no possible harm resulted from the ruling complained of.

[4, 5] Adopting, as we must, the rules of construction that apply to cases of nonsuit, by indulging every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence, and giving to contestant the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments, as fully stated in Berger v. Lane (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 45, and cases cited, it is clear that he has completely failed to make out a prima facie case. The rule of law is that fraud must be proved, and cannot be presumed, and its application to the facts of this case is sufficient alone to defeat contestant's case. The inferences and presumptions spoken of above must fall within the realm of rationality. There is nothing in contestant's case which amounts to more than mere conjecture, surmise, or suspicion. To justify the submission of any question of fact to a court or jury there must be proof of a substantial character that the fact is as alleged.

"In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator, by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires." Estate of Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577.

"The presumption of undue influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity alone. * * * In order to set aside a will for undue influence, there must be substantial proof of a pressure which overpowered the volition of the testator at the time the will was made." Estate of Langford, 108 Cal. 608, 41 Pac. 701.

It may be stated that, so far as opportunity is concerned, any one of the heirs of the testatrix had equal opportunity to visit with, consult, and advise with testatrix. We entertain no doubt that Isaac H. Bryson advised with his mother fully on both business and personal matters and on subjects affecting the present and future welfare of the family. This was not only his privilege, but his duty. Unpleasant as well as pleasant matters were no doubt the subject of consideration. Proof to establish undue influence must be had of a pressure which overpowered the mind and bore down the volition of the testator at the very time the will was made. Estate of Carithers, 156 Cal. 422, 105 Pac. 127. It consists in the exercise of acts or conduct by which the mind of the testator is subjugated to the will of the person operating upon it, some means taken or employed which have the effect of overcoming the free agency of the testator and constraining him to make a disposition of his property contrary to and different from what he would have done had he been permitted to follow his own inclination or judgment. Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 11, 120 Pac. 762. It is unnecessary to further multiply authorities.

The mind of testatrix was not held under subjugation by any one. There cannot be the slightest doubt but that her will reflects the free and voluntary wish of a just mind.

There is little merit in this appeal to commend it to the consideration of an appellate tribunal. To hold that the acts and conduct described by the evidence are to be regarded by the law as sinister attempts to unduly influence a parent in the disposition of her estate would be to requite filial duty with punishment.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN LITHOGRAPH CO. v. VANOMAR PRODUCERS. (Civ. 4483.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 25, 1923.)

Interest @50—To stop running, tender necessary, though larger sum than due is demanded.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1917, cl. 1, as to interest on money due under written instrument, and sections 1500 and 1504, as to extinction of obligation by offer of payment and deposit in bank, and effect of offer of payment on running of interest, tender of payment of whole amount due under instrument as price, with interest to time of tender, is necessary to stop running of interest, though in reliance on a subsequent void agreement for increase in price, a larger sum is demanded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Western Lithograph Company against the Vanomar Producers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action for the recovery of the purchase price of certain fruit labels manufactured by plaintiff upon the defendant's order and delivered to it. The original complaint herein contained two counts, each in the form of the common count; the first of which was for the recovery of $9,525.70, in which sum it was alleged the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for labels, stationery, and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant at its special instance and request; the second count was for the recovery of the same sum alleged to be the reasonable value of said labels, stationery, and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant as averred in the first count. The answer of the defendant denied that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $9,525.70 or in any other sum whatsoever in excess of the sum of $6,788.41, on account of said transaction, and alleged that the said admitted indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff arose out of a certain agreement in writing entered into between plaintiff and defendant's predecessor for the purchase and sale of said labels, stationery, and merchandise for said last-named price. The cause went to trial upon the issues as thus framed, and upon said trial the plaintiff presented in evidence the agreement in writing between the parties referred to in the defendant's answer as of the date of February 16, 1916, with evidence showing that the said agreement, the term of which was five years, had been performed by it for the year 1916 by the delivery of said merchandise at the prices stipulated therein, but that during the following year the cost of labor and material had so increased as to materially affect the cost of manufacture of said labels, and that the plaintiff had procured from the president and general manager of the defendant a letter consenting to an increase in the price of the labels to be thereafter supplied under said former agreement. The defendant denied the validity of this later arrangement, and offered evidence tending to show that its said official had no authority to make the same. It also contended that said later arrangement, even if legally made, was without consideration and therefore void. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff upon the facts as thus presented and gave judgment in its favor for practically the amount claimed in its complaint. The cause was appealed by the defendant to the Supreme Court where the judgment was reversed upon the second ground urged by the appellant, viz.: That the subsequent agreement to pay a higher price for said labels than that provided in the original agreement was void as without consideration; the decision of the Supreme Court to that effect being reported in Western Lithograph Co. v. Vanomar Producers, 185 Cal. 366, 197 Pac. 103.

The cause having thus been remanded for a new trial, the plaintiff, by stipulation between the parties, was permitted to file an amended complaint in two counts, which were in substantially the form of those in the original complaint except as to the amount of the recovery sought, which in the first count therein was stated to be a balance due of $8,897.14 with interest from the date of delivery amounting to the sum of $558.83 and making a total of $9,455.97, which the plaintiff claimed to still remain due and unpaid. To this first amended complaint the defendant filed an answer in substantially the same form, somewhat amplified, of its original answer, denying that any sum in excess of $6,788.41 was due the plaintiff and setting forth in the form of an exhibit to its said answer the original agreement between the parties. The cause again came to trial upon the issues thus presented and was submitted to the trial court upon a stipulation between the parties providing that the reporter's transcript of the evidence taken and admitted at the former trial should be admitted in evidence with the same force and effect at the retrial of the cause, and that certain additional facts covering the amount of labels actually delivered according to the invoices, and also as to certain demands made by the plaintiff for the payment of the larger sum claimed to be due prior to the former trial and appeal and as to the fact that no demand had been made by plaintiff for any payment under the precise terms of the original agreement since the decision of the Supreme Court reversing the former judgment. The cause being again submitted for decision upon the record as thus presented, the trial court duly made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law wherein it was found that within two years prior to the commencement of the action the plaintiff had sold and delivered to the defendant certain labels, stationery, and merchandise pursuant to the express contract of February 16, 1916, as set forth in the pleadings of the parties and pursuant to no implied or other agreement, and that there was due and payable to plaintiff therefor, after deducting all payments and offsets, the sum of $7,309, and that there was also due and payable to said plaintiff interest at 7 per cent. per annum, figured upon each invoice of said merchandise beginning after the lapse of 30 days from the delivery of the same down to the date of judgment; said interest aggregating the sum of $2,026, the total aggregate of said sums due with interest as thus computed amounting to the sum of $9,335, for which sum judgment was ordered and entered in the plaintiff's favor. This appeal is from said judgment.

The only serious contention which the appellant makes upon this appeal relates to the allowance of interest. The appellant predicates this contention upon the fact that the plaintiff in its original complaint and upon the former trial of the cause was insisting upon the recovery of a larger sum than that which would have been due under the original contract of the parties, relying upon the subsequent agreement for an increase in the price of labels. This, according to the appellant's contention upon this appeal, rendered the balance due the plaintiff uncertain until the date of the second judgment rendered in the action. There is no semblance of merit in this contention, since it is not only at variance with the defendant's own position and claim that its conceded liability arose and at all times existed, under the express terms of the original written agreement pleaded in its original answer and set forth in full as an exhibit to its amended answer, but it is also at variance with the findings of the court upon the second trial of the action that the rights and liabilities of the parties were fixed by the terms of said original agreement in writing. It being thus the fact that the plaintiff's rights and the amount of its recovery of both principal and interest were fixed as the defendant always heretofore contended, and as the trial court finally found, by the terms of said express contract, the first clause of section 1917 of the Civil Code as it existed prior to November 5, 1918, and the provisions of the initiative law relating to interest which became effective on said last-named date, had full application to the plaintiff's right to interest upon the principal sum payable under the terms of said contract after the same fell due. The amount of interest to which the one party is entitled or for which the other is bound is not determinable by the misconceptions of the parties as to their rights or duties under the terms of their express contract, but by the terms of the contract itself as finally interpreted by the court. By the terms of this contract the defendant was bound to pay plaintiff the amount due upon his delivery as specified therein within a stated time after such delivery had been made and interest began to run upon such deferred payments under the foregoing provisions of the law relating to interest from the date they became due. The only way in which the defendant could have avoided or terminated his liability to pay interest under his said agreement would have been to have made a tender of payment of the whole amount of principal and interest due up to the date of such tender. Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) § 266; Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 87 Pac. 93. The defendant made no such tender at any stage of the case, and he was not excused from doing so by the mere fact that the plaintiff was demanding a much larger sum than was actually due, since the defendant's right and duty in that regard are defined by the provisions of sections 1500 and 1504 of the Civil Code, and are not measured by the plaintiff's insistence as to the amount which it claims to be due. Robinson v. American Fish Co., 17 Cal. App. 212-220, 119 Pac. 388; Fairchild v. Bay Point, etc., Ry. Co., 22 Cal. App. 328, 134 Pac. 338; Brazil v. Azevedo, 32 Cal. App. 364, 62 Pac. 1049.

There is no other point made by the appellant deserving of serious consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARBLEHEAD LAND CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (two cases). (Civ. 4345, 4346.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 6, 1923.)

1. Eminent domain — 70—Constitution, as to compensation, satisfied by provision for security on taking property for public use by state or political subdivision thereof.

The rule that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation is satisfied by Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended November 5, 1918, which provides that, in eminent domain brought by the state or political subdivision thereof, appropriator may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use, on giving such security as the court may direct and in such amount as may be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and damages incident thereto, the amount of which security may be altered on motion.

2. Constitutional law — 280—Eminent domain — 70—Taking property by state or political subdivision thereof, after giving security to secure compensation to owner, not violative of due process clause.

Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended November 5, 1918, which provides that, in eminent domain by the state or a political subdivision thereof, appropriator may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use, on giving such security in such amount as may be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner immediate payment of just compensation and damages incident thereto, the amount of which security may, on motion, be altered by the court as required by such proceeding, is not violative of the due process clause of the federal Constitution.

Separate applications by the Marblehead Land Company against the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County and C. S. Crail, as Judge thereof, for writs of certiorari to review and annul certain orders of the superior court in condemnation proceedings. Applications denied.

See, also, 215 Pac. 922.

Grant Jackson, and Newby & Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner in case No. 4345 applies for a writ of certiorari, that this court may review and annul certain orders of the superior court in an action commenced by the county of Los Angeles to condemn land of the petitioner for road purposes. The orders in this action by their terms permit the county to take immediate possession of the land sought to be condemned, notwithstanding that no judgment of condemnation has been entered, and the compensation to which the owner of the land will be entitled has not been ascertained. The first order was based upon an application of the plaintiff in the action, accompanied by an affidavit received as evidence of the amount reasonably adequate to secure to the owner the property sought to be taken, immediate payment of just compensation for such taking, etc. The second order declared that the plaintiff had complied with the first order, and thereupon ordered that the plaintiff may take immediate possession and use of the described right of way. Both orders were made ex parte, without notice to petitioner, who was a defendant in the action.

[1] These orders were made pursuant to or in attempted compliance with the provisions of article 1, § 14, of the Constitution of California, as amended November 5, 1918. Prior to that time the unqualified provision of that section was such that a right of way could not be appropriated to the use of any corporation other than municipal "until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner." By the amendment of 1918 it was likewise provided that no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation, "except a municipal corporation or a county, until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner," etc. The amendment of 1918 added to this requirement the following proviso:

"That in an action in eminent domain brought by the state, or a county, * * * the aforesaid state or political subdivision thereof or district may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposits as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property, as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

Petitioner contends that said section of the Constitution, as amended, violates the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution (which forbids the state to deprive any person of property without due process of law), if it be held that the section means that possession can be taken without notice, upon deposit being made, upon an ex parte order. There is nothing unusual or unknown to the ordinary process of law in the taking possession of property without the consent of the owner, during the pendency of actions which either directly or incidentally contemplate the complete taking of the property, although in such cases the law always provides security for the owner. But the amount of that security is frequently determined by the court upon an ex parte showing, usually in the form of affidavits. This is constantly done in cases of attachment, in proceedings for appointment of receivers, and other forms of relief. In the present instance, as in some others, the right to obtain further security is given, if it be made to appear that the amount specified in the first order was inadequate; for, as we have seen, it is provided in section 14 of article 1 of the state Constitution that:

"The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

It is our opinion that the decision in Steinhart v. Superior Court, 137 Cal. 575, 70 Pac. 629, 59 L. R. A. 404, 92 Am. St. Rep. 183, does not sustain petitioner's contention that said constitutional amendment of 1918 does not authorize the taking possession of property by the county for the purpose and under the conditions indicated in the present case. That decision was made in the year 1902. After reviewing decisions upon this subject under the Constitution preceding the present Constitution, which was adopted in 1879, the court summarizes the law as existing at the time of the adoption of this Constitution as follows:

"The possession and use in terms authorized by the statute, before compensation had been made and while the proceeding was pending, is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution; but the requirement of the former Constitution, which only provided that private property should not be taken for public use without just compensation, was satisfied by a provision which insured the payment on reasonable terms as to delay and difficulty in the enforcement of the right. Viewed in the light of these facts, the change made in the language by the new Constitution becomes significant. The following italicized words were added, and no other change was made in the general provision: 'Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner.' The purpose of the amendment is perfectly obvious. If the preliminary possession during the pendency of the proceeding is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, it cannot be authorized until the damage resulting therefrom has been judicially determined and the amount has been paid or tendered to the owner."

But, as we have seen, the amendment of 1918, so far as applicable to a condemnation by a county for public use, restores the law to the condition in which it was prior to the adoption of the present Constitution in 1879. Therefore, in this instance, the rule that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation is satisfied by the provisions made in the amendment, which provisions insure the payment "on reasonable terms as to delay and difficulty in the enforcement of the right."

[2] Nor does this construction of the state Constitution bring it into conflict with the Constitution of the United States. In Turpin v. Lemon, 187 U. S. 51, 58, 23 Sup. Ct. 20, 23, 47 L. Ed. 70, 74, the court referred to the principle that:

"In proceedings for the condemnation of land under the laws of eminent domain, or for the imposition of special taxes for local improvements, notice to the owner at some stage of the proceedings, as well as an opportunity to defend, is essential."

But to define and limit the time when that opportunity must be afforded was found to be a task of great importance and of some difficulty. In Hagar v. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 708, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 667, 28 L. Ed. 569, 572, referring to the phrase "due process of law" as contained in the Fourteenth Amendment, the court says that by due process is meant—

"one which, following the forms of law, is appropriate to the case, and just to the parties to be affected. It must be pursued in the ordinary mode prescribed by the law; it must be adapted to the end to be attained; and wherever it is necessary for the protection of the parties, it must give them an opportunity to be heard respecting the justice of the judgment sought. The clause in question means, therefore, that there can be no proceeding against life, liberty, or property which may result in the deprivation of either, without the observance of those general rules established in our system of jurisprudence for the security of private rights."

Counsel for petitioner have not referred to any case, and we are aware of none, in which the federal Supreme Court has held that a procedure like that described in the 1918 amendment of article 1, section 14, of the California Constitution, is in violation of the "due process of law" clause of the federal Constitution. We are not in agreement with their contention that said 1918 amendment does not purport to authorize the court in a condemnation proceeding by a county (provisionally and subject to the right to alter the amount of security required) to determine the amount reasonably adequate to secure the owner for the purposes stated, and to make such orders as were made in this case.

As we read the petition, counsel are in error in their statement that under the orders in question, the deposits of money were made to the credit of the county, and also in their contention that the deposits were not separated as required by law. We think that they were separated in a manner which complies with the rule laid down in Marblehead Land Co. v. Superior Court, 215 Pac. 922, recently decided by Division 2 of the Second District.

The petition in case No. 4346 is like that in case No. 4345, except that it relates to separate condemnation proceedings, in which other land is taken, for another road. In conformity with the views hereinabove stated, we think that in each case the petition for a writ of review should be denied; and it is so ordered.

BANK v. BELL, City Auditor (DUVAL, Intervener. (Civ. 4382.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 29, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞56—Under constitutional amendment, powers over city affairs derived from charter.

Under the municipal affairs amendment (Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914), cities derive their powers over municipal affairs from their freeholders' charter directly provided for by the Constitution, and not from the Legislature.

2. Municipal corporations ☞275—Establishment and maintenance of municipal market for sale of foodstuff held "municipal affair" within statutes.

Under Berkeley City Charter, art. 16, § 115, called the "municipal affairs" amendment to the city charter, passed in conformity to Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, as amended in 1914, authorizing cities and towns organized under the Constitution to amend their charters so as to remove all restrictions on regulation of "municipal affairs" not embodied in their charters; the general laws to control all other matters, the establishment and maintenance of a municipal market for the sale of foodstuff is a "municipal affair," and within the plenary power of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Affairs.]

3. Municipal corporations ☞111(1)—Municipal market ordinance not void because no check on manager's financial activities is included.

The mere fact that certain ordinances creating a municipal market allow the manager to handle all money derived from it without any check upon him, and contrary to law, does not render the ordinances void, since the court cannot anticipate such results.

4. Appeal and error ☞907(3)—All findings assumed true on appeal from judgment roll.

Where an appeal comes up on the judgment roll alone, all findings are taken as true, including a special finding that the auditor had sufficient funds available to pay petitioner's salary.

5. Mandamus ☞102(2)—Manager of municipal market entitled to mandate compelling auditor to pay salary.

The manager of a municipal market is entitled to a peremptory writ of mandate commanding the city auditor to honor warrants authorized by the council to pay his salary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Petition by E. Carl Bank for writ of mandate against Elmer F. Bell, as Auditor of the City of Berkeley, in which Ethel M. Duval intervened. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant and intervener appeal. Affirmed.

Richard B. Bell, of Berkeley (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco of counsel), for appellants.

Lemuel D. Sanderson, City Atty., of Berkeley, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This appeal involves the decision of the question whether or not the city of Berkeley has the power to acquire, establish, maintain, own, and operate a municipal market. In this connection provisions of the Constitution of California relative to municipal affairs, certain sections of Berkeley's charter vital to its claims of "home rule," and ordinances passed in conformity therewith, are to be considered and discussed and an opinion thereon given.

The city of Berkeley, through its council, on February 23, 1921, adopted Ordinance No.

699, N. S., establishing a market to be known and designated as the Berkeley Municipal Market, declaring that said market shall be maintained, equipped, owned and operated by the city of Berkeley, declaring the purposes of said market, determining the price at which foodstuffs shall be bought and sold by said market, requiring all funds, from whatever source, to be kept in a bank in the city of Berkeley, creating the office of market manager, providing the mode of filling the office of market manager, determining the mode of removing the market manager, prescribing the duties of market manager, authorizing the employment of other persons, providing the mode of discharging any employee of said market, determining the mode of fixing the compensation of the market manager and other employees of said market, requiring a bond in the sum of $10,000 to be filed by the market manager, and providing the terms and conditions thereof, and the manner of its approval, providing for a monthly report of said market manager to the council, and providing for a monthly audit of the books of said market manager, and a report thereon by the city auditor to the council, and for the further conduct and carrying on of the municipal market the council also, on March 15, 1921, adopted Ordinance No. 701, N. S., amending Ordinance No. 699, N. S., appropriating the sum of $5,000, to be constituted a revolving fund, providing that of this sum the sum of $2,000 shall be used for any necessary equipment for the Berkeley Municipal Market, and the sum of $3,000 shall be used for the purpose of paying for any shipments of foodstuffs, expenses of maintaining and operating said market, salaries or compensation of any persons connected with said market, or taking care of any unforeseen losses or contingencies, or the future needs of said market, providing for purchases by the market manager, providing the mode of payment for the same, and providing the mode of returning money to said revolving fund.

The appeal comes to us upon the judgment roll. It is taken by Elmer F. Bell, as auditor of the city of Berkeley, and Ethel M. Duval, intervener, from a judgment awarding petitioner-respondent a peremptory writ of mandate commanding defendant as auditor, to allow a warrant issued upon a claim passed and allowed by the council of said city, in favor of said petitioner, in the sum of $225 as monthly salary for services as market manager of the Berkeley Municipal Market, alleged to have been established under said ordinance. The petition, with appropriate allegations, stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and defendant answered. Ethel M. Duval, as a taxpayer, later, by leave of court, filed her complaint in intervention, joining defendant and adopting as hers the answer filed by him.

The court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were true, and in addition found specially to the effect that at the time of the passage of the said ordinances, and ever since, there has been more than $5,000 in the general fund of the city treasury which has not been appropriated for any other purpose, and that it is under the control of the defendant as auditor. As conclusions of law the court determined that a peremptory writ of mandate issue in conformity with the prayer of the petition to defendant as auditor, commanding him to obey the ordinances and indorse his allowance on the warrant in question here, and do whatever other acts are necessary to allow the said demand. Judgment was entered in accordance therewith, and defendant and intervener appealed.

Whether or not the judgment of the lower court shall stand must be answered on this appeal by the decision of the question adverted to in the first paragraph of this opinion.

The provisions of the law under which it is asserted the municipal market may be established and operated are the following:

Amendment of 1914 to the Constitution of California, art. 11 § 6, reading:

"Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this Constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this Constitution so as to become likewise empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." Treadwell, Constitution (4th Ed.) p. 376.

Also section 8, of the same article of the Constitution, which was amended to read:

"It shall be competent in any charter framed under the authority of this section to provide that the municipality governed thereunder may make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to general laws." Treadwell, Constitution (4th Ed.) p. 405.

Section 47 of article 9 (Powers of the City and of the Council) of the charter of the city of Berkeley:

"General Powers of the City. Sec. 47. Without denial or disparagement of other powers held under the Constitution and laws of the state, the city of Berkeley shall have the right and power:

"Public Buildings, Works and Institutions. (1) To acquire by purchase, condemnation or otherwise, and to establish, maintain, equip, own and operate, libraries, reading rooms, art galleries, museums, schools, kindergartens, parks, playgrounds, places of recreation, fountains, baths, public toilets, markets, market houses, abattoirs, dispensaries, infirmaries, hospitals, charitable institutions, jails, houses of correction and farm schools, work houses, detention homes, morgues, cemeteries, crematories, garbage collection and garbage disposal and reduction works, street cleaning and sprinkling plants, quarries, wharves, docks, waterways, canals, and all other public buildings, places, works and institutions.

"Additional Powers. (62) To enact appropriate legislation and do and perform any and all other acts and things which may be necessary and proper to carry out the general powers of the city or any of the provisions of this charter, and to exercise all powers not in conflict with the Constitution of the state with this charter, or with ordinances adopted by the people of the city."

Section 115 of article 16 of the charter, as added in 1921:

"Municipal Affairs. Sec. 115. The city of Berkeley shall have the right and power to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to restrictions and limitations provided in this charter; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent or restrict the city from exercising or consenting to, and the city is hereby authorized to exercise, any and all rights, powers and privileges heretofore or hereafter granted or prescribed by general laws of the state." Stats. 1921, p. 2023, c. 16, assembly concurrent resolution No. 5.

When the California constitutional convention of 1879 met an attempt was made to liberate municipalities from the thralldom of legislative interference in their affairs. As originally adopted, the last sentence of section 6 of article 11 read as follows:

"Cities and towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this Constitution, * * * shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

In passing upon certain sections of the new Constitution in People v. Hoge (1880) 55 Cal. 612, 618, Chief Justice Morrison said:

"It was manifestly the intention * * * of the Constitution to emancipate municipal governments from the authority and control formerly exercised over them by the Legislature."

However, the municipalities got little comfort and no relief from the decisions of our Supreme Court construing section 6 of article 11, and the doctrine was settled that the Legislature had power by general laws to supersede or take away without the consent of the municipality the powers conferred upon it either by a special legislative charter or by a constitutional freeholders' charter, and also to prevent, by anticipation, freeholders' charters from regulating matters covered by general laws.

"These decisions had demonstrated," said Mr. Justice Angellotti in Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 209, 74 Pac. 780, 782, "that the power given by the Constitution to cities to frame charters for their own government for the purpose, as was said in People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612, 618, of emancipating them from the authority and control formerly exercised over them by the Legislature in municipal matters, were unavailing if such charters could at once be superseded by any general legislative enactment. Under these circumstances, the section of the Constitution providing that all cities and towns and the charters thereof should be subject to and controlled by general laws was [1896] amended by the addition of the words 'except in municipal affairs.'"

The purpose of this so-called "municipal affairs" amendment was explained by Mr. Justice Garoutte in Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 387, 58 Pac. 923, 925, as follows:

"For the purpose of getting at the true significance of these words, there is no brighter light to be shed upon them, than is disclosed by a consideration of the reasons which moved the Legislature to propose the amendment, and the people to adopt it. What was the evil to be remedied? What was the good to be gained by this amendment? The answer is common, every day history. It was to prevent existing provisions of charters from being frittered away by general laws. It was to enable municipalities to conduct their own business and control their own affairs to the fullest possible extent in their own way. It was enacted upon the principle that the municipality itself know better what it wanted and needed than did the state at large, and to give that municipality the exclusive privilege and right to enact direct legislation which would carry out and satisfy its wants and needs."

Since the decision in Fragley v. Phelan the "municipal affairs" provision of the Constitution has been considered and construed in many cases by our Supreme Court; but, as was said by Mr. William Carey Jones in an article on the subject, "Municipal Affairs of the Constitution" (California Law Review, January, 1913):

"The determination by the court whether any matter is or is not a municipal affair has not occasioned any serious trouble. Justices Garoutte, Harrison, and Temple, in their several opinions in the Fragley Case, took somewhat different views as to the import of the term and as to the criterion for deciding when an affair was municipal or was not municipal; but the solution of the question has never caused the court any real difficulty. Justice Angellotti has said in Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 265, 118 Pac. 796: 'There has been much discussion in our decisions as to what matters are embraced in this term, and it has been said that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to give a general definition clearly defining the term "municipal affairs" and its scope.' Accordingly the court has wisely abstained from attempting to tie itself up with a definition, the concrete question being in each case whether the matter at issue was or was not within the scope of municipal functions. The court has carefully and judiciously discriminated between local and state affairs, and as a matter of fact in the larger number of litigated cases has held the 'affair' in question to be within the purview of municipal activity."

Sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the Constitution were amended in 1914 as hereinbefore noted. In 1921 the city of Berkeley, in conformity with these amendments, added section 115, art. 16, to its charter. This charter amendment is in language identical with language contained in the charter of the city of Los Angeles, which has been construed by our Supreme Court in several recent cases.

The first case was that of Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Co., 175 Cal. 441, 166 Pac. 351. Mr. Justice Shaw, in writing the opinion of the court, after quoting the words of the charter section, "To make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in this charter, * * *" said:

"The city has brought itself within the conditions of the amendments of 1914 to sections 6 and 8 of article XI of the Constitution. Thereupon according to the terms of those sections of the Constitution, its powers over municipal affairs became all-embracing, restricted and limited by the charter 'only,' and free from any interference by the state through general laws, including laws giving the Railroad Commission powers over public utilities. The result is that the city has become independent of general laws upon municipal affairs. Upon such affairs a general law is of no force with respect to Los Angeles. If its charter gives it powers concerning them, it has those powers; if its charter is silent as to any such power, no general law can confer it. Whether such powers heretofore conferred upon it by general law, if any there be, are now abrogated or suspended, is a question we need not decide."

Then followed the opinion of Mr. Justice Wilbur in Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 622, 182 Pac. 436, 438, in which he quotes with approval the following language from Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Co.:

"The result is that the city has become independent of general laws upon municipal affairs. Upon such affairs a general law is of no force with respect to Los Angeles. If its charter gives it powers concerning them, it has those powers; if its charter is silent as to any such power, no general law can confer it."

Soon thereafter our Supreme Court again had occasion to consider and pass upon the Los Angeles charter amendment. This time Mr. Justice Lawlor, writing the opinion in Morgan v. City of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 301, 306, 187 Pac. 1050, 1052, said:

"To make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in this charter; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent or restrict the city from exercising or consenting to, and the city is hereby authorized to exercise, any and all rights, powers and privileges heretofore or hereafter granted or prescribed by general laws of the state." This charter provision was in effect at the time the city initiated the bond proceedings in question, and respondents contend 'that the plain intent of the provision is to the effect that, if the city is independent of general laws upon municipal affairs, save only as it may be restricted or limited by its own charter, it has the power to exercise any right, power or privilege heretofore or hereafter granted or prescribed by general law, and nothing in the charter shall be construed to prevent or restrict the city from exercising or consenting to such right, power or privilege.' This contention is, in our opinion, sound, and it must be held that under subdivision 51 of section 2 of article I of its charter, as amended in 1919, the city of Los Angeles was empowered to issue bonds under the provisions of the Municipal Bond Act of 1901."

Next Mr. Justice Lennon wrote the opinions in Matter of Frank Nowak, 184 Cal. 701, 195 Pac. 402, and in Matter of Elon G. Galusha, 184 Cal. 697, 195 Pac. 406. In Matter of Nowak he said:

"The net result of this situation is that, as to municipal affairs, the charter, instead of being a grant of power, is, in effect, a limitation of powers, and, the imposition of the tax for revenue purposes being strictly a municipal affair, the city has the power to impose that tax unless the power was taken from it by the charter itself."

And in Matter of Galusha:

"Petitioner then raises the question as to whether or not such power has, in fact, been delegated to the city of Los Angeles. It must be borne in mind that, as stated in Matter of Nowak, post, p. 701 (195 Pac. 402), the city of Los Angeles is operating under a charter amended so as to render the charter a limitation upon powers rather than a grant of powers, so far as municipal affairs are concerned. Charter of City of Los Angeles, art. 1, § 2, subd. 51; Const. art. 11, § 6. The question, then, is not whether the charter grants the power to impose the tax, but whether it prohibits the tax, and no such prohibition is to be found in the charter. Even if it be conceded, however, that an express grant of power is necessary in the instant case for the reason that the taxation of attorneys is not a purely municipal affair but one in which the state is directly concerned, that would not defeat the tax in question, for the charter does contain an express grant."

The latest expression of the Supreme Court upon this important constitutional question emanated from Mr. Justice Wilbur, author of the opinion in Los Angeles Gas &

Electric Corporation v. City of Los Angeles (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 125. He said:

"This provision of the Constitution is in the article regulating the powers of the legislative department of the state government, and is a limitation upon the power of the state Legislature. The powers of the city of Los Angeles are not derived from the Legislature, but from a freeholders' charter directly provided for by the Constitution. That is to say, the people of the state, through the Constitution, authorize the people of the city to regulate its affairs by a charter to be framed by a board of freeholders and voted upon by the people of the city, and approved by a resolution of the Legislature. Section 31 of article 4 has no application to a city charter. It is expressly provided by the Constitution (article 11, § 6) that the city in its charter may make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws. The sale and distribution of electrical energy manufactured by a city is a municipal affair, and one over which the Legislature of the state has no control."

[1] To recapitulate, it appears that, since the "municipal affairs" amendments of 1914 to the Constitution for such cities as have brought themselves within the condition of the amendments, the law is firmly established as follows: The powers of the cities are not derived from the Legislature but from a freeholders' charter directly provided for by the Constitution. The city in its charter may make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by the general laws. The powers of the city are all-embracing, restricted and limited by the charter only, and free from the interference of the state by general laws. The result is that the city has become independent of general laws upon municipal affairs. Upon such affairs a general law is of no force. If its charter gives it powers concerning them, it has those powers. If its charter is silent as to any such power, no general law can confer it. As to municipal affairs the charter, instead of being a grant of power, is, in effect, a limitation of powers. The city can exercise the power if the charter does not prohibit it. In a case (Matter of Galusha) not involving a purely municipal affair, one in which the state is directly concerned, the city may exercise the power where its charter contains an express grant. And a city that has, like Berkeley, amended its charter (section 115 of article 16 of Berkeley charter) in order to conform to the "municipal affairs" amendments to the Constitution, is independent of general laws upon municipal affairs, and, save only as it may be restricted or limited by its own charter, it has the power to exercise any right, power, or privilege heretofore or hereafter granted or prescribed by general law, and nothing in the charter shall be construed to prevent or restrict the city from exercising or consenting to such right, power, or privilege.

The decision in this case turns upon the answer to the question which now presents itself to us: Is the establishment, maintenance, equipment, ownership, and operation of the "Berkeley Municipal Market" a municipal affair?

In defining a "municipal affair" it has been said that—

"The true test is that which requires that the work should be essentially public, and for the general good of all the inhabitants of the city. It must not be undertaken merely for gain or for private objects. Gain or loss may incidentally follow, but the purpose must be primarily to satisfy the need, or contribute to the convenience, of the people of the city at large. Within that sphere of action, novelty should impose no veto." Sun Printing, etc., Ass'n v. New York, 8 App. Div. 230, 238, 40 N. Y. Supp. 607, 611, 612; Id., 152 N. Y. 257, 46 N. E. 499, 37 L. R. A. 788.

Time was when the sale of light and water to the public was attacked in the state of New York because it was thought not to be within the purview of the municipal powers of the city. The idea was then something new, and it met with opposition. It was contended that the business that the city proposed engaging in was of a private, commercial nature, and that therefore the municipality was debarred from entering upon it. The case is to be found in 49 Hun, 550, 2 N. Y. Supp. 447, and is entitled Hequenbourg v. City of Dunkirk et al. In declaring the business a public use the court said:

"What is or what is not a municipal purpose is in many cases doubtful and uncertain, and it is the duty of the court in such cases to give weight to legislative determination, and not to annul its acts, unless it clearly appears that the act was not authorized."

In Laughlin v. City of Portland (1914) 111 Me. 486, 90 Atl. 318, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1143, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 734, the court said:

"The courts have never attempted to lay down with minute detail and inexorable rule distinguishing public from private purposes because it would be impossible to do so. Times change. The wants and necessities of the people change. The opportunity to satisfy those wants and necessities by individual effort may vary. What was clearly a public use a century ago, may, because of changed conditions, have ceased to be such today. * * * What could not be deemed a public use a century ago, may, because of changed economic and industrial conditions, be such today. Laws which were entirely adequate to secure public welfare then may be inadequate to accomplish the same results now. * * *

"Taxation implies an imposition for a public use. * * * But, what are public purposes, is a question that must be left to the Legislature, to be decided upon its own judgment and discretion. * * * It is sufficient 'if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it, has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants.' * * * The establishment of natural gas works by municipal corporations, with the imposition of taxes to pay the cost thereof, may be a new object of municipal policy. But, in deciding whether in a given case, the object for which taxes are assessed is a public or private purpose, we cannot leave out of view the progress of society, the change of manners and customs, and the development and growth of new wants, natural and artificial, which may from time to time call for a new exercise of legislative power. And, in deciding whether such taxes shall be levied for the new purposes that have arisen, we should not, we think, be bound by an inexorable rule that would embrace only those objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied."

Again, in the case of German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S. 389, 408, 34 Sup. Ct. 612, 617 (58 L. Ed. 1011, L. R. A. 1915C, 1189), where the regulation of rates and premiums of fire insurance companies was upheld, Mr. Justice McKenna said:

"The principle was expressed to be, quoting Lord Chief Justice Hale, 'that when private property is 'affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati' only' and it becomes 'clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence, and affect the community at large.' * * * Against that conservatism of the mind which puts to question every new act of regulating legislation and regards the legislation invalid or dangerous until it has become familiar, government—state and national—has pressed on in the general welfare; and our reports are full of cases where in instance after instance the exercise of regulation was resisted and yet sustained against attacks asserted to be justified by the Constitution of the United States. The dread of the moment having passed, no one is now heard to say that rights were restrained or their constitutional guaranties impaired. * * * They demonstrate that a business, by circumstances and its nature, may rise from private to be of public concern and be subject, in consequence, to governmental regulation. * * * It would be a bold thing to say that the principle is fixed, inelastic, in the precedents of the past and cannot be applied though modern economic conditions may make necessary or beneficial its application."

Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., in Opinion of Justices, 155 Mass. 607, 30 N. E. 1146, 15 L. R. A. 809, said:

"I am of the opinion that, when money is taken to enable a public body to offer to the public without discrimination, an article of general necessity, the purpose is no less public when that article is wood or coal than when it is water, or gas, or electricity, or education, to say nothing of cases like the support of paupers or the taking of land for railroads or public markets. I see no ground for denying the power of the Legislature to enact the laws mentioned in the questions proposed. The need or expediency of such legislation is not for us to consider."

A case of compelling interest is that of Green v. Frazier, 253 U. S. 233, 40 Sup. Ct. 499, 64 L. Ed. 878, Mr. Justice Day delivering the opinion of the court, in which it was held that legislation which provides for engaging the state in the business of manufacturing and marketing farm products, and providing homes for the people, and which appropriates money, creates a state banking system and authorizes bond issues and taxation for carrying this scheme into effect, is not unconstitutional as respects taxpayers. In considering the matter the court upheld the state statute, laid down the following general principles, and disposed of the matter as follows:

"What is a public purpose has given rise to no little judicial consideration. Courts, as a rule, have attempted no judicial definition of a 'public' as distinguished from a 'private' purpose, but have left each case to be determined by its own peculiar circumstances. Gray, Limitations of Taxing Power, § 176. 'Necessity alone is not the test by which the limits of state authority in this direction are to be defined, but a wise statesmanship must look beyond the expenditures which are absolutely needful to the continued existence of organized government, and embrace others which may tend to make that government subserve the general well-being of society, and advance the present and prospective happiness and prosperity of the people.' Cooley, Justice, in People v. Salem, 20 Michigan, 452. Questions of policy are not submitted to judicial determination, and the courts have no general authority of supervision over the exercise of discretion which under our system is reposed in the people or other departments of government. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 569; German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Lewis, 233 U. S. 389. With the wisdom of such legislation, and the soundness of the economic policy involved, we are not concerned. Whether it will result in ultimate good or harm it is not within our province to inquire."

In Veterans' Board v. Jordan, 208 Pac. 284, 22 A. L. R. 1515, our Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Wilbur, mentioned the policy of Green v. Frazier, supra, as follows:

"We therefore turn to the question of whether or not the purpose sought to be achieved by the law for the settlement of large tracts of land after their improvement by the state is a public purpose. The question is a federal as well as a state question, for the taking of money by taxation for private instead of public purposes is a violation of the federal as well as of the state Constitution. For that reason the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Green v. Frazier, Governor, et al., 253 U. S. 233, 40 Sup. Ct. 499, 64 L. Ed. 878, in passing upon certain statutes of North Dakota, is of great, if not controlling, importance."

In the cases last above cited and quoted from are discussed the questions, what is a municipal purpose, taxation for a public use, and the effect of legislative determination. As the statements and conclusions set forth in these cases meet with our approval, many of the points raised by defendant and intervenor are thus disposed of, and detailed notice and discussion by us obviated.

[2] The ordinances of the City of Berkeley under attack comprehensively provide for the establishment and maintenance of a public market where foodstuffs shall be bought and sold, and where the public, without discrimination, may come and buy. Anything used for the sustenance of man is foodstuff. Before and since the great World War there has been a quickening of public interest in economic questions. Throughout the Union efforts have been made by commonwealth and municipality alike to exercise control over living costs. The efforts have, in the main, been directed toward lessening the cost of foodstuffs—necessities of human existence. The situation has, in some instances, become so acute that it is matter of common knowledge, and cannot be overlooked by the court. There have been public meetings of the people at which on many occasions were discussed the supply, demand, and price of milk, bread, potatoes, sugar, meats, and other products of the farm and packing house, all of which come under the designation of foodstuffs. Public welfare leagues and co-operative clubs have been organized in various communities throughout the state having for their avowed object and purpose the purchase and sale of foodstuffs, to the end that the pinch of poverty might not be felt by a long-suffering public. There has been and is popular demand upon government, national, state, and municipal, for relief, and it was undoubtedly in response to such urgent public necessity that the city of Berkeley established its municipal market. We therefore have no difficulty whatever in deciding that the establishment and maintenance of the municipal market is a municipal affair and a municipal purpose.

Furthermore, addressing ourselves generally to this important question, we are of the opinion that the city of Berkeley, under the provisions of its charter, has plenary power to acquire, establish, maintain, equip, own, and operate a municipal market, and also, acting through its council, power to take such legislative action as it may deem necessary and advisable in the premises.

[3] In answer to the argument that the ordinances are void because the market manager is permitted to handle the money derived from the market without any check upon him, and contrary to law, we reply that "we are not required to anticipate that this will be done." Veterans' Board v. Riley, (Cal. Sup.) 206 Pac. 631, 63 Cal. Dec. 490, 498. On the contrary, we should assume that the market manager will perform his duties in a lawful manner. As Mr. Chief Justice Beatty said in Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 520 and 521, 51 Pac. 870, 39 L. R. A. 342:

"The validity of a law is not to be tested, however, by its application to extreme cases involving the assumption of grossly arbitrary violation of their duties by public officers. If every law were declared unconstitutional which by the application of such a test could be shown capable of working injustice, we should have very few laws left."

[4] As to the duties of the market manager and how they shall be performed, and as to whether or not the market shall be conducted for profit, these and kindred matters are all proper subjects for legislation by the city through its council, and with which, in the instant case, we can have no concern. The appeal, as we have stated, comes up on the judgment roll alone. It is therefore assumed that the findings are true. The court specially found that there was in the general fund in the city under control of the defendant auditor ample funds with which to pay petitioner's claim.

[5] We are satisfied that the judgment of the lower court was correct, and that the petitioner-respondent is entitled to a writ of mandate commanding defendant auditor to allow said warrant issued upon a claim passed and allowed by the council of said city in favor of petitioner-respondent in the sum of $225 as monthly salary for services as market manager of the Berkeley municipal market. This being so, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

62 Cal. App. 465

PIERCE v. SOLANO COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 2629.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 8, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1923.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 130—Words “revised” and “amended” within constitutional provision held interchangeable.

The words “revised” and “amended,” within Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that “no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title,” are interchangeable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Amend—Amendment; Revise.]

2. Statutes $\S$ 230—In construction no difference between “revision” of a statute and the “amendment” thereof “to read as follows.”

In the construction of statutes, there is no difference between the “revision” of a particular act, or a section thereof “to read as follows,” and the “amendment” of the same act or section “to read as follows,” since in either case the revising or amending act is intended as a substitute for the original statute, or section, continuing in force that which is re-enacted and repealing what is omitted.

3. Highways $\S$ 107(1)—Resolution of intention held sufficient.

Resolution of intention to order certain road work under “Road District Improvement Act, approved March 21, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806), and acts amendatory thereof,” held not void for failure to state that the proceedings were pursuant to the Road Improvement Act of 1921 (St. 1921, p. 311), providing in section 2 that the act of 1907 “is hereby revised to read as follows,” etc.; the act of 1921 being “amendatory” of the act of 1907.

4. Highways $\S$ 90—Courts cannot interfere with establishment of boundaries of road district where complaining owner was given opportunity to complain before board and failed to object.

The courts cannot interfere with the determination of the board of supervisors in the establishment of the boundaries of the road district, under Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806) as amended by St. 1921, p. 311, and the ordering of work to be done therein, where the complaining property owner was given a reasonable opportunity to be heard in the proceeding before the board and there failed to object to any action taken by it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by William Pierce against the County of Solano, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, and Arthur Lindauer, of Vallejo, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. In this action the plaintiff prayed that the organization of a certain road improvement district be adjudged void and the defendants enjoined from further proceedings in connection therewith. Defendants were given judgment, and plaintiff has appealed.

The proceedings sought to be annulled were had under the “Road District Improvement Act of 1907.” On the 3d day of January, 1922, the board of supervisors adopted a resolution of intention to order certain road work to be done, containing the following provisions material to this discussion:

“Resolved, that it is the intention of the board of supervisors, * * * proceeding under and by virtue of the Road District Improvement Act approved March 21, 1907, and acts amendatory thereof, * * * to order work to be done as follows: * * * Notice is hereby given that at the time specified hereinbefore for ordering the work * * * all objections which are, under the provisions of said Road District Improvement Act of 1907, and acts amendatory thereof, entitled to be heard or determined, will then be heard and determined.”

The later resolution ordering the work to be done provides:

“All of the herein proposed work shall be done in pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled (here follows the original title of the act) approved March 21, 1907, and the several acts amendatory thereof.”

Appellant contends that the supervisors followed the original act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 806) and amendments thereof, and “not the revised ‘Road District Improvement Act of 1907,’ as revised by the Legislature in 1921,” and that, therefore, their proceedings are void.

Section 14 of the act of 1907 was amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 506); sections 2, 6, 8, 11, 12, and 13 in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1394); sections 1, 3, 4, 7, 14, and 15 in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1369); and sections 9a and 12 in 1919 (St. 1919, pp. 558, 516). A new section, numbered 15½, was added in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1336). In 1921 the Legislature passed an act entitled “An act to amend the title of and to revise an act entitled [giving the title of the act of 1907], approved March 21, 1907, as amended, and to include therein provision for the doing of work adjacent to said public roads, streets, avenues, boulevards, lanes and alleys which is incidental to the work thereon.” Stats. 1921, p. 311. The main provisions of the act of 1907 and its amendments were carried forward into the revised act, many of them literally. Section 1 provides that the title of the act of 1907, “as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows,” setting out the title as amended. Section 2 reads: “Said act is hereby revised to read as follows,” followed by the body of the statute divided into 33 sections. Then follows section 3 of the act, providing that proceedings commenced before the act went into effect should be governed by the law in force at the time of the passage of the resolution of intention therein, with certain exceptions. Section 33 of the revised act provides:

"This act shall be known as the 'Road District Improvement Act of 1907' and by such designation shall be sufficiently identified in any proceeding thereunder, and whenever in the resolution of intention it shall be set forth or recited that the proceeding is under the 'Road District Improvement Act of 1907,' this act shall be construed as the paramount statute for such proceeding, independently of, and alternatively for, other statutes for the improvement of public ways not within incorporated cities and towns."

Section 4 provides that—

The resolution of intention "may, in form, and shall, in substance, be (filling all blanks) as indicated following, to wit: * * * Resolved, that it is the intention of the board of supervisors of the county of —, * * * proceeding under and by virtue of the Road District Improvement Act of 1907, * * * to order work to be done as follows: * * * Notice is hereby given that at the time specified * * * all objections which are, under the provisions of said Road District Improvement Act of 1907, entitled to be heard or determined, will then be heard and determined."

Section 9 provides that—

"The board of supervisors may order the work to be done and if it so do shall fix a time for receiving bids for doing the work and direct the clerk to give notice accordingly, inviting sealed bids. Such notice shall include a statement that the work is to be done 'under the provisions of the Road District Improvement Act of 1907.'"

It thus appears that the proceedings of the board of supervisors were in literal conformity with the provisions of the act of 1921, except that the terms "Road District Improvement Act approved March 21, 1907, and acts amendatory thereof," were employed instead of "Road District Improvement Act of 1907."

[1-3] "No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended." Const. art. 4, § 24. Counsel for appellant quote the foregoing constitutional provision and say: "A revised act is a new and original piece of legislation." In Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 269, it is said:

"Revision of statutes implies a re-examination of them. The word is applied to a restatement of the law in a connected or improved form. The restatement may be with or without material change. A revision is intended to take the place of the law as previously formulated. By adopting it the Legislature say the same thing, in effect, as when a particular section is amended by the words 'so as to read as follows.'"

In section 273 it is said:

"Where an act is amended or revised, and the former act expressly or by implication repealed, such provisions of the old law as are substantially re-enacted are deemed to be continuous."

The inheritance tax law of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341) was complete in itself and it expressly repealed the act of 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 193), and all amendments thereto. In Estate of Martin, 153 Cal. 225, 228, 94 Pac. 1053, 1055, it is said:

"The act of 1905 containing the repealing clause above mentioned is practically a revision of the act of 1893 and its amendments, providing for succession taxes. Certain changes are made in the new law. * * * These changes are found, for the most part, in sections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the new law. * * * The other portions of the old law are substantially re-enacted in the act of 1905 with a few alterations and additions which do not affect the question. * * * These re-enactments come within the scope and effect of section 325 of the Political Code, declaring that, when a part of a statute is amended, it is 'not to be considered as having been repealed and re-enacted in the amended form; but the portions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted.' The rule particularly applicable to this case is thus stated in Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 238: 'Where there is an express repeal of an existing statute, and a re-enactment of it at the same time, or a repeal and a re-enactment of a portion of it, the re-enactment neutralizes the repeal so far as the old law is continued in force. It operates without interruption where the re-enactment takes effect at the same time.'"

While abstractly there are well-understood differences in meaning between the words "revise" and "amend," they are interchangeable in the sense in which they are used in the constitutional provision quoted. There is no shade of difference in meaning, under the rules governing the construction of statutes, between the "revision" of a particular act, or a section thereof, "to read as follows," and the "amendment" of the same act or section "to read as follows." In either case it is clear that the revising or amending act is intended as a substitute for the original statute or section, continuing in force that which is re-enacted and repealing what is omitted. The act of 1921 is certainly "amendatory" of that of 1907, and the statement in the resolution of intention that the supervisors were "proceeding under and by virtue of the Road District Improvement Act approved March 21, 1907, and acts amendatory thereof," was not inappropriate or misleading.

It is contended that, at the hearing upon the formation of the district, the supervisors denied plaintiff's right to be heard upon the question of the boundaries thereof. The statute (section 7) provides that if a majority of the owners of land make written "objection going to the entirety of the work described in the resolution of intention," the board of supervisors shall proceed no further in the matter, but that if a majority do not so object the board shall so find and thereupon proceed with the hearing. In this case the board found that a majority of the owners had not so objected and there is no complaint as to the regularity of the proceedings up to and including such finding. The statute provides that the board shall next "proceed to hear such objections as may be made to the grades." There were no such objections in this case. The next paragraph of the statute is as follows:

"Thereafter, in the order of hearing shall be heard such objections as shall be made to the boundaries of the district as set forth in the resolution of intention. Objection to the grades or to the boundaries of the district may be made by an owner of land lying within the district upon the hearing without any written statement of the same."

Plaintiff testified that he was present at the hearing in the forenoon when the announcement was made that a majority of the owners of land had not filed written objections to the formation of the district; that "a very short period after that, the district attorney presented a resolution for the board to act upon"; that no member of the board "called for any protests or objections, or remarks, either on the subject of grades, or boundaries, or benefits, or anything of that nature"; that the board adjourned after adopting the resolution, to 1:30 p. m.; that at the afternoon session he presented written objections to the boundaries of the district, as set forth in the resolution of intention, and requested that his own lands be excluded therefrom; and that the board refused him a hearing upon the ground that his objections were made too late. The minutes of the forenoon session of the board, material here, are as follows:

"The board proceeded to hear and consider protests on file and it being found that a majority of the owners of the land lying within the district as set forth in the resolution of intention, had not in writing made objection to the ordering of the work as an entirety:

"The chairman of the board then called for other protests and objections, if there were any to be made. Lewis Hilborn thereupon, on behalf of himself and others, made objection orally to the boundaries of the district which were considered by the board. No objection to the grades were made."

[4] Following the foregoing is a copy of the resolution of the board, establishing the boundaries of the district as set forth in the resolution of intention and ordering the work to be done. The district attorney testified that—

Before the board had ascertained whether a majority of owners had objected to the work in its entirety, "Mr. Hilborn then addressed the board on the matter of the protests to the boundaries. * * * He didn't complete the talk that he was making at that time when Mr. Halliday returned with the lists (of owners of land), as amended by the recorder. That list was submitted by Mr. Halliday, who stated to the board the number on the list and the number of objections as a matter of record. Then Mr. Fleming (chairman of the board), I believe, announced that there not being sufficient objections to the work, that the meeting would proceed. I believe that Mr. Fleming called for other objections and, at that time, Mr. Hilborn, as I recall, again took the floor; and at that time * * * I was called out of the room and what took place then for a few minutes I do not know, and I returned. * * * About the grades, what was done on that I don't recall, only this, the final words of Mr. Fleming, 'Are there any further objections?' He announced that from his chair. Nobody had anything to say. Nobody had any objections at that time. Mr. Pierce sat there in the front row. * * * He (Fleming) said, 'No further objections?' and, there being no further objections, he said, 'What is the next thing?' * * * I said, 'I will go in my office and get the resolution and present it,' and I presented it, and there was a motion made by Mr. Connelly that the resolution be adopted, and it was moved and carried."

There is other evidence in harmony with the foregoing and some in contradiction thereof, but enough has been stated to support the findings of the court to the effect that plaintiff was present at the hearing before the board of supervisors "and did not orally or in writing make any objections as to the boundaries of said district," that "after a full, thorough and complete hearing of the entire matter, said resolution ordering said work was introduced and read in open meeting * * * in the presence and hearing of said plaintiff, and no objections were made or filed to the adoption of such resolution, and the same was thereafter adopted in open session by the unanimous vote of said board * * * at about 12 o'clock" of the day of said hearing and that plaintiff's objections were not made until 2:30 p. m. of said day. The courts cannot interfere with the determination of the board of supervisors in the establishment of the boundaries of a road district and the ordering of work to be done therein, where the complaining property owner was given a reasonable opportunity to be heard in the proceeding before the board and there failed to object to any action taken by it. Dillingham v. Welch, 179 Cal. 656, 178 Pac. 512. Since plaintiff made no objection, at the hearing before the board, to the inclusion of his lands or the exclusion of other lands, it is unnecessary to consider the evidence bearing upon the question of boundaries, because the determination of the board, under such circumstances, is conclusive.

The judgment is affirmed.

IMPERIAL WATER CO. NO. 4 v. ME-SERVE et al. (Civ. 3810.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 19, 1923.)

1. Pleading ⚡147—Cross-complaint must allege facts showing that the demand is a proper subject for cross-complaint.

A cross-complaint must allege, not only all the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action, but also all facts essential to show that the demand is a proper subject for cross-complaint.

2. Pleading ⚡148—In action for water furnished, defendant could not file cross-complaint for plaintiff's failure to deliver water to which he was entitled as lessee of plaintiff's stockholder.

In an action for water delivered for the irrigation of a certain tract of land, cross-complaint alleging that the plaintiff was a mutual water company organized to furnish water at cost to its stockholders, that defendant as lessee of a stockholder was entitled to receive water from the plaintiff but that the plaintiff failed to deliver such water, held demurrable, since it sought to enforce a real property right and did not claim damages for breach of a contract with the plaintiff, and therefore the relief sought did not relate to or depend upon the "contract or transaction upon which the action is brought," as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

3. Pleading ⚡148—Cross-complaint held demurrable for failure to show that tract of land mentioned was same as that referred to in complaint.

In water company's action for water furnished for irrigation of a particular tract of land, cross-complaint seeking damages for plaintiff's failure to furnish water held demurrable for failure to show that the tract of land for irrigation of which the plaintiff was alleged in the cross-complaint to have failed to deliver water, was the same tract as that for which the water mentioned in the complaint had been furnished.

4. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡34(1)—Defendant being sued for water for irrigation could not counterclaim for company's failure to deliver water to which defendant was entitled as stockholder's lessee.

In water company's action for water furnished for irrigation, defendant could not counterclaim for failure of plaintiff, a mutual water company organized for the purpose of furnishing water at cost to its stockholders, to furnish defendant with water to which he was entitled as the lessee of a stockholder, under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 1, authorizing a counterclaim stating a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action, and subdivision 2, authorizing a counterclaim stating a cause of action arising on a contract existing at the commencement of the action, in an action arising on contract.

5. Pleading ⚡8(2) — Statement in cross-complaint that defendant's cause of action arose out of same transaction as complaint held mere conclusion of law.

Allegation in cross-complaint that defendant's cause of action "is of and concerning the subject-matter of plaintiff's complaint, and his cause of action arises out of the same transaction," held not sufficient to show that defendant's cause of action concerned the subject-matter of plaintiff's complaint, and arose out of the same transaction; being a mere conclusion of law not justified by the facts specifically alleged.

6. Waters and water courses ⚡254—Purchasers of water from corporation could not defend on ground that act of corporation in selling water was ultra vires.

In water company's action for water furnished for irrigation, defendants having purchased the water from the company could not defend on the ground that the act of the corporation in selling the water to them was ultra vires.

7. Pleading ⚡398 — Variance between complaint alleging sale of water and proof that water was supplied to defendants at cost by virtue of ownership of stock held not misleading.

In water company's action for water, furnished for irrigation, variance between allegation of complaint that the "water was sold and delivered" to the defendants, and proof that the water was furnished to defendants at cost because of ownership of stock, held not fatal, where it did not appear that the defendants were deceived thereby, under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, and Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Appeal and error ⚡761—Each point should be separately stated in brief under appropriate heading.

The purpose of a brief is to enlighten the court, and can best be accomplished when each point is separately stated under an appropriate heading; thus showing the precise nature of the question of law intended to be presented.

9. Appeal and error ⚡761—Presentation of points in brief held insufficient.

Appellants' statements in brief that "the first questions propounded to 'the named witness' involved in errors No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3, speak for themselves, and we submit need no other argument to show their error than the argument presented in the very statement of the objections," and that "we submit that the objections embodied in errors No. 4, No. 5, and No. 6, speak for themselves," held insufficient for consideration, since the appellate court should not be expected to do the work of counsel and hunt up and consider what counsel have not argued or supported with a citation of authorities.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Imperial Water Company No. 4 against Edwin A. Meserve, Harry W. Meserve, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. L. Seville and Bruce Seville, both of Brawley, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, a mutual water company incorporated under the laws of this state, brings this action against Lizzie H. Meserve and her two sons, Edwin A. Meserve and Harry W. Meserve, to recover the sum of $681.28, alleged to be due for "water sold and delivered" to defendants. Judgment for that sum was rendered against the three defendants, two of whom, Edwin A. and Harry W. Meserve, have taken this appeal.

In a complaint consisting of three counts, plaintiff alleges: In the first count, that defendants "purchased from plaintiff" and the latter "sold and delivered to defendants," for agricultural purposes, water to the amount and value of $681.28, which defendants promised to pay; in the second count, that the water was reasonably worth $681.28; and in the third, that the defendants are "indebted" to plaintiff in the sum of $681.28 for water so sold and delivered. Edwin A. Meserve and his mother joined in an answer wherein they denied practically all of the allegations of the complaint. Harry W. Meserve answered separately. Like his codefendants, he also denied substantially every allegation of the complaint. As a further answer, Harry W. Meserve alleged that the plaintiff is a mutual water company, organized for the purpose of furnishing water at cost to its stockholders, and that it had no power under its articles of incorporation to "sell" water as personal property. For a further defense he alleges that, having the right so to do, he ordered water of plaintiff, but that the latter did not deliver all of the water so ordered because it negligently allowed its ditches to become so filled with weeds and grasses, silt and deposits that it was unable to deliver water in time to properly irrigate his crops; wherefore he alleges that his crops were lost and that he was damaged in the sum of one thousand dollars. Harry W. Meserve also filed a cross-complaint wherein, for a first cause of cross-action, he alleged that plaintiff is a mutual water company organized to furnish water at cost to its stockholders and those claiming under them; that he rented of one C. R.

Rockwood a tract of land containing 134 acres; that Rockwood owned 134 shares of plaintiff's capital stock; that as a lessee of Rockwood cross-complainant was entitled to receive water from plaintiff; that he planted barley on the leased land; that he ordered water of plaintiff, but that the latter permitted its canals to become so filled with weeds and grasses, silt and deposits that it could not and did not deliver water on the tract so leased by him of Rockwood; that as a result he lost the crop of barley and was damaged thereby in the sum of $2,000. The cross-complaint sets forth a second alleged cause of cross-action similar to the first, except that it is based upon plaintiff's alleged failure to deliver water to a different piece of land, namely, a tract containing 320 acres, of which cross-complainant alleged himself to be the lessee. There is nothing in the cross-complaint to show that either of the tracts of land alleged to have been leased by cross-complainant is the same as that for the irrigation of which plaintiff sold and delivered the water mentioned in its complaint; nor is there anything in the cross-complaint to show that the water right which was owned by either of cross-complainant's lessors was the same water right in virtue of which defendants ordered the water for which plaintiff is seeking a recovery here. To the cross-complaint so interposed by the defendant Harry W. Meserve, plaintiff filed a general and a special demurrer. The demurrer was sustained.

Upon the trial of the case the following facts were shown: The articles of incorporation filed by plaintiff, a mutual water company, declare that "the purposes for which it is formed are to secure a supply of water from [here follow the names of certain companies from which plaintiff procured its water] * * * to distribute the same at cost among its stockholders only for use upon lands owned by them." The water mentioned in plaintiff's complaint was furnished by plaintiff for the irrigation of part of a tract of 320 acres in Imperial county upon which A. R. Meserve, the father of appellants, had made a location under the United States land laws. A. R. Meserve died before the issuance of a patent but after he had made his final proof. Prior to the death of A. R. Meserve, plaintiff had issued to him 320 shares of its capital stock. These shares represented a water right appurtenant to the particular tract of land upon which plaintiff furnished the water mentioned in its complaint. This tract of land, officially described as tract 156, will hereafter be referred to simply as the "ranch." Plaintiff having levied an assessment upon its subscribed stock and the amount assessed against the 320 shares standing in the name of A. R. Meserve not having been paid, the shares were sold for the assessment to A. R. Meserve's widow, the defendant Lizzie H. Meserve. She purchased the shares and became the owner thereof about January 4, 1913.

To make it possible for Edwin A. Meserve to supply his widowed mother with funds for her support under such circumstances that she would be led to believe the money came from the profits of the ranch instead of from her son's bounty, as well as to enable the mother to receive a patent to the ranch and have it issued to her in her name, the two sons, Edwin and Harry, with their mother's knowledge and consent, entered into an arrangement pursuant to which it was agreed to farm the ranch on shares, the mother and her two sons each to receive one-third of the profits. Referring to this arrangement, or, as he very appropriately designated it, this "family affair," Edwin A. Meserve, called as a witness for plaintiff, testified:

"It was sort of a family affair, and we were trying to get that property in shape and prevent anybody from going on it and protect it for our mother; that was the idea, and between us we were endeavoring to get some member of the family who would be a legal heir of A. R. Meserve into possession and onto possession of that property. * * * She [the mother] knew Harry was going there to take possession of it, and she knew we were trying to get a patent in her name. * * * The children all wanted her to have it. The proposition was to get one of the Meserves—A. R. Meserve was in the possession—get the Land Office to issue a patent to Lizzie H. Meserve, and we finally succeeded in getting them to do it that way. * * * I was supporting my mother, and it was the means of making it easier for her to come to accept my support. * * * All the time she believed that the money I was giving her for her support and taking care of her came from this ranch, but it didn't come from the ranch. On the contrary, the ranch was an expense, and I have carried on that ranch at an expense of a good many thousands of dollars. * * * She understood that Harry was going down there, and I think I told her that Harry would send up one-third of the gross returns of the ranch, and the money I was turning over to her represented that one-third. * * * She thinks that money she got comes from the one-third Harry produces, and he was doing his best to make it a go, and I was doing my best to make it a go, and it went, but it went the wrong way. * * * It was sort of a family arrangement. Harry being willing to come here and sacrifice his time and try to make a go of it, and then he tried to run it so as to make the thing pay to my mother."

On July 27, 1912, Edwin A. Meserve mailed to plaintiff a letter, duly signed by him, addressed to plaintiff, and reading as follows:

"Gentlemen: Mr. Harry W. Meserve, the tenant in possession of the 320 acres of land formerly belonging to my father, A. R. Meserve, but upon his death passing to my mother, is there now to represent both my mother, Lizzie H. Meserve, and myself. His lease on the 320 acres standing in father's name carried with it a lease of the water stock and of all the water rights and water privileges, so that he is authorized and empowered to call for the water on that water stock, and has full authority over the 320 acres. He also has charge, as my agent and representative, of the 320 acres formerly in the possession of Mr. Ashton S. Cooke, and full authority to order water on my water stock. You are therefore directed to receive his orders with full authority on the water belonging to either one of the two places, or the stock appurtenant to either."

Harry W. Meserve, who farmed the ranch during all the time that plaintiff furnished the water for which it is seeking a recovery, testified that as between his brother Edwin and himself, he was to pay for the water and that Edwin was to pay the water assessments—by which we presume the witness meant such assessments as plaintiff might levy on its subscribed capital stock.

[1-3] Appellants' first point is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the cross-complaint. We think the cross-complaint failed to state a cause of cross-action, and that therefore the general demurrer thereto was properly sustained. A cross-complaint must allege, not only all the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action, but also all facts essential to show that the demand is a proper subject for cross-complaint. Here plaintiff's cause of action, as alleged in its complaint, is one arising out of contract—a contract, express or implied, to pay for water sold and delivered. To entitle a defendant to affirmative relief by way of cross-action his cross-complaint must allege facts showing that the relief sought by him relates to or depends upon the contract or transaction upon which plaintiff's action is brought, or that it affects the property to which plaintiff's action relates. Code Civ. Proc., § 442. Here the relief which cross-complainant seeks is based upon his alleged right to receive water, not by reason of any contract he ever made with plaintiff, but in virtue of his lessors' shares of stock in a mutual water company—the plaintiff in this action. But such a right to water has been held to be real property. Stone v. Imperial Water Co., 173 Cal. 39, 159 Pac. 164. Cross-complainant, therefore, is seeking to enforce a real property right and is not claiming damages for breach of any contract with plaintiff. It follows, therefore, that the relief sought by him does not relate to or depend upon "the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought." Nor does the cross-complaint allege any fact tending to show that the relief sought thereby affects the property to which the action relates, even if it were possible to regard plaintiff's action as one relating to real property. If the cause of action alleged by plaintiff, which, as we have said, is based on contract, may be deemed to have any direct relation to real property, i. e., to the particular tract of land for the irrigation of which plaintiff sold the water to defendants, still there is a total absence from the cross-complaint of any averment of fact tending to show that the two tracts of land mentioned therein and alleged to have been leased to Harry W. Meserve embrace any part of the land for which plaintiff furnished the water mentioned in its complaint. It follows, therefore, that the cross-complaint fails to allege any fact showing that cross-complainant's demand for damages is a proper subject of cross-action.

[4, 5] Nor may cross-complainant's demand be regarded as a proper subject of counterclaim. It cannot be regarded as a proper subject of counterclaim under subdivision 1 of section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for no facts are averred showing that the alleged cause of cross-action arose out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, or that it is connected with the subject of the action. True, the cross-complaint contains the bald assertion that it "is of and concerning the subject-matter of plaintiff's complaint, and this cause of [cross] action arises out of the same transaction"; but this is the allegation of a mere conclusion of law and is not justified by any of the facts specifically averred in the cross-complaint. Nor is there any allegation in the cross-complaint which would make cross-complainant's demand a proper subject of counterclaim under subdivision 2 of section 438. Though plaintiff's cause of action arises upon contract, the alleged cause of cross-action, as we have shown, is based, not upon contract, but upon the ownership of real property—the water rights owned by cross-complainant's lessors in virtue of their ownership of shares of plaintiff's capital stock. The ownership of each of such water rights it is true, like the ownership of any other species of real property acquired through sale, doubtless had its genesis in contract; but cross-complainant is seeking relief based upon the water right owned by each of his lessors, which is real property, and is not seeking relief based upon the contract out of which that water right accrued. That contract was fully performed when the water right vested in cross-complainant's lessor.

Since the cross-complaint clearly was subject to the general demurrer which plaintiff interposed to that pleading, it is not necessary to consider appellants' technical criticisms respecting the sufficiency of plaintiff's special demurrer.

[6, 7] Appellants earnestly urge that respondent, under its articles of incorporation, had no right to "sell" water—that it possessed only the right to distribute water among its stockholders at cost, and that respondent's claim, according to the case stated in its complaint, is based upon a "sale" of water to defendants and not upon a distribution of water to its stockholders at cost.

Appellants are not in a position to make such defense. It sufficiently appears from the testimony of Edwin A. Meserve and his letter to plaintiff that he and his brother Harry and their mother entered into a "family arrangement," whereby it was understood that the two sons should participate in farming the land, each of them, with the mother, receiving one-third of the crops—Edwin agreeing to contribute towards some of the expense, and Harry agreeing to contribute his services. The latter admitted that as between his brother and himself, he was to pay for the water used on the ranch. From all the evidence in the case we think that the trial court was warranted in finding that, as between the company and the three defendants, the water must be held to have been furnished or "sold" to all of the latter jointly, and that the three were jointly, or jointly and severally, liable therefor. Having thus dealt with the company, appellants are estopped from setting up as a defense that the act of the corporation in "selling" the water to them was ultra vires. Bay City, etc., Ass'n v. Broad, 136 Cal. 525, 69 Pac. 225. Moreover, though the complaint may have alleged a "sale," the evidence shows that the water was in fact delivered in virtue of the shares of stock owned by the mother, and that it was furnished to defendants at cost. Witnesses for respondent testified that the charges which were made by plaintiff for the water which it furnished from time to time to defendants were all at the rate of 50 cents per acre foot, that this was the usual charge made against all stockholders who received water from the company, and that the corporation received its water from other companies by paying therefor at the same rate—50 cents per acre foot. There is no fatal variance between this evidence and the case alleged in the complaint. It does not appear that defendants were deceived by the fact that the complaint, instead of averring that the water was furnished at cost in virtue of the mother's ownership of the shares of stock, alleged that the water was "sold and delivered." It is clear that a right result was reached, and under the provisions of section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the requirements of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, no miscarriage of justice having resulted, the variance, if any, cannot be availed of to secure a reversal of the judgment.

Upon the occasions when plaintiff delivered water to the ranch, measurements were made by its zanjeros, who filled out and filed with the company their "report sheets." These documents or memoranda give the name of the owner of the land, the dates when the water was ordered, the name of the person giving the order for the water, the amounts of water delivered, and the sums charged. If from the aggregate of the sums shown as charges on these "report sheets" there be deducted, as credits, the payments which are disclosed by the company's books, there will be left a balance of $681.28, the amount for which plaintiff recovered judgment. One D. L. Smith, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that at one time he leased and farmed a part of the ranch. Wherefore appellants contend that some of the deliveries of water shown by the zanjeros' report sheets may have been used to irrigate that part of the ranch which Smith farmed, and that, if this were the case, the balance, if any, which might be due to plaintiff would be a sum less than $681.28. There is no merit in the claim. Smith testified that he farmed the land in 1912, and that from and including 1913 to the fall of 1916 he did not farm any part of the ranch. The "report sheets" show that the deliveries referred to therein were made from and including February 13, 1913, to and including September 21, 1915. Between these two dates Smith was not farming any part of the ranch.

[8. 9] The remaining points raised in appellants' brief are either destitute of any merit whatever, or are instances of harmless error, or are points presented in such a desultory manner that we do not feel called upon to consider them. The following is a fair sample of the manner in which many of appellants' points, if "points" they may be called, have been presented to us:

"H. W. Meserve was called for plaintiff. The first questions propounded to this witness involved in Errors No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3, speak for themselves, and we submit need no other argument to show their error than the argument presented in the very statement of the objections. Certainly it was not competent, particularly as against Edwin A. and Lizzie H. Meserve, to prove that the defendant was a corporation in the manner attempted and to thus prove the power of the corporation. To argue these objections would be but to quote what is stated in the transcript and to reprint the same."

Again:

"We submit that the objections embodied in errors No. 4, No. 5, and No. 6, speak for themselves."

The purpose of a brief is to enlighten the court. This can best be accomplished when each point is separately stated under an appropriate heading, thus showing the precise nature of the question of law intended to be presented. The method of presentation pursued here by appellants is not calculated to aid the court. Take for example that part of their brief from which we have just quoted, wherein we are told that the first questions propounded to Harry W. Meserve involved errors 1, 2, and 3. By these questions the witness was asked if he knew of an organization known as Imperial Water Company No. 4, if he was not a director of that institution and what was the character of its business. The questions were objected to upon the ground that this was not the way to prove a corporation. The objections were overruled. But later in the trial, as our own independent search of the record reveals, plaintiff put in evidence the articles of incorporation, and thus cured the "error" complained of in the questions to which counsel make reference when they refer us to the so-called "errors No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3." If, instead of making a general reference to a particular part of the record and asking us to find there the argument made by defendants' counsel at a certain stage of the trial, counsel for appellants had stated separately, under appropriate headings, the several points upon which they rely for a reversal, they doubtless would not have claimed that the court committed prejudicial error in overruling their objections to these questions. Had they so presented their points, they probably would not have overlooked the neutralizing effect of the subsequent introduction of plaintiff's articles of incorporation. We should not be expected to do the work of counsel and assiduously hunt up and consider what counsel have not argued or supported with the citation of authorities. Speaking of a presentation of points made in a manner similar to that adopted by appellants here, this court, in People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 201 Pac. 955, expressed itself as follows:

"Not only, in each instance, does counsel fail to state the question to which objection is made, or the objection itself, but none of the points is argued and no authority is cited in support of any of them. Such a casual presentation of points, if followed up, would impose upon us a labor which is within the peculiar province of counsel, and which does not come within the range of our duty. We are not called upon to consider points so presented."

The judgment is affirmed.

IMPERIAL WATER CO. NO. 4 v. MESERVE et al. (Civ. 3811.)

1. Pleading ⚡148—Cross-complaint seeking damages for injury to crops caused by overflow of water company's canals held to show claim related to plaintiff's cause of action.

In water company's action for water furnished for irrigation, cross-complaint alleging that the company undertook to carry water through its canals and deliver it to the defendants, but because of weeds and deposits with which the company had negligently permitted its canals to become choked, the water overflowed the banks of the canals upon defendants' land damaging and destroying crops growing thereon, and that such water was the water for the delivery of which plaintiff had brought the action, held sufficient to show that the relief sought related to the contract or transaction upon which the action was brought.

2. Pleading ⚡12—Cross-complaint not demurrable for uncertainty on failure to allege facts peculiarly within knowledge of plaintiff.

In water company's action for water furnished for irrigation, defendants' cross-complaint alleging that the plaintiff negligently permitted its canals to become choked with weeds and deposits, and that overflow of water injured defendants' crops, held not demurrable for uncertainty or indefiniteness merely because it did not state the precise times when plaintiff negligently permitted the canals to become choked, since such matters were peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff.

3. Pleading ⚡148—Cross-complaint seeking damages for injury to crops caused by overflow of water company's canals held not demurrable for failure to describe land.

In a water company's action for water furnished for irrigation, cross-complaint seeking damages for injury to defendants' crops from overflow of water caused by plaintiff's negligence in permitting canals to become filled with weeds and deposits, held not demurrable for failure to describe the lands, in view of allegation of cross-complaint that the waters which plaintiff alleged were delivered to defendants were the same waters which overflowed defendants' lands and destroyed his crops, since such allegation identified the land as that described in the complaint.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡179(1)—Cross-complaint alleging amount of damage to crops held sufficient, without allegation as to precise profit cross-complainant would have made if crops had not been damaged.

Cross-complaint seeking damages for destruction of, and injury to, crops caused by overflow of plaintiff's canals, alleging the amount of the damages, was not demurrable for failure to allege the precise amount of profit which cross-complainant would have realized had his land not been wrongfully overflowed.

5. Judgment ⚡250—Plaintiff suing on contract of sale could not recover on contract of guaranty.

Water company suing for water sold and delivered could not recover against one of the defendants on a contract of guaranty, whereby such defendant guaranteed payment by the other.

6. Guaranty ⚡1—Contract of "guaranty" stated.

The contract of guarantor is his own separate contract in the nature of a warranty that the thing guaranteed to be done by the principal shall be done, and is not an engagement jointly with the principal to do the thing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Guaranty.]

7. Guaranty ⚡36(1)—Guarantor liable only for default of principal.

The guarantor is not primarily bound to do what the principal has contracted to do, but is only bound to answer for the consequences of the principal's default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Imperial Water Company No. 4 against Edwin A. Meserve, Harry W. Meserve, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendants appeal. Reversed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. L. Seville and Bruce Seville, both of Brawley, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The defendants Edwin A. Meserve and Harry W. Meserve have appealed from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought by it against appellants and one D. L. Smith to recover a sum alleged to be due from the three defendants for water sold and delivered to them by plaintiff.

This is a companion case to Imperial Water Co. No. 4 v. Meserve, 217 Pac. 548, this day decided—case No. 3810. The water for the price of which this action was brought was delivered to, and used upon, a tract of 320 acres of land owned by the defendant Edwin A. Meserve. The complaint, mutatis mutandis, is similar to that which plaintiff filed in the companion case. In a broad, general way the facts are quite similar to those of the other case, with, however, certain important differences presently to be mentioned.

The defendant Edwin A. Meserve filed a cross-complaint wherein he alleges substantially the following: Plaintiff is a mutual water company organized for the purpose of delivering water to its stockholders at cost; "the waters hereinafter alleged and referred to are the same waters which plaintiff refers to in its complaint." Plaintiff negligently permitted its canals and distributing system to become choked with weeds, grasses, silt, and deposits, by reason whereof it was rendered incapable of distributing water through its canals to the lands of its stockholders. Cross-complainant owns 320 shares of plaintiff's capital stock, entitling him to water on his 320 acres of land. During all the times in plaintiff's complaint mentioned, cross-complainant's tract of land was highly improved and planted to alfalfa, and but for the circumstances alleged in his cross-complaint he would have received large returns and profits therefrom. At divers times during the four years mentioned in its complaint plaintiff undertook to carry water through its canals and deliver it to the land of cross-complainant and to the lands of other landowners but because of the weeds and deposits the water could not be carried through its canals. As a result of this condition the water was caused to overflow the banks of the canals onto and upon cross-complainant's land "at times when water coming on said land would result in the scalding and burning" of the alfalfa, "with the result that large portions of the alfalfa [on cross-complainant's land] were ruined and destroyed." These overflowing waters frequently and in large quantities "wrongfully flowed out and upon defendant's said 320 acres of land, drowning out, scalding, and destroying the crops growing thereon, thereby causing this defendant to sustain injuries and damages in the sum of $3,000"—for which amount cross-complainant prayed judgment.

[1] To this cross-complaint plaintiff demurred upon the ground that it is indefinite and uncertain; the particulars of the alleged uncertainty and indefiniteness being specifically pointed out. The demurrer was sustained, and the appellant Edwin A. Meserve now contends, and, we think with reason, that the ruling was prejudicial error. Unlike the cross-complaint filed in the companion case, the one here under consideration shows that the relief sought thereby does relate to and depend upon the contract or transaction upon which the action was brought. It shows on its face, by facts specifically alleged, that the relief sought thereby is related to the contract of sale under which plaintiff alleges that it sold and delivered the water to the three defendants, and that it is relief which depends upon the "transaction" which is involved in that sale and in the delivery of water thereunder. This is the effect of the allegation in the cross-complaint that the waters which damaged cross-complainant's crops are "the same waters which plaintiff refers to in its complaint." Manifestly, if the waters which plaintiff delivered to defendants under its contract of sale are the very waters which cross-complainant alleges damaged his crops by reason of plaintiff's negligence in permitting its canals to become choked with weeds, then the relief which cross-complainant seeks by reason of such damage is related to that contract of sale and is dependent upon the transaction upon which plaintiff brought its action. Without such sale and delivery by plaintiff there could have been no such damage as cross-complainant alleges. We may entertain some doubt as to the probability that the waters which damaged cross-complainant's crops are the very waters which plaintiff alleges it sold and delivered to cross-complainant and his two co-defendants. But be that as it may, such is the effect of the allegation that the waters referred to in the cross-complaint are the same waters which plaintiff refers to in its complaint, and we are bound to assume the truthfulness of the allegation when considering the sufficiency of the cross-complaint as against a demurrer thereto.

Since it is thus made to appear not only that cross-complainant has a cause of action against plaintiff for damages but that the relief sought relates to "the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought," it follows that the cross-complaint would have been invulnerable as against a general demurrer, had one been filed. The judgment, therefore, must be reversed as to the appellant Edwin A. Meserve, unless his cross-complaint is obnoxious to plaintiff's special demurrer, i. e., unless it is indefinite and uncertain in the particulars set forth in that demurrer.

[2-4] Proceeding now to a consideration of the particulars enumerated in the demurrer as those in respect to which it is claimed there is indefiniteness and uncertainty. The cross-complaint is not demurrable for uncertainty or indefiniteness merely because it does not state the precise times when plaintiff negligently permitted its canals to become filled with weeds and growths or when it undertook to carry water through its canals and deliver it to defendants. These are matters which rest peculiarly within the knowledge of plaintiff. Neither is the cross-complaint indefinite or uncertain because the lands to which plaintiff undertook to carry water are not specifically described, nor because the precise amount of profit which cross-complainant would have realized, had his land not been wrongfully overflowed, is not alleged. By averring that the waters which plaintiff alleges were sold and delivered to defendants are the "same" waters which overflowed cross-complainant's land and destroyed his crops, the cross-complaint plainly identifies the crops and the land whereon they were grown. And when it further is alleged that the overflowing of this land and the "scalding" of the alfalfa damaged these crops in an amount equal to $3,000, it is made to appear, from the allegations of the cross-complaint read as a whole, what was the nature, source, and extent of cross-complainant's damage. More than this was not requisite.

"All that is required of a plaintiff, even as against a special demurrer, is that he set forth in his complaint the essential facts of his case with reasonable precision and with particularity sufficiently specific to acquaint the defendant of the nature, source, and extent of his cause of action." Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 210, 201 Pac. 463.

It follows that the demurrer to the cross-complaint should have been overruled, and that the order sustaining it was error prejudicial to the appellant Edwin A. Meserve.

[5] Reversible error also was committed with respect to the appellant Harry W. Meserve. The situation presented by this case differs from that which was before us in the companion case. The two actions differ, in that here the defendants did not jointly participate in farming the land to which the water was delivered, nor did they agree to participate jointly in a division of the crops or in the profits which it was expected would be derived therefrom. Here the land was farmed by but one of the defendants—the defendant Smith—who leased it from the owner, the defendant Edwin A. Meserve. Harry W. Meserve's sole connection with the 320 acres lay in the fact that, as his brother's agent, he represented the latter in certain matters relating to the land. He testified that in all his dealings he was acting for his brother and not for himself. This testimony was not contradicted. If Harry W. Meserve incurred any liability whatever to plaintiff it was that of a guarantor and not that of a purchaser of water primarily liable therefor. The land having been leased by Edwin A. Meserve to Smith, the water was delivered in virtue of the former's ownership of the water right represented by his 320 shares of plaintiff's capital stock. Some six or seven weeks before Edwin leased the land to Smith, Harry signed and delivered to plaintiff, on what evidently was one of plaintiff's blank order forms, the following order for water:

"Brawley, Cal., August 13, 1912. Order of Owner. To Imperial Water Co. No. 4: You are hereby authorized to deliver water, under the rules and regulations of the company, to D. L. Smith and A. G. Grenagle, who are my tenants, as ordered by them, and I hereby guarantee the payment thereof. The property on which this water is to be used is tract No. 133 by the official resurvey T. 13 S., R. 14 E., S. B. M. H. W. Meserve.

"Note: This order must be signed by the party in person or his agent duly authorized in writing."

It is true that in this document Harry W. Meserve refers to Smith and Grenagle as "my tenants." But the document specifically declares that the liability which Harry undertakes is that of a guarantor. It does not fasten upon him the liability of a purchaser of water nor even that of a landlord ordering water by reason of his status as a stockholder in the plaintiff corporation. He does not undertake to order water either for himself or for those whom he inaccurately refers to as his tenants. What he does do is to authorize the Company to deliver water to Smith and Grengale "as ordered by them." It is for water thus to be ordered by Smith and Grenagle that Harry W. Meserve guarantees payment.

Plaintiff offered the order in evidence. Defendants objected upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. It was further objected to by Harry W. Meserve upon the ground that "he is not sued here as a guarantor, but as a purchaser of water." The objection was overruled, and the order admitted in evidence.

The contract of guaranty evidenced by this document seems to be the sole basis for any liability on the part of Harry W. Meserve. Without considering whether the instrument was admissible as against Edwin A. Meserve we think it clearly was inadmissible as to his brother Harry. The contract of guaranty was not the contract alleged in the complaint. Under the contract of sale upon which plaintiff brought its action the undertaking of each defendant was direct and primary. Under that contract, had plaintiff proved it to have been made as alleged in the complaint—that is, had it proved that the three defendants purchased the water—all of the defendants, Harry W. Meserve included, would have been bound as original obligors, and there would have devolved upon them a primary obligation to pay for the water. But the contract of guaranty, which the plaintiff sought to fasten on Harry W. Meserve, was the latter's separate contract, and was wholly distinct from the contract of sale alleged in the complaint. Non constat but that if plaintiff had brought its action against Harry upon the latter's contract of guaranty he could have pleaded and proved a good defense thereto.

[6, 7] The contract of a guarantor is his own separate contract; it is in the nature of a warranty by him that the thing guaranteed to be done by the principal shall be done, and is not an engagement jointly with the principal to do the thing. He is not a joint contractor with his principal. He is not primarily bound to do what his principal has contracted to do, but only to answer for the consequences of the latter's default. His is an independent contract with which his principal has nothing to do. His liability is secondary, and his contract is collateral to that of his principal. Adams v. Wallace, 119 Cal. 68, 71, 51 Pac. 14; Kinsel v. Ballou, 151 Cal. 762, 91 Pac. 620; Cooke v. Mesmer, 164 Cal. 332, 340, 128 Pac. 917;

Schehr v. Berkey, 166 Cal. 161, 135 Pac. 41; Withers v. Bousfield, 42 Cal. App. 304, 319, 183 Pac. 855; Kelley v. Goldschmidt, 47 Cal. App. 38, 42, 190 Pac. 55; Virden v. Ellsworth, 15 Ind. 144; Shore v. Lawrence, 68 W. Va. 220, 69 S. E. 791; Bodine v. Times-Journal Publishing Co., 26 Okl. 135, 110 Pac. 1096, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 149. "There is no privity, or mutuality, or joint liability between the principal debtor and his guarantor." Adams v. Wallace, supra.

Harry W. Meserve having been sued upon a contract under which, had it been proved, he would have been liable as an original obligor jointly with his two defendants, it was error to enter a judgment against him upon a liability created by an entirely distinct and independent contract to the admission of which he made due and timely objection.

The judgment is reversed.

COLLINS v. FOLLETTE et al. (Civ. 4517.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 28, 1923.)

Deeds §60—Delivery held not established.

Delivery of a deed by one prior to undergoing a serious operation, with instructions to deliver to the grantee in the event she did not survive, was insufficient where the grantor subsequently recovered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Carrie E. Collins, also known formerly as Carrie E. Bauer, against Clark M. Follette and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Adams & Adams, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit. The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant Clark M. Follette to quiet title to a certain lot in the city of Berkeley of which she alleged herself to be the owner and entitled to an undivided one-half of which the said defendant was making an adverse claim. In her complaint the plaintiff averred as the source of her title to the one-half interest in said lot to which said defendant Follette made claim, to be that of a conveyance of the same to her by her sister, the deceased wife of said Follette, which said deed antedated by several years the conveyance to said Follette by said wife, which formed the foundation of his adverse claim. By his answer in the case said Follette denied that said plaintiff was the owner of the said undivided portion of the premises in dispute in the action and in support of said denial alleged that the deed by which said plaintiff claimed to have received title to said portion of said premises had never in fact been delivered to said plaintiff by the grantor named therein but had been later destroyed by said grantor of her own volition and while she had and retained full control over the disposition of said document; and that thereafter and shortly before her death his said wife had by proper deed conveyed said undivided one-half of said premises to him. The cause went to trial upon the issues as thus framed; at the conclusion of the testimony offered in support of the plaintiff's case, the trial court granted the defendants' motion for nonsuit and entered its judgment accordingly in the defendants' favor.

The sole question presented upon this appeal is as to whether, giving the most favorable interpretation to the testimony adduced in support of the plaintiff's case, she had shown delivery of the instrument through which she claims title. We have examined the entire evidence in the case, and from such examination are entirely satisfied that there is no sufficient evidence showing delivery of said deed to support the plaintiff's claim of ownership in or to that portion of said premises to which the defendant Follette claims title under a later deed. The facts which are practically undisputed are these: The plaintiff, Carrie E. Collins, and her sister, Julia Blanch Golden, were for some years prior to June 1, 1916, the owners as tenants in common of the entire lot, the title to the undivided one-half of which is in dispute in this action, having acquired the same from their mother by deed of gift. Mrs. Collins lived in one of the houses on the property and on and for a short while prior to June 1, 1916, her sister, Mrs. Golden, was staying with her, having returned ill from a trip to Arizona. Her physician informed her that a serious operation was necessary and that she had better put her affairs in order before undergoing said operation. A notary and real estate dealer named Brown who knew both ladies was sent for, and when he arrived Mrs. Golden asked him to make out a deed to an undivided one-half interest in the property to Mrs. Collins. At the time of making this request Mrs. Golden stated to Mr. Brown that she was going to the hospital for an operation and that if she did not survive it she wished her sister, Mrs. Collins, to have the property, and that if she survived she wanted the deed back. She also asked him to make out a bill of sale to some jewelry in her sister's favor upon the same condition. Two witnesses were called in, and one of these testified to substantially the same effect as the witness Brown with respect to the wishes of the grantor. The other witness who signed the deed as such does not recall that portion of the conversation between the grantor and the notary, while Mrs. Collins herself, when called as a witness, had no recollection as to that portion of the interview, but does not deny that the interview as related by Brown and the other witness actually took place. The deed and bill of sale, when executed, were handed to Mrs. Collins, who read them over. They were then handed to the notary, who placed them in an envelope making a memorandum thereon that it was to be delivered to Mrs. Golden upon her request or to be delivered to Mrs. Collins in case Mrs. Golden died. He took the documents to his office and kept them there until Mrs. Golden had survived her operation and called for them about a year later and when he delivered them to her. Upon the presentation of the foregoing evidence, the trial court held that there had been no delivery of the document in question with intent to deliver, and hence no transfer of title to the grantee named therein. No other legitimate conclusion could have been drawn by the trial court, and it follows necessarily that the motion for nonsuit made by the defendant Follette at the close of the plaintiff's case was properly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.

POULSEN et al. v. CENTRAL COMMERCIAL CO., INC. (Civ. 4422.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 11, 1923. As Amended June 26, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error §171(3) — Whether pleading was counterclaim or cross-complaint immaterial on defendant's appeal where treated as cross-complaint by trial court and defendant's counsel.

Whether a pleading was an answer and counterclaim requiring no denial by plaintiffs or an answer and cross-complaint requiring an answer held immaterial on defendant's appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, where the trial court treated it as a cross-complaint, and defendant's counsel so contended at the trial and on appeal.

2. Judgment §101(1)—Amount properly limited to allegations in cross-complaint where defendant refused to consent to setting aside default as a condition of allowing an amendment of error in cross-complaint.

Where defendant's cross-complaint, by mistake, alleged a breach of contract to deliver 150 pounds, instead of tons, of rice, and, on discovering the error on hearing of default, its attorney rejected the court's suggestion that the default be set aside as a condition precedent to amendment, which condition was authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for amendments on just terms, the court properly allowed defendant only $2.25 on his cross-complaint, which must be construed most strongly against the pleader in entering judgment thereon on plaintiff's default.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by N. G. Poulsen and another, doing business as Ernst C. Lohse & Co., against the Central Commercial Company, Inc. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph E. Bien and Frederick Olschewski, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. Lyders, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment against it for $720, together with interest and costs, particular objection being made to the action of the trial court in allowing but $2.25 to defendant against plaintiffs upon a so-called cross-complaint.

It is not contended that the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiffs in the amount for which judgment was rendered, but it is claimed by the appellant that it should have recovered $4,500 upon its cross-complaint instead of the sum of $2.25.

The plaintiff sued for $720, commission upon a sale of rice for the defendant. The defendant answered, denying the indebtedness, and alleging "for a second and separate defense and by way of cross-complaint * * * that on or about the 15th day of May, 1918, plaintiffs sold to defendant, and defendant agreed to buy from plaintiffs, 150 pounds of rice, * * * for the price of $7.50 per hundred pounds, making a total purchase price of $22,500." Failure of seller to deliver said rice is then alleged, that the value of the rice at the time and place of delivery was $9 per hundred pounds, or a total of $29,000, and that the defendant has been damaged in the sum of $6,500, a judgment for which amount is asked.

[1] There was some controversy between plaintiffs and defendant at the time of the trial as to whether the defendant's pleading was an answer and counterclaim, requiring no denial by plaintiffs, or whether it was an answer and cross-complaint, as it purported to be, requiring an answer. The point is immaterial here, because the trial court treated it as a cross-complaint requiring an answer; counsel for appellant contended in the trial court and is contending in this court that it is such, and for the purposes of this appeal we shall agree with him, and take this view of the matter, which is the one most favorable to the case of the appellant. We shall refer, hereinafter, to such pleading as a "cross-complaint."

[2] Plaintiffs failed to answer in time said cross-complaint, whereupon defendant caused a default to be entered against them. When the matter came on for hearing, it was pointed out that the cross-complaint alleged a breach of a contract of sale of but 150 pounds of rice, with a resulting damage to defendants of $1.50 per hundred pounds, or a total of $2.25. Plaintiffs proved their claim for $720, and stated, by their counsel, that they were entirely willing that the defendant be allowed on its cross-complaint damages computed on its actual allegations as to the terms of the contract which had been breached. Thereupon defendant insisted that the cross-complaint contained a typographical error; that the 150 pounds should have been 150 tons, and that the computations of $22,500, $29,000, and $6,500 appearing in the pleading should govern, rather than the allegations on which they were based. The trial court, very properly, we think, stated that there was no presumption that the computations were more correct than the statement of weight, and that its power to construe pleadings did not extend to the length required by the defendant, and suggested to the defendant that it amend its cross-complaint, allowing the plaintiffs leave to reply thereto. This was clearly within the power of the trial court, which had discretion to allow amendment upon such terms as might be just (Code Civ. Proc. § 473), and it was clearly just to allow the plaintiffs to reply when claim was sought to be made against them upon a contract different from the one alleged in the pleading with which they had been served. Plaintiffs stated to the court that they had failed to answer the cross-complaint, first, because they regarded it as a counterclaim, not requiring answer, and, second, because they felt that, if there was any doubt about the nature of the pleading, nevertheless damages for failure to deliver so inconsequential an amount of merchandise might well be conceded to defendant without controversy, but that they desired an opportunity to reply to the amended cross-complaint if amendment should be allowed. Attorney for defendant agreed that he would amend his pleading, and that plaintiffs' default should be set aside, and they should be given an opportunity to answer. However, during the course of the colloquy between court and counsel, it was intimated that the plaintiffs would rely upon the statute of frauds as a defense to the contemplated amended cross-complaint. Thereupon counsel for defendant stated that he would not stipulate that the default should be set aside if plaintiffs were to be permitted to rely upon the statute of frauds, and refused to consent to setting aside said default, in consequence of which the court refused to allow an amendment to his pleading.

It would seem that the trial court acted with all fairness and justice in the premises. The defendant had made a mistake in his pleading. The court was willing to exercise its discretion and allow amendment upon terms eminently fair and just; counsel for plaintiff was entirely willing that this should be done, stipulating only that plaintiffs should have an opportunity to reply to the amended pleading. The defendant was not entitled to insist that the plaintiffs should forego a defense which the law provided for them. Clearly, while the cross-complaint was for damages growing out of the sale of 150 pounds of rice, the statute of frauds had no bearing upon the matter. Had the cross-complaint been amended to allege a sale of 150 tons instead of 150 pounds of rice, the plaintiffs might have raised the question of compliance with the statute of frauds by their answer thereto. This was as legitimate a defense as any defense upon the merits, and counsel had no right to insist that it should not be urged.

This is the only point in the case. The trial court could not construe the pleading in accordance with the computations therein, and ignore the allegations of facts upon which the computations were based, and the defendant refused to amend upon the obviously just terms imposed by the trial court. Defendant was entitled, therefore, upon the default of the plaintiffs, to a judgment based upon its pleading construed most strongly against the pleader.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BURCHAM. (Cr. 674.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 25, 1923.)

Perjury $\Leftrightarrow$ 33(1)—Evidence held insufficient to support conviction.

Evidence in a prosecution for perjury held insufficient to sustain conviction within Pen. Code, § 1103a, declaring perjury must be proved by testimony of two witnesses or of one witness and corroborating circumstances, and where to sustain the verdict a conviction would be based upon the presumption of identity of person by identity of name within Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Kenneth Burcham was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Reversed.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by an indictment found and returned by the grand jury of Humboldt county with the crime of perjury and was subsequently tried on said indictment in the superior court of said county. The indictment was in three counts, and the jury found him guilty on each count.

He appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The indictment charges that the alleged perjury was committed by the defendant as a witness in a criminal action tried in the superior court of Humboldt county and in which one Lawrence Mahach and Marion Rube were charged with the crime of robbery committed in said county on the 3d day of May, 1922.

It appears that in the forenoon of Wednesday, the 3d day of May, 1922, and during business hours, the Bank of Fortuna, situated in the town of Fortuna, in Humboldt county, was entered by a bandit, and in the presence of Fred P. Newell, an officer of said bank, said bandit forcibly took and robbed said bank of the sum of $18,000. About the time that the robbery was being perpetrated, a young man, a student of the high school of Fortuna, was approaching the bank, having been sent there to procure some change for the principal of the school. He saw an Oldsmobile car standing in front of the bank. As he neared the car a man emerged from the bank carrying with both hands a large sack which appeared to be filled with some article that was heavy and cumbersome. This man stepped to the front of the car and threw the sack in the front part thereof or in front of the seat next to which the driver sits when operating an automobile. This young man stated that, although the curtains of the car were drawn, he was able to observe at least one, and he thought two, men sitting in the back of the car. Immediately upon throwing the sack into the car, the party jumped in and started the machine at a rapid rate around the corner of the street and the car disappeared from sight. Within a short time thereafter several of the employees of the bank rushed out to the sidewalk and exclaimed that the bank had been robbed. At the trial of Mahach and Rube the young man testified to these circumstances and also stated that, although the face of the man who carried the sack from the bank to the automobile was thickly covered with what seemed to him to be white powder and rouge, he was, nevertheless, able to and did positively identify Rube as that party. Subsequently to the commission of the robbery, said Lawrence Mahach and Marion Rube were arrested and charged with the commission of said robbery.

On the 29th day of April, 1922, one O. J. Pidgeon, the owner of a garage in the city of Eureka, Humboldt county, just before the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., parked his Oldsmobile car in front of the Elks building in said city and thereupon went to the Elks hall to attend a meeting of the lodge and a banquet to be later given that evening under the auspices of said organization. When he returned from the Elks hall to the sidewalk where he had parked his machine, he found that it was missing. On the 30th of April in the forenoon a machine, which bore the description of Pidgeon's Oldsmobile, was seen traveling at a rapid rate of speed over a road leading from the town of Pepperwood, which is about 30 miles from the city of Eureka, and going in the direction of the town of Scotia, in Humboldt county. Later in the day an Oldsmobile of the same description was seen parked in the woods near Pepperwood about 100 yards from the highway. No one was seen about the car at the time and the engine was "dead." Parties going through the woods and who had seen the car earlier on the 30th of April again passed the same spot later in the day and observed that the machine had been taken away.

On Thursday following the day of the robbery, Pidgeon recovered his car, it having been left in the town of Fortuna, where the robbery occurred. The car had been roughly used. It was covered with dust and dirt and the insulation had burned out and the machine could not be operated without the repair of the insulation and other parts of the machinery thereof.

The description of the Oldsmobile seen in the woods near Pepperwood and the car seen by the young man near the Fortuna Bank at the time of the robbery and into which Rube threw the sack tallied with that of the Oldsmobile stolen from Pidgeon.

The theory of the prosecution was, and the people directed their proof to the support of that theory in said case of People v. Mahach and Rube (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 539, that the said parties stole the machine of Pidgeon and that they used the car for the purpose of carrying out the scheme which evidently they had conceived to rob the Bank of Fortuna. The evidence presented by the people disclosed circumstances from which the jury could well have concluded that said theory was well founded.

The defendant in this case testified as a witness for the defendant Rube. He stated that he met Rube in Eureka near 7 o'clock in the evening of Saturday, April 29, 1922, Rube having a short time before arrived in Eureka on the stage from Crescent City, Del Norte county; that in a conversation with Rube the latter said to him that he had been working "up north" and that he was anxious to return to his home; that the defendant asked where his home was, and Rube stated it was at Pepperwood, a distance of about 25 or 30 miles from Eureka; that Rube stated to him that he was short of money and that he did not like to be required to hire a car to take him home; that thereupon the witness said:

"Well, I have a friend here, if I can see him. I oftentimes use his car. I will take you home, because I had never been down that way; I had only been over here a short time. Anyway, I told him if he would pay the oil and gas and that sort of thing, and in case we had any tire trouble, I would take him home where he wanted to go."

The defendant stated that he immediately started out to borrow the car from the friend to whom he had referred in his conversation with Rube and promised to meet him (Rube) within an hour in case he succeeded in securing the loan of the car; that he did secure the car and near the hour of 8 o'clock p. m. met Rube and drove him to his home at Pepperwood. Before leaving for Pepperwood, however, Rube stated to Burcham, so the latter testified, that he (Rube) desired to purchase some sugar and corn meal to take home with him; that thereupon he (Burcham) drove the machine to the store of Hinch, Salmon & Walsh in Eureka; that Rube gave him $20 and asked him to go into the store and purchase three sacks of brown sugar and some corn meal; that he (Burcham) entered the store and purchased the articles named, returned to the car, and then proceeded on his way to Pepperwood; that, arriving at Pepperwood, Rube went to his home, and he (Burcham) returned to Eureka.

In reply to questions by the district attorney on cross-examination, the defendant stated that the name of the man from whom he borrowed the car was E. L. Hartwell; that it was a Dodge automobile; that he and said Hartwell served together as soldiers in the war with Germany and were in Europe together during said war. He was asked where Hartwell resided at the time that he got the car, and he replied that he was not certain, but believed that he stopped at a lodging house known as the Metropole in the city of Eureka. He was then asked these questions and returned the answers which follow them:

"Q. Where is he (Hartwell) now? A. I could not say that. Q. How long did he remain in the county after that night? A. As much as a month. Q. Where did he stay during that time? A. I am not sure, but I think he stayed at the Metropole."

Further cross-examining Burcham, the district attorney asked him what his (defendant's) business was, to which he replied that he had worked at different kinds of labor in different places. Further questions by the district attorney on this line and answers by Burcham are as follows:

"Q. What have you labored at since you have been in this county? A. Well, I tended bar awhile and worked in a gravel pit. Q. Where did you tend bar? A. At the Wave for about three months. (The Wave was the name of a soft drink establishment conducted in Eureka at the times mentioned by the witness.) Q. When did you commence tending bar there? A. In March. Q. How long did you continue? A. Up until I guess the middle of July—no, I mean June. Q. What were your hours of work? A. 12 to 2 and 6 until 12. Q. From noon until 2 in the afternoon? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then after that from 6? A. Yes, sir; from 6 until 12 at night. Q. Were you on duty that night? A. No, sir. Q. Why were you not working that night? A. Well I worked five or six weeks steady, and I wanted a night off. I had three nights off, not only that one."

It is upon the testimony above recited that the three counts of the indictment are predicated. The first was based upon the defendant's testimony that one E. L. Hartwell lived and was in Eureka on the 29th day of April, 1922; the second upon Burcham's testimony as to his alleged employment as a bartender in the Wave soft drink saloon from the month of March to the month of June, 1922; and the third upon his testimony that he purchased sugar and corn meal for the said Rube at the store of Hinch, Salmon & Walsh on the evening of said April 29th.

It is obvious that the object of the testimony of Burcham that he took Rube from Eureka to Pepperwood on the 29th day of April, 1922, leaving the former place near the hour of 8 p. m., was to overcome the effect of the evidence introduced by the prosecution tending to support the theory that Rube and his confederate stole the Oldsmobile car of Pidgeon at Eureka on said night and used said car in the furtherance of their scheme to rob the Bank of Fortuna.

It is not necessary to consider and determine herein whether the testimony referred to in each of the counts was as to "a matter material to the issue" in the case of People v. Mahach and Rube, since we are of the opinion that the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict was well taken as to all the counts. Referring now to count 1, an examination of the record has convinced us that there is no testimony to show that there was no such person as E. L. Hartwell residing in the city of Eureka on the 29th day of April, 1922. There is some evidence in the record that the defendant Burcham at one time resided in the town of Redding; that there at the same time lived in or about said town a man by the name of E. L. Campbell, who was also known as E. L. Hartwell; that said Hartwell met his death in an accident that occurred near Redding some six or eight months prior to the time at which the robbery of the Fortuna Bank took place. There is also some testimony that the defendant was an acquaintance of said Campbell or Hartwell and that the latter, while living in Redding, owned a Dodge automobile. There was no testimony showing or tending to show that a man by the name of E. L. Hartwell did not live or reside in the city of Eureka on the 29th day of April, 1922, or that a man of that name had not resided there for several months prior to and down to and including said date. In other words, for aught that the record discloses, there might have been such a man residing in said city at the times material to this inquiry. Section 1103a of the Penal Code declares that "perjury must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and corroborating circumstances." The testimony introduced for the purpose of establishing the charge of perjury set forth in the first count of the indictment falls far short of meeting the requirements of said section of the Penal Code. Indeed, to uphold a conviction of the defendant upon the charge that he perjured himself in testifying that E. L. Hartwell lived or was in Eureka on the 29th day of April, 1922, it would be necessary to rely wholly upon the testimony that a man sometimes known as E. L. Hartwell lived in Redding, that he owned a Dodge automobile, and that the defendant was acquainted with him. This, in effect, would amount to no more than predicated the conviction of the accused upon the presumption of "identity of person from identity of name." Section 1963, subd. 25, Code Civ. Proc.

As to the defendant's alleged false testimony as to his employment in the Wave saloon from May to June, 1922, and which constitutes the foundation for the charge of perjury contained in the second count of the indictment, it is clear that, unless the purpose of the inquiry as to his said alleged employment was to show that he was not in Eureka on the 29th day of April, 1922, his testimony as to such employment, as well as that of the people tending to prove that his statement that he was so employed during the period mentioned was false was wholly immaterial to any issue in the case of the People v. Mahach and Rube. We can conceive of no other theory upon which said testimony may be held to have been material in said case. But, conceding that the purpose of the inquiry as to his employment during said period was founded upon that theory, and that it was, therefore, pertinent and material, still an examination of the evidence has convinced us that the charge of perjury based upon said testimony is not sustained or supported by that degree or quantum of proof required by the statute. It is not necessary to enter herein into an analytical review of the testimony to verify this conclusion. It is enough to say that the proprietor of the Wave saloon, as well as other witnesses, testified that, during the months mentioned, the defendant did at times work in said saloon. In fact, the proprietor himself, a witness for the people, testified that he did work in the said saloon at different shifts in the months of April and May, 1922. (Trans., p. 152.) There is no testimony contradicting this testimony, nor, indeed, any testimony that he did not at intervals work in said saloon up to the 29th day of April, 1922.

As to the third count, the testimony presented in support thereof comes entirely from the sales clerk and the owners of the store of Hinch, Salmon & Walsh. Their testimony amounted merely to this: That some of them could not recall that the purchase claimed to have been made by the defendant at said store was made on the evening referred to; that, while one or two of the clerks had at different times seen the defendant in said store, none could recall that he had seen him therein on the evening of the said 29th of April; that none of them remembered having sold the defendant on said evening three sacks of sugar and some corn meal, or having sold him any articles of merchandise on said evening; that maintained in the store was an International cash register containing one main drawer and eight subsidiary drawers; that each of the subsidiary drawers was assigned for use to a different sales clerk; that the register tape always showed each separate sale and the amount thereof in money and also indicated a total of all sales; that goods in large bulk were kept in the warehouse adjoining the store; and that where sales of such goods were made they were customarily delivered directly from the warehouse and not taken through the main store for delivery. The tape of the register for the 29th day of April, 1922, was introduced in evidence, and it showed no such sale as the defendant claimed was made to him on said day. All of these witnesses admitted that a sale might be made and the clerk making it inadvertently omit to record it on the register. The tape of said day contained some figures which were so "blotched" that it was impossible to decipher them or tell whether they represented one, two, or four figures. One of the proprietors of the store, though, thought or "estimated" that the sale represented by the "blotched" figures was made some hours on the 29th of April prior to the time of day at which the defendant testified that he purchased the sugar and corn meal.

The above is practically all the showing that the people made in support of count 3 of the indictment. All the witnesses (clerks in the store and the proprietors) testifying that they had no recollection of selling the defendant the sugar and corn meal on the day mentioned must, within the meaning of section 1103a of the Penal Code, be regarded as one witness. In other words, the testimony of any one of said witnesses was not corroborative of the testimony of any other. Assuming, therefore, that any one witness of the said witnesses testified to any fact or facts which would tend to show that the defendant's testimony as to said purchase was false, the only circumstance which may be said to have been corroborative thereof was the tape register. It is extremely doubtful, from the condition said tape was shown to be in as to blotched figures, and the likelihood that at times (perhaps at a late hour of the day, when the goods sold were in a warehouse and not in the main store) of a failure by a clerk to "ring up" a sale, whether the tape would afford a sufficient corroborating circumstance in this case to square with the requirements of section 1103a of the Penal Code. On the other hand, assuming that the tape register showing no such sale on the day named constituted a "corroborating circumstance" sufficient to meet the requirement of the statute in a case where there is testimony of one witness tending to show perjury, was the testimony of any of the witnesses (the sales clerk and the owners of the store) such as to show that the said crime had been committed? We think not. The testimony of the clerks and the store owners was not positive as to the fact to which they testified. None of it involved a square, unqualified statement that the defendant did not make the purchase referred to. To the contrary, it was based more upon the probabilities of the situation following from the customary method of transacting business in said store. And, as further detracting from its probative value, was the admission by the witness that such a sale might have been made and no record made of it on the cash register.

No man's liberty should be taken from him upon such a flimsy showing as characterizes the evidentiary features of this case.

The judgment and the order are reversed.

REEDER v. MILLS. (Civ. 2631.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 18, 1923.)

Mines and minerals §23(1)—Sufficient if required amount of assessment work on mining claim located by association is performed on claim as a whole.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620), requiring that not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made on claim during each year prior to the issuance of a patent, it is unnecessary, where a claim is located by an association of persons, that the required amount of work be performed on each subdivision of the claim, but it is sufficient if it is performed on the claim as a whole.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge.

Action by Benjamin G. Reeder against L. J. Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. K. Collier and Jas. D. Fairchild, both of Yreka, for appellant.

Horace V. Ley and Clifford E. Butler, both of Yreka, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff was given judgment quieting his title to a certain mining claim known as the "Reeder placer mine" containing 130 acres and the defendant has appealed.

The claim was located in the year 1913 by an association of seven persons. The locators subsequently conveyed to plaintiff. In the year 1921 another association of persons posted a notice of location of the same claim. Defendant Mills claims title under the later location. The only question raised by the appeal is whether plaintiff failed to do the required amount of assessment work during the year 1920. Plaintiff testified that the value of such work was $602.50.

Appellant contends that the location consisted of eight contiguous claims and that the required annual expenditures thereon amounted to the sum of $800, citing Morgan v. Myers, 159 Cal. 187, 113 Pac. 153. The pleadings and the evidence clearly show, however, that the land described in the complaint is a single claim, initiated by a single notice of location. Section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620), among other things, provides:

"On each claim located after the tenth day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than one hundred dollars' worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year."

In Lindley on Mines (2d Ed.) § 628, it is said:

"A location by an association of persons, embracing more than twenty acres, may undoubtedly be perpetuated by the performance of the same amount of labor required of an individual locator. * * * While this suggests an inequality of burdens, it is, in our judgment, the only consistent method of construing the statute."

In Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 449, 73 Pac. 1083, 1085 (98 Am. St. Rep. 63), it is said:

"A location made by an association of persons, by the very terms of the law, is one location covering one hundred and sixty acres, and not eight locations, each covering twenty acres. * * * The expenditure of $500 before patent issues is an expenditure required upon the whole land, and not an expenditure upon the 20-acre subdivisions thereof, and the only assessment work required is labor to the value of $100 upon the single location."

See, also, McDonald v. Montana Wood Co., 14 Mont. 88, 35 Pac. 668, 43 Am. St. Rep. 616. The judgment is affirmed.

CENTRAL SAV. BANK OF OAKLAND v. LAKE et al. (Civ. 4543.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 18, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 16, 1923.)

1. Ejectment — 9(3)—Plaintiff must recover on strength of own title.

In ejectment, a plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of the claim of the defendants.

2. Evidence — 271(15)—Recital in trustee's deed held not sufficient in itself to prove trustee's appointment in substitution for trustee named in deed of trust.

In ejectment by plaintiff claiming as purchaser at trustee's sale under deed of trust, recital in trustee's deed as to appointment of trustee in lieu of the trustee named in the deed of trust, held not sufficient in itself to show his status as a trustee.

3. Principal and agent — 22(1) — Agency not proved by agent's statement.

Agency cannot be proved by the agent's statement as to his own authority.

4. Evidence — 271(15)—Title in grantor not established by grantor's statement.

One cannot establish legal title in his grantor by the grantor's statement in the grant that he has such title.

5. Evidence — 309—Certified copy of resolution of corporation appointing substitute for trustee named in deed not necessary in proving trustee's status.

Where one of the trustees who executed a trustee's deed under deed of trust was a person other than the trustee named in the deed of trust which authorized beneficiary, a corporation, to appoint a substitute for person so named, it was not necessary, in proving the status of the person appointed as substitute for the one originally named, to introduce a certified copy of the resolution of the corporation substituting the person who executed the trustee's deed, for the person originally named, duly recorded in the county where the property was situated, but it was necessary to introduce some competent evidence of the passage of the resolution as preliminary to the introduction of trustee's deed; the recital in the trustee's deed being in itself insufficient to prove the passage of the resolution.

6. Appeal and error — 1170(12) — Judgment for plaintiff in ejectment not affirmed, where there is a complete absence of proof of a connecting link in plaintiff's title, though equities are lacking in defendant's case.

Judgment for plaintiff in ejectment will not be affirmed, where there is a complete absence of proof of a connecting link in plaintiff's title, though it is apparent from the record that the equities are entirely lacking in the defendant's case, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting the reversal of a judgment except for prejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Central Savings Bank of Oakland against Fannie D. Lake and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. W. Lake, of Oakland, and Walter R. Dunn, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them in an action in ejectment. Plaintiff alleged that it was the owner of the property described in the complaint and was entitled to its possession, which was denied by the defendants. It was admitted that on June 16, 1914, title to the property in controversy was in Fannie D. Lake. On that date, she and her husband, F. W. Lake, executed a deed of trust to J. C. Carlston and Arthur L. Harris, conveying the property as security for the payment of a debt of $3,500 owing to the Central Savings Bank of Oakland. The other defendants claim their interest through subsequent grant of the defendants Fannie D. Lake and F. W. Lake, and the rights of such subsequent grantees need not concern us upon this appeal under the conclusion we have reached.

The deed of trust executed by Fannie D. Lake and her husband to the trustees above named was introduced in evidence by plaintiff, as was also a deed from J. C. Carlston and H. C. Sagehorn, as trustees, conveying the property to plaintiff as purchaser at a sale made pursuant to the provisions of the deed of trust of June 16, 1914.

[1] Plaintiff relied upon these documents to establish its title to the property. This being an action in ejectment, plaintiff must recover upon the strength of its own title and not upon the weakness of the claim of the defendants. The only question presented by the record, therefore, is: Do these documents, standing alone, establish plaintiff's title? The particular attack made upon their sufficiency by appellants is that there is no connecting link between the trustee Harris, to whom the property was conveyed by Fannie D. Lake, and her husband, and H. C. Sagehorn, who purports to convey to plaintiff as a trustee. Respondent points out that the deed of trust contains a provision as follows:

"It is expressly covenanted that the party of the third part may, by resolution of its board of directors, from time to time appoint and substitute other trustee or trustees to execute the trust hereby created and upon such appointment, either with or without a conveyance to said substituted trustee or trustees by the grantees herein, the survivor of them, their successors or assigns, the new trustee shall be vested with all the title, interest, powers, duties and trust in the premises hereby vested in or conferred upon the said grantee herein, and such new trustee shall be considered the successors and assigns of the grantees herein within the meaning hereof, and substituted in their place and stead. A copy of such resolution, certified by the secretary of the party of the third part (Central Savings Bank of Oakland) under its corporate seal, and acknowledged by either the president or secretary of the said third party, shall, when recorded in the county in which the property or any part thereof is situated, be conclusive proof of the proper appointment of such new or substituted trustee or trustees."

The deed which purported to convey title to the plaintiff, recited:

"Whereas the Central Savings Bank of Oakland, a corporation, by a resolution duly and regularly passed and adopted by its board of directors, did on the 2d day of January, 1918, substitute and appoint J. F. Carlston and H. C. Sagehorn, trustees in said deed of trust in the place and stead of J. F. Carlston and Arthur L. Harris, a copy of said resolution certified by the secretary and president of said Central Savings Bank of Oakland, a corporation, under its corporate seal, and acknowledged by its president and secretary, was recorded on the 4th day of January, 1918, in liber 2643 of Deeds, page 16, in the office of the county recorder of the county of Alameda, state of California."

It is maintained by respondent that the recital in the deed by Messrs. Carlston and Sagehorn of the regular exercise by the Central Savings Bank of Oakland of the power given to it to substitute trustees, is prima facie proof of the facts recited. This is the only real question presented upon the appeal. Regardless of the equities between the parties, we are constrained to hold that the plaintiff has not made a prima facie case.

[2-5] Recitals in trustee's deeds which have been taken to be evidence of the facts recited are only those recitals which set out the acts done in the exercise of the power, such as notice, sale, and the like. They are, necessarily, recitals of acts done by the trustee in exercise of his power. The trustee is "the accredited historian of his acts under the power." Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 288. But in the present case, the only evidence of Sagehorn's status as a trustee (not of his acts in that capacity) is his own recital of it. One does not prove agency by the statement of an agent as to his own power (Hubback v. Ross, 96 Cal. 426, 430, 31 Pac. 353; People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 16 Pac. 537); nor can one establish legal title in his grantor by the statement of said grantor in the grant that he has such title. Under like reasoning, plaintiff, in the present action, cannot establish Sagehorn's capacity as trustee and his consequent investiture with the legal title, by Sagehorn's declaration of those facts. Sagehorn attempted to pass the legal title to plaintiff; plaintiff must show that Sagehorn had such title. That can only be done by a showing that he was duly substituted for the trustee Harris, in whom, jointly with Carlston, the legal title rested upon the showing made by the deed of trust introduced in evidence. True, plaintiff was not compelled to offer the "conclusive proof" of this fact designated by the deed of trust, i. e., a certified copy of the resolution substituting Sagehorn as trustee, duly recorded in the county where the property was situated—but it should have offered some evidence which was competent of the passage of the resolution substituting Sagehorn as trustee, as preliminary to the introduction of the deed executed by him as trustee, purporting to convey the property to plaintiff.

The case of Page v. Gillett, 26 Colo. App. 204, 141 Pac. 866, seems to be directly in point. That was an action in ejectment; plaintiff claiming title through a trustee's deed. The trustees' deed to the purchaser at the sale was executed by two out of three trustees, with a recital that the third was dead. The recital was the only evidence offered of the death of the third trustee. It was held that the recital was not prima facie proof of the death of the third trustee, and judgment was for the defendant in the ejectment suit. In the case of Lawless v. Stamp, 108 Iowa, 601, 79 N. W. 365, it was held that a deed by a receiver with full recitals as to the existence of the receivership and his appointment as receiver, was not prima facie evidence of these matters. A deed containing a recital of a grant from a previous owner was no proof of such deaignment of title. Crump v. Thompson, 31 N. C. 491, 493. Recitals in a guardian's deed are not evidence that he is a guardian. Lumber Co. v. Alwood, 141 Ga. 653, 657, 81 S. E. 1119.

"Recitals in a deed which do not constitute an essential part of the conveyance, are certainly not conclusive evidence against a third person of the facts recited; neither is a recital of the power or authority of the grantor, for the making of the conveyance in ordinary cases, even presumptive evidence of the existence of such power. Thus, to sustain a conveyance executed by an attorney under a power, by an executor under a will, or by a sheriff under an execution, the power of attorney, the will or the execution should be produced as the best evidence of the power to sell." Jackson v. Robert's Ex'rs, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 422, 425.

Respondent relies upon the case of Savings & Loan Society v. Deering, 66 Cal. 281, 5 Pac. 353. That case states that recitals in a deed executed by the trustees to a creditor who purchased at the sale under a deed of trust, to the effect that the trustee did, as a condition of the sale, permit the creditor to bid and purchase, are prima facie evidence of the facts recited, although the deed of trust is silent as to their effect. That case, however, decides that trustees, having the legal title may convey such legal title either in execution of the trust or in violation of the same, and that in an action in ejectment, where only the legal title is involved, it is only necessary to prove that the legal title was conveyed to plaintiff. The foregoing statement suggests the difficulty in the present case. It is only necessary for the plaintiff to prove that it is the holder of the legal title. In order to do that, it must prove that its grantors, Carlston and Sagehorn, were vested with the legal title. No proof is offered of this important matter except the statement of Sagehorn regarding his appointment as trustee, from which it would follow that he would hold the legal title. That statement of his capacity is insufficient to establish it, and therefore there was no proof that he was vested with the legal title at the time he executed the conveyance to plaintiff. The legal title must be traced to Sagehorn before it can flow through him to plaintiff, and the proof is lacking to establish this connecting link.

[6] This is the type of case where a reversal of the judgment is much to be deplored, as it seems apparent from the record that the equities are entirely lacking in the defendants' case. We do not think, however, that even the wholesome provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of this state justify this court in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in ejectment, where there is a complete absence of proof of a connecting link in plaintiff's title.

The judgment is reversed.

SCHUTT v. SCOTT. (Civ. 3838.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1923.)

1. Principal and agent §39(1)—Agent held obligated to deliver proceeds to principal, though no demand other than filing suit necessary.

Where defendant was agent for plaintiff for the sale of a tractor, defendant was under a positive duty to deliver the money thus received by him to plaintiff, and no demand other than the filing of suit was required.

2. Sales §39(1)—Prospective buyer of automobile held not entitled to claim $325 as return of deposit, where deposit consisted of car credited at $325.

Where plaintiff buyer contracted with defendant salesman to purchase a D. car to be delivered in 30 days, but if not so delivered plaintiff to have the right to cancel the order, defendant's liability to be limited to the return of plaintiff's deposit, held, that where plaintiff's deposit was an O. car for which he received under the contract a credit of $325, he could not, by cancellation of the order for failure to deliver within 30 days, claim $325 from defendant on the theory what the O. car was sold to defendant, but was entitled only to a return of the O. car.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. S. Schutt against C. R. Scott. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed with directions.

C. W. Braswell, of Lindsay, for appellant.
Avery J. Howe, of Lindsay, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. [1] This appeal is from a judgment rendered upon the default of the defendant after the overruling of his demurrer to the complaint. This contains two counts. Both are upon contract. The first is for the direct payment of money due Schutt through the alleged sale of a tractor by Scott as agent for Schutt. The defendant was under a positive duty to deliver the money thus received by him to the plaintiff. No demand other than the filing of suit was required. Danielson v. Neal, 164 Cal. 748, 130 Pac. 716; 13 C. J. 729. As against this cause of action the general demurrer and that on the ground of uncertainty are without merit.

[2] As to the second cause of action, we think the demurrer should have been sustained. The allegations are that Schutt entered into a contract with Scott, acting as agent for the Dodge Automobile Company, to purchase a Dodge touring car; the car was to be delivered within thirty days after September 22, 1922. It was agreed that—

"If the vehicle is not delivered within thirty days after September 22d, I reserve the right to cancel this order, and your liability shall be limited to the return of my deposit on request."

The deposit consisted of an Overland car concerning which the contract provides that Schutt shall receive a credit, the language employed in this behalf being:

"Deposit credit by Overland.....$325.00."

The complaint avers that the Dodge was not delivered within the period agreed upon; that the plaintiff has canceled the purchase contract, and has "requested defendant to repay said $325, as provided by said order," which defendant has refused to do. The prayer is for $325, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

Under the terms of the contract, Schutt had a right to demand the return of his deposit, which was the Overland. He cannot claim that through this transaction he had sold this car to Scott. The purchase agreement expressly provides that upon cancellation by the buyer his only claim shall be for the return of his deposit.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to set aside the default entered upon the second count of the complaint and to sustain the demurrer against it, with leave to the plaintiff to amend, the default on the first count to stand.

1. Principal and surety ⇨29—Surety on undertaking to secure release of attachment held not bound by filling of blanks by attachment defendant.

Where an undertaking to secure the release of property attached recited that the attachment defendant had been sued for the sum of $600, but left blank the spaces in which to specify the amount which the sureties undertook to guarantee, and the attachment defendant, without the knowledge of his sureties, changed the "$600" to "$3,559.85," and inserted "$4,000" in the blank space as the amount of each surety's undertaking, the bond was not invalid, but the sureties were liable only to the extent of $600.

2. Alteration of Instruments ⇨12—Authority to fill blanks in instrument cannot be presumed.

It cannot be conclusively inferred from the presence of unfilled blanks in an instrument at the time of delivery that the depository thereof is authorized to fill such blanks.

FINCH, P. J. In an action brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $3,609.85 from Edward L. Tobin, there was issued an attachment under which the sheriff took possession of an automobile belonging to Tobin. The defendants herein executed and delivered to Tobin an undertaking in the following form:

"Whereas, the above-named plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of the county of San Francisco, state of California, against the above-named defendant, claiming that there was due to said plaintiff from said defendant the sum of six hundred and no/100 ($600.00) dollars, or thereabouts, and thereupon an attachment issued against the property of said defendant as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that might be recovered therein; and certain property and effects of the said defendant have been attached and seized by the sheriff of the said Tulare county, under and by virtue of said writ;

"And whereas, the said defendant is desirous of having said property released from said attachment:

"Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, residents and householders in the county of Tulare, in consideration of the premises, and also in consideration of the release from said attachment of the property attached, as above mentioned, do hereby, jointly and severally, undertake in the sum of — dollars, and promise that, in case the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, defendant will, on demand, pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action, together with the percentage, interest and costs; the same to be paid in United States gold coin, if so required by the terms of the judgment."

Tobin, without the knowledge or consent of either defendants or plaintiff, changed the words "six hundred and no/100 ($600.00)" appearing in the undertaking as delivered to him to "three thousand five hundred and fifty-nine and 85/100," and inserted "four thousand" in the blank space for the amount of the penalty of the undertaking. As so changed, Tobin delivered the undertaking to the sheriff, who thereupon released the attached property. Plaintiff recovered judgment against Tobin in the sum of $2,250. This action is for the recovery from the defendants of the amount of such judgment. The court found the facts as stated, and gave the plaintiff judgment for the sum of $600. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed on the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] The undertaking, as delivered by defendants to Tobin, was enforceable to the extent of $600, the sum for which the undertaking recites that plaintiff had sued Tobin. The omission to state the penalty in the blank space provided therefor did not render the undertaking invalid. "The object of a penalty in a bond is to limit the obligation of the signers." 9 C. J. 40; 32 Cyc 121. The recitals in an undertaking, as in other contracts, may likewise limit the obligation of the sureties. In an undertaking for the release of an attachment, the recital of the amount for which suit was brought is material as showing the extent to which the signers intended to bind themselves, since a judgment cannot exceed the amount demanded in the complaint. The law relative to the filling of blanks in contracts and other changes therein after execution is clearly expressed in the following authorities:

"It is settled law that, where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to another for use as such, with blanks not filled up, such instrument so delivered carries on its face an implied authority to complete the same by filling up the blanks; but the authority implied from the existence of the blanks would not authorize the person intrusted with the instrument to vary or alter the material terms of the instrument by erasing what is written or printed as part of the same, nor to prevent the scope and meaning of the same by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to what was plainly and clearly expressed in the instrument before it was so delivered. By virtue of the implied authority, such a depository may perfect, in his discretion, what is incomplete, by filling the blanks; but he may not make a new instrument by erasing what is written or printed, nor by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to the plainly expressed intention of the same as shown by its written or printed terms." Angle v. Northwestern Life Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 330, 23 L. Ed. 556.

"Where there is no express authority in the person to whom a note or other instrument is intrusted or delivered to make alterations therein, it is only where such writing is patently incomplete in some respect, such as an omitted date, or a blank space required to be filled to make the contract express the intent of the parties, that there is any implied authority to insert new matter, or make any material addition thereto. Even in such a case the implication must very plainly arise from the circumstances, or the maker will not be bound. This is upon the very obvious principle that any unauthorized change in a material respect destroys the integrity of the instrument as the contract which the maker has executed; it ceases to be his contract and is avoided, even in the hands of an innocent holder for value." Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 46, 50, 52 Pac. 115, 116 (39 L. R. A. 697.)

"This right to fill blanks left in a writing, without any express authority, rests upon an assumption of consent; it is considered that the fact that blanks are left in an instrument implies an authority to fill them, provided the possession of the incompleted paper has been intrusted under circumstances which permit the inference of authority to perfect it, and where, in view of such apparent authority, it would be a fraud upon innocent parties to permit an assertion to the contrary. Consequently, the rule of implied authority to fill blanks does not apply where the circumstances negative consent." 2 C. J. 1244.

In this case the court has found that, after the execution of the undertaking, its terms were changed in the manner stated without the knowledge or consent of the defendants. Since the evidence was not brought up, it does not appear what the circumstances surrounding the transaction were, or whether they were such as to negative the implied consent to fill the blank space, arising from the delivery of the instrument with the unfilled blank. It cannot be conclusively inferred from the presence of unfilled blanks in an instrument, at the time of delivery that the depository thereof is authorized to fill such blanks, but the question of authority so to do is one of fact to be determined by the trial court from all the surrounding circumstances. In the absence of the evidence produced at the trial it must be presumed in support of the judgment that the circumstances proven negated any implied consent of defendants to the making of the alterations in the undertaking.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEST v. WEST. (Civ. 4045.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1923.)

Marriage ⇨ 58(1)—Annulment of marriage contract under age of legal consent held warranted.

Under Civ. Code, § 82, providing that a marriage may be annulled where petitioner was under the age of consent and was married without parents' or guardian's consent, unless, after attaining age of consent, petitioner cohabited with the spouse, annulment of marriage of one less than 18 years old without consent of his parents was warranted, where the parties did not cohabit after attaining age of consent, though the parents had encouraged the parties to continue living together.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Laurel V. West, by Perry C. West, his guardian ad litem, against Lena May West, for an annulment of marriage. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daley & Byrne, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Chas. L. Allison, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. By this action plaintiff seeks to annul his marriage with defendant. The appeal is by the plaintiff on the judgment roll alone. The findings and facts admitted by the pleadings, among other things, show that the parties were married on the 7th of November, 1917, at which time the said Laurel V. West was under the age of 18 years, and had no guardian other than his parents in whose custody and under whose control he then was; that the parents had no knowledge of the marriage and did not consent to it; that subsequent to the marriage two children were born to the parties; that after the plaintiff attained the age of 18 years he and the defendant never cohabited together. The further fact appears that the plaintiff's parents after learning that the marriage had been duly solemnized, encouraged the plaintiff and defendant to continue living together as man and wife.

On these facts the superior court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. Section 82 of the Civil Code provides:

"A marriage may be annulled for any of the following causes, existing at the time of the marriage: That the party in whose behalf it is sought to have the marriage annulled was under the age of legal consent, and such marriage was contracted without the consent of his or her parents or guardian, or person having charge of him or her; unless, after attaining the age of consent, such party for any time freely cohabited with the other as husband or wife."

The instant case comes squarely within this section. The plaintiff at the time of the marriage was under the age of legal consent and the marriage was contracted without the consent of his parents, who were the only persons then having charge of him. Under these circumstances, the Code expressly provides that the marriage may be annulled upon application of the infant unless "after attaining the age of consent such party, at any time freely cohabit with the other as man or wife." The facts do not bring the case within this exception. It is obvious that acquiescence or even express consent of the parents after the marriage has been contracted is ineffectual to render the marriage valid. The authority of the parents in the matter of giving consent to the marriage of their infant child is conferred, and also by the statute. This marriage became voidable immediately upon solemnization, and could become binding only in case the plaintiff had freely cohabited with the defendant after attaining the age of consent.

The judgment is reversed.

CORNWELL v. MULCAHY. (Civ. 2619.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 25, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1923.)

1. Witnesses $\S$ 379(7) — Question on cross-examination held proper and pertinent.

In an action for labor done and material furnished in sinking a well, where defendant testified on direct examination in reference to his agreement with plaintiff's agent, question put to defendant on cross-examination whether he remembered having signed a statement in the original answer, conflicting with his testimony on direct examination, held proper as involving pertinent matter.

2. Witnesses $\S$ 379(7) — Use of superseded answer to impeach testimony on direct examination held proper under statute.

Use on cross-examination of superseded answer to impeach defendant's testimony on direct examination held permissible under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2052.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 206(2) — Party failing to call for explanation of damaging testimony when he had opportunity to do so cannot complain on appeal.

Where counsel did not see fit to exercise his right, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1854, to call for an explanation of defendant's damaging answer to question on cross-examination when such explanation was in order, and he had the opportunity, he could not complain on appeal that the answer was unexplained.

4. Work and labor $\S$ 27(5) — Questions held to bear upon issue whether work was done in approved and workmanlike manner.

In an action for labor done and material furnished in the sinking of a well, questions put to plaintiff as to tools used and methods pursued in drilling wells, and the effect thereof on the sand strata, held bearing upon the issue whether the work was done by plaintiff in an approved and workmanlike manner.

5. Payment $\S$ 65(6) — Negative averment of nonpayment need not be proved.

A plaintiff is not required to prove his negative averment of nonpayment notwithstanding that he must allege it in his complaint.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 1071(5) — Challenged finding ignored if other findings are sufficient to support judgment.

A challenged finding may be ignored without affecting the results of a case where the other findings which respond directly to the material issues are sufficient to support the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Frank L. Cornwell against James Mulcahy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant. Glen West, of Lodi, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The complaint was upon a common count for $654 for labor done and material furnished in the sinking of a well by plaintiff upon defendant's land, and the judgment was in favor of plaintiff for the amount of $563, from which the appeal has been taken. Defendant denied the indebtedness, and alleged that plaintiff agreed to sink the well 12 inches in diameter throughout its entire depth; that he guaranteed to obtain a sufficient supply of water to irrigate defendant's land, and that he agreed to case the well sufficiently to prevent the same from filling up. It was further alleged by defendant that plaintiff constructed the well 12 inches in diameter to a depth of 46 feet only, and cased it to that depth, and then sank the well from that point only 6 inches in diameter, and put no casing therein; that the well was not straight; that it was insufficiently cased, and that, by reason thereof, it filled up with sand and debris and was worthless. The court found against defendant as to these allegations, and furthermore that plaintiff merely agreed to sink a well upon defendant's land in a good and workmanlike manner, and to install therein such well casing as plaintiff might consider reasonably necessary for that purpose. It was also found that plaintiff performed the work and constructed the well in a proper and effective manner, and installed therein sufficient casing as the condition of the earth required, and that he used due care and skill in every respect.

We can see no merit in the claim of appellant that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings in favor of respondent. It may be admitted that there is a decided conflict in some material respects, but we cannot say that the trial court was in error in according credit to the showing made in favor of plaintiff. Appellant makes a common mistake of quoting a portion of the testimony which favors his view, and ignoring that of a contrary tendency. We have carefully read the transcript, and found therein ample support for the findings, but we see no necessity for quoting it. We may add that the brief of respondent sets it out fully enough to justify the conclusion of the trial court.

"Q. I will ask you if you remember signing this statement in your original answer: 'Further answering said complaint, the defendant alleges as follows: That it was expressly stipulated and agreed by and between plaintiff and defendant herein, that only ten feet of casing should be put into the well by plaintiff for said defendant, and that plaintiff should use such casing as was furnished by defendant for that purpose?'"

The general objection was made, and also that "the witness cannot be interrogated as to the contents of his previous answer that had been superseded; that it was not cross-examination, and does not tend to contradict anything that the witness has testified to." Thereupon the record shows the following:

"The Court: The objection is overruled. A. I signed that; yes. I have got an explanation to offer. Mr. Carpenter: The witness desires to make an explanation. The Court: That will come along in time."

Manifestly, as claimed by appellant, the cross-examination must be confined to matters which have been elicited on the direct examination. On the examination in chief, though, the witness had testified in reference to his agreement with plaintiff's agent:

"He said he was familiar with all that part of the country and that the casing, whatever casing would be needed, why, he would put in. So we tried to agree on how much the casing would be and he told me he couldn't tell, so I told him to go ahead with the casing at the market price, whatever the price would be. So he went ahead and put the well in. So I asked him again how much casing did he think we would need. Well, he stated in part of it, not all the way, 10 to 30 feet, take a 12 inch."

The foregoing is sufficient to show that the question to which objection was made involved a pertinent matter of cross-examination.

[2] The other objection is equally untenable. Some early decisions seem to go to the extent of holding that a superseded pleading cannot be used even for the purpose of impeachment; but the doctrine has been repudiated by the late decisions of the Supreme Court. Of these we may quote from Williams v. Seiglitz, 186 Cal. 767, 200 Pac. 635, as follows:

"In support of his contention that the original answer was improperly admitted as a part of his cross-examination, appellant cites Morris v. Lachman, 68 Cal. 109, 8 Pac. 799; Stern v. Loewenthal, 77 Cal. 340, 19 Pac. 579; Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154; Ponce v. McElvy, 51 Cal. 222. These authorities lay down the rule that in this state an abandoned pleading may not be used as evidence against the pleader. However, it has been held that such a pleading may be admitted for purposes of impeachment of the pleader's testimony by showing prior inconsistent statements. Estate of O'Connor, 118 Cal. 69, 50 Pac. 4; Schuh v. Herron Co., 177 Cal. 13, 17, 169 Pac. 682; Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 Pac. 625. * * * Notwithstanding appellant's claim to the contrary, we think it clear from the record that the original answer was admitted for purposes of impeachment, although there is no direct statement to that effect. * * * The pleading was properly admitted."

It is clear that herein the question was asked for the purpose of impeachment, and it was clearly within the contemplation of section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] In reference to the answer of the witness it is appellant's contention that he "was entitled to make his explanation at that time, and before the intervention of other testimony, and while the matter was fresh in his memory." His right to explain cannot be doubted. Section 1854, Code Civ. Proc. The court, however, did not deny him that right, but, having in view the usual practice in such cases, properly supposed that on redirect examination his counsel would ask for the explanation. It would certainly then have been "fresh in his memory"; but the record shows that only a few more questions were propounded in the cross-examination, and there was no redirect examination whatever. If counsel did not see fit to call for the explanation when it was in order and he had the opportunity he should not complain now because the answer was unexplained.

[4] Appellant criticizes the action of the court in overruling his objection to the following questions:

(1) "Now, without saying what other people said about it, what was your experience with this rotary tool?" (2) "Now, what would you say was the cause of these rotary tools drilling a crooked hole?" (3) "What is the result of that tool being connected by means of those jointed rods?" (4) "What would you say in that respect to the drilling tools used which are used to sink a well by means of a cable?" (5) "In regard to those stratas of flowing sand that may fill up a well, as you strike those obstacles going down, what is the proper practice?" (6) "After a well is sunk through soil of this character, that is fine soil, dry sand strata, and maybe a small, flowing sand strata, what is the principle, when you are through, in regard to pumping your well out?"

We are satisfied that these questions all had some bearing upon the issue whether the work was done by plaintiff in an approved and workmanlike manner. This issue was directly raised by the answer, and the only objection to the questions was the general one, and that they involved a consideration "not within any of the issues raised by the pleadings."

[5] Appellant contends that the failure of plaintiff to prove the nonpayment of his claim is fatal to the judgment, and he cites some earlier decisions favorable to his contention; but the rule in this state is now well established that in cases of this character the plaintiff is not called upon to prove his negative averment of nonpayment, although, of course, he must allege it in his complaint. Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142. In the former it is said:

"Where a plaintiff has proved the existence of a debt sued on—at least, within a period of statutory limitation—the burden of proving payment is on the defendant."

Furthermore:

"Of course, it has been held by this court, as it was always held at common law, that in a complaint upon a promissory note, or other obligation to pay money, there must be an averment that the money had not been paid. This is necessary to make the complaint perfect upon its face. But it is a nonsequitur to say that because such negative averment is necessary in the complaint therefore it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove it. The question is not one of pleading, but of evidence; not what must be alleged, but where the burden of proof lies. The general rule is that a party is not called upon to prove his negative averments, although they may be necessary to his pleading."

[6] The other material findings, which are challenged by appellant, are sufficiently supported, as already stated.

Appellant asserts:

"The finding that the alleged Cornwell well filled in with sand because the defendant failed and neglected to cause said well to be pumped or operated at the time of its alleged completion is not within any of the issues raised by the pleadings. * * * It is a well-settled rule of law that findings without the issues cannot sustain the judgment, and a decision based thereon must be set aside."

There is no question about said principle of law, but it has no application to the situation herein. At most, said finding involves merely surplusage. The other findings, which respond directly to the material issues, are sufficient to support the judgment, and said challenged finding may be ignored without affecting the result. It may be recalled, however, that the answer of defendant alleged that the well filled with sand because of the defective construction by plaintiff, and it was not inappropriate for the court to find and declare the real cause for this condition.

We think there is no sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

PELLISSIER et al. v. PAN-AMERICAN PETROLEUM CO. (Civ. 3825.)

Mines and minerals §78(1)—Lessor held not entitled to recover unpaid lien rentals after termination of lease by lessee's delivery of quitclaim deed.

Under an oil lease requiring commencement of one well within 6 months, and which provided lessee might terminate the lease by delivering to lessors a quitclaim deed, or that it might be terminated at lessors' option by notice after a failure of lessee for 30 days to perform any of the covenants, and an extension agreement requiring lessee to pay a monthly rental in lieu of commencing operations, as provided, where lessee, after failure to make certain rental payments, terminated the lease by delivering a quitclaim deed to the lessors, lessors are not entitled to recover the rental charges for the unpaid months preceding termination of the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Frank F. Pellissier and another against the Pan-American Petroleum Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. J. Denis, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Stephen Monteleone, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The appellants, Frank F. Pellissier and his wife, leased certain lands belonging to them to one E. L. Doheny, as lessee, for the exploration of oil and gas. The lease was executed on the 10th day of October, 1917, and was subsequently assigned by the lessee to the Pan-American Petroleum Company, a corporation, the respondent herein. Neither the lessee nor his assignee, the Pan-American Petroleum Company, ever commenced operations for the drilling of a well upon said land. Extensions of time for commencing said drilling operations were granted to the lessee by the lessors up to the 10th day of October, 1919. On November 24, 1919, plaintiffs executed to respondent's assignor a certain indenture in writing, under which four payments were made to the lessors, being for the months of October, November, December, and January. The fourth payment was made on January 12, 1920. No payments were made for the months of February and March, 1920. On the 21st or 22d day of April, 1920, the respondent, Pan-American Petroleum Company, tendered to the appellants a quitclaim deed to the land. This action was brought to recover the rent alleged to be due for said months of February and March, during which months the lessee retained possession of the land.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The court, among other things, found as follows:

"That, after the execution and delivery of said indenture, dated November 24, 1919 defendant made four monthly payments of $833.33 each under and pursuant to said indenture, and thereby exercised its right to extend the time in which to commence drilling operations up to the 18th day of February, 1920; that thereafter defendant retained all rights and privileges granted by said lease up to the 10th day of April, 1920, but did not retain, nor did it elect to retain, any rights or privileges granted by said indenture dated November 24, 1919, beyond the 10th day of February, 1920, and accordingly failed and refused to make any further payments thereunder; that there did not become due or payable from defendant to plaintiffs, or either of them, on the 10th day of April, 1920, or at any other time, the sum of $1,666.66, or any other sum, nor any interest whatever, and there is not due or owing from defendant to plaintiffs, or either of them, the sum of $1,666.66, or any part thereof, or any interest whatever thereon."

Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendant that plaintiffs take nothing by their action, from which judgment plaintiffs appeal. Appellants' contention is that the court erred in its construction of the terms and effect of the last extension agreement or instrument of November 24, 1919, and also of the lease itself.

The following provisions of the lease and extension are essential to the determination of the appeal. The following is quoted from the lease:

"The lessee shall, subject to the exceptions hereinafter contained, commence operations preparatory to the work of drilling one well upon said land within six months from the date thereof, and thereafter prosecute, with reasonable diligence, the work of drilling such well for the production of petroleum therefrom until petroleum in paying quantities, as hereinafter defined, is found, or such well is abandoned as hereinafter provided."

Also:

"That in the event that the lessee shall, at any time during the term hereof, fail to perform any of his covenants and agreements contained in subdivisions 1, 11, and 111, of the lessee's covenants herein, and such failure shall continue for a period of thirty days after the personal service of a written notice thereof upon the lessee, or his heirs or assigns, specifying the particulars in which such failure has occurred, this indenture of lease shall, at the option of the lessors, become immediately null and void, and the lessors shall thereupon have the right (subject, however, to the provisions in paragraph 4 of the lessors' covenants herein) to re-enter upon the land hereby leased, and remove all persons therefrom, provided, however, that such re-entry, if made, shall be the sole and exclusive remedy of the lessors for the breach on the part of the lessee of his said covenants or agreements in said paragraphs contained; that, in the event the lessee shall desire to abandon this lease and terminate all of his obligations hereunder, he shall have the right so to do by serving written notice of such abandonment upon the lessors, and delivering and yielding up to the lessors the possession of all of the land hereby leased, except so much thereof as the lessee may be entitled to retain under the provisions of paragraph fourth of the lessee's covenants herein, and delivering to the lessors a quitclaim deed executed and acknowledged by the lessee, releasing, remising and quitclaiming unto the lessors all the land hereby leased, except so much thereof as the lessee may be entitled to retain under the provisions of said paragraph fourth."

The last extension agreement provides:

"Now, therefore, the lessors hereby agree that, in lieu of commencing and prosecuting operations for the drilling of a well upon said land described in and leased by said indenture of lease, the lessee may, if he shall so elect, pay to the lessor on the 10th day of each and every calendar month, for an additional period of six (6) months, commencing on the 10th day of October, 1919, as and for rental for said land, the sum of eight hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents ($833.33) per month, and such payment so made from month to month shall relieve the lessee of and from all obligations to commence or prosecute any drilling or other operations upon said land during such month."

An analysis of this lease and the subsequent extension agreement indicates that the property was leased for a period of 20 years from October 10, 1917, and that the lessee bound himself to commence operations preparatory to drilling for oil within six months from the execution of the original agreement. It will not be disputed that this provision was intended to be for the benefit of the lessors, and might be waived by them. If the lessee failed to prepare to drill as agreed, no other or additional obligation rested upon him because of such failure. The lessees might terminate the lease by serving the notice stipulated, but if they did not do so the lease would remain unimpaired. The lessee might abandon at any time by giving up possession and executing the quitclaim deed, etc., mentioned in the lease, yet, unless such action was taken, mere lapse of time could in no way affect its life. Doubtless, if neither party did anything the lessee might at any time during the 20 year period of the lease have begun to drill for oil, and would then have been protected as still within the lease, provided he thereafter continued operations with reasonable diligence, and did not permit himself to become otherwise delinquent.

We now proceed to the next consideration, namely, what effect did the parties intend the last extension agreement to have upon the obligations and rights of the parties in respect to the matters here involved? Other extension agreements had been executed by which the lessors had given consent to the lessee's failure to begin operations. Under these, payments in the nature of rent had been made monthly by the respondent, beginning with April 3, 1918, and continuing until November 26, 1920. The last extension stipulates that the result of the payments under its terms so made "from month to month" shall be to "relieve the lessee of and from all obligations to commence and prosecute any drilling or other operations upon the land during such month." (Italics ours.) One outstanding fact resulting from this provision is that under it each month is considered as a single period. The same stipulations apply to all six of the months included in the term covered by this last extension, but each one is segregated from the others, so that, if the lessor were to make one monthly payment of $833.33, his time to begin operations would only be extended for the particular month for which such payment was made. Another thing which the language clearly indicates is that the purpose which actuated the parties to sign this agreement was to preserve the lessee's right to drill in the land in question. This was the only result accomplished. The lessors acquired no new rights except to the rental money received by them. Again, the lessee, and not the lessors, had the right to decide whether or not the last extension agreement should have any application. It is provided that certain things shall be done "if he shall so elect," reference being made to the lessee; and, lastly, his election is to be made monthly, and not for the entire period of six months treated as a single term. This conclusion logically follows from the recital, "such payments so made from month to month," and it necessarily results from the closing stipulation to the effect that each payment shall relieve the lessee from all obligations to drill "during such months." As the lessee had the right to elect each month during the period of six months whether or not he would keep his right to begin drilling alive, the only question remaining for determination is as to the manner in which his election was to be made. One way, and but one, is mentioned; that is, by the payment of $833.33 to the lessors on the 10th day of the month for which the lessee should desire to be relieved from the obligation to commence drilling.

We do not regard McMillan v. Philadelphia Co., 159 Pa. 142, 28 Atl. 220, as a precedent in this case, because the lease there involved contained an express covenant requiring the lessee to pay a definite rental if it failed to do certain development work stipulated. The type of a lease which appellant refers to as the "or lease" is one in which the lessee agrees to drill, or in lieu of drilling to pay a rental. The lease before us contains no covenant to that effect. The language used expressly makes it optional with the lessee to neither drill nor pay rent, pursuing which course he would, of course, forfeit all right under the lease should the lessors so elect. Courts have no right to alter the contract made by the parties to it by adding an agreement not incorporated therein. This the case of Scott v. LaFayette, 42 Ind. App. 614, 86 N. E. 495, does, if by the statement contained in the decision it is meant that the clause construed, although making it optional with the lessee to allow the lease to lapse through failure to drill or pay rent, will, regardless of the language used, be held to stipulate that the lessee must either drill or pay rent. No other case cited or known to us holds that such an obligation will be read into a lease which has made no provision for it. The case of Jackson v. O'Hara, 183 Pa. 233, 38 Atl. 624, cited in Scott v. LaFayette, does not so decide. In that suit the lessee definitely promised to "complete one well on the premises from the date thereof," and, in case of failure so to do, he covenanted to "pay as rental to the party of the first part for such delay the sum of $50 per month, payable in advance." The opinion in Scott v. LaFayette is quite unsatisfactory. In that no clear reason is given for the conclusion reached concerning the point here involved. The proposition is emphasized that no forfeiture clause on behalf of the lessor was contained in the lease. The court may have regarded it as inequitable that the rights provided in that regard were unequal and lacked reciprocity. The lease in the case at bar is not subject to this criticism. A court of equity has no occasion to apply a strained construction on this account, for the lessors are amply protected by a clause authorizing the termination of the lease by them in case the lessee failed to prepare to drill as agreed.

The judgment is affirmed.

COPELAND v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4139.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1923.)

1. Indictment and information ☞15(4)—Grand jury may return more than one indictment on same facts.

A grand jury having found one indictment is not disqualified to return a second upon the same facts, the proper procedure being taken.

2. Indictment and information ☞15(1)—Legislature has power to remove restrictions on indictment procedure before grand jury.

The Legislature may prescribe the mode of procedure in prosecuting crimes, hence remove any restrictions on the grand jury's right to reindict.

3. Indictment and information ☞15(4)—Superior court may delegate to district attorney choice of any one mode of procedure to reindict under statute.

Under Pen. Code, § 1008, authorizing the court to direct resubmission of case to same or another grand jury on sustaining demurrer to indictment, an order, "Demurrer to indictment sustained and case ordered resubmitted to the grand jury," authorizes resubmission to the same grand jury which was still in session, since the theory of the provision of the Code is to vest the court and not the district attorney with discretion as to mode of procedure, and the order will be construed as delegating to the district attorney discretion as to mode of procedure which is permissible.

In the matter of the application of J. L. Copeland against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Sidney N. Reeve, Judge thereof, for a writ of prohibition. Writ denied.

Black, Hammack & Black and J. L. Copeland, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. On the 17th day of August, 1921, the petitioner was indicted by the grand jury of Los Angeles county for the crime of perjury. To this indictment a demurrer was interposed on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and the superior court ordered the same sustained, in making of which ruling the following language was used: "Demurrer to indictment sustained and case ordered resubmitted to the grand jury." The district attorney thereupon resubmitted the case to the same grand jury, and a second indictment was returned against the petitioner also charging him with perjury. It is not denied that this charge was based upon the same subject-matter and facts as was the first. The petition alleges on information and belief that no witnesses were examined or evidence introduced before the grand jury in the time intervening between the returning by it of the first and second indictments.

In due time the petitioner moved the superior court to set aside the second indictment on the ground that it was not found, indorsed, and presented as prescribed in the Penal Code of California, and particularly section 995 thereof; and that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. This motion was denied, the defendant pleaded not guilty, and the case set for trial, and upon application duly made an alternative writ of prohibition was issued by this court.

The petitioner insists that the grand jury finding the second indictment had no jurisdiction, because he asserts the order directing the resubmission of the cause does not comply with section 1008 of the Penal Code; and for the further reason that the grand jury had previously indicted the defendant for the same offense.

[1, 2] As to petitioner's contention that a grand jury having found one indictment is disqualified to return a second upon the same facts, we have no doubt. This is a matter entirely within the authority of the Legislature to regulate. It is one of procedure and hence does not infringe any substantial right of the defendant. People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 165 Pac. 555. As the Legislature possesses the power to prescribe the mode of procedure in prosecuting crimes, it might remove all restrictions upon the grand jury's right to reindict; also the district attorney might be given full discretion to determine when to proceed by a second indictment after demurrer sustained to the first. But the Legislature has not seen fit to vest this discretion with the district attorney. On the contrary, it has expressly and carefully reserved the authority to determine how, if at all, further proceedings by way of prosecution shall be taken.

Section 1008 of the Penal Code, concerning the question at issue, provides:

"If a demurrer is sustained and an amendment is not allowed, or if allowed, is not made, within such reasonable time as the court may fix, the court shall give a judgment of dismissal, which shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offense. The defendant shall thereupon be discharged, unless the court directs the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed; provided that after such order or resubmission, the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him, as in other cases."

The case of Terrill v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. Unrep. 398, 60 Pac. 38, was decided in 1899 when the statute used the phrase, "to another grand jury," instead of "to the same or another grand jury," as it now reads. Hence that decision can be of no assistance here.

[3] In other cases the Supreme Court has emphasized its construction of section 1008 of the Penal Code upon the general proposition here under discussion. We refer to the fact that the theory upon which this legislation proceeds is that the lawmakers have vested in the court and not in the district attorney the discretion of deciding whether the district attorney shall proceed further against one who has been accused of a public offense in the pleading to which a demurrer has been sustained. Trial courts and district attorneys cannot mistake the language of Ex parte Williams, 116 Cal. 512, 48 Pac. 499, and Ex parte Hayter, 16 Cal. App. 211, 116 Pac. 370, in which the authority and duty of the former has been announced and the limitations of the latter most positively stated. Indeed, the meaning of the language of the Code section is so clear that it should need no interpretation. It is equally apparent that the discretion and jurisdiction of the superior court does not end with determining whether or not there shall be any further prosecution; the mode of such further prosecution is also indisputably a matter for the court's decision.

Counsel for the people argue that the language used in this instance is sufficiently definite in directing that the case be resubmitted to the grand jury; that this language means the same grand jury. Petitioner responds as far as the record shows there may have been no grand jury in session when this order was made. We think this cannot be maintained, for both indictments were returned by the same grand jury; the second being subsequent to the making of the order in question. It follows that when the order was made the grand jury which returned the first indictment had not been discharged and was in existence.

But we think the court's action must be sustained upon another ground. It has been held that the court may delegate the choice of any one of the modes of prosecution provided in section 1008 of the Penal Code to the district attorney. Matter of Application of June, 30 Cal. App. 767, 159 Pac. 452. This was the effect of the order made in the present instance. By directing that the case be "resubmitted to the grand jury," the court determined that there should be further action on the part of the people by way of presentation of the matter looking toward an indictment, but permitted the district attorney to elect whether to resubmit the matter to the grand jury which had voted the first indictment or to another grand jury. This the June Case holds the trial court had a right to do.

The petition is denied.

WALLENBACK v. ARNOLD. (Civ. 4573.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1) — Appellate court unconcerned with portions of record in conflict with portions supporting findings on conflicting evidence.

The appellate court is unconcerned with portions of the record in conflict with portions supporting findings by the trial court on conflicting evidence.

2. Executors and administrators $\S$ 221(9) — Findings that contract to convey property in consideration of services was forged, and that claimants failed to perform, sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support the court's findings that an alleged contract by decedents to convey property in consideration of an agreement to care for them during their lives was not executed by or with their knowledge or consent, but was forged, and that claimants did none of the things required thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by L. T. Wallenback against Lottie Arnold, individually and as executrix of the will of James Beechler, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Bantz, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Maxwell McNutt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought against her as executrix of the last will and testament of James Beechler, deceased, to recover $25,000 damages for the breach of an alleged contract between plaintiff and defendant's testator.

James Beechler, during his lifetime, was a physician engaged in operating a sanitarium at Soquel, Santa Cruz county, Cal. The contract alleged in the complaint was one by which plaintiff and his wife agreed to take care of Dr. Beechler and his wife during their lives, and to take full charge of the sanitarium operated by the doctor, and to care for the doctor and his wife in sickness and in death, and in consideration of these services the doctor and his wife agreed to give and convey to plaintiff and his wife all the property then owned or thereafter to be acquired by them. The trial court found, upon sharply conflicting evidence, that the alleged contract was never signed by either Dr. Beechler or his wife, and that their names were not signed thereto with their knowledge, consent, or authority, and that the alleged contract set out in the complaint was not written, dictated, or executed by or with the knowledge or consent or authority of the said James Beechler and/or Jennie Beechler, but, as to them, and each of them, the same was and is a fictitious, forged, and counterfeit writing and agreement, and that the said names, James Beechler and Jennie Beechler, were signed thereto and thereon by the wife of plaintiff without the knowledge, authority, or consent of the said James Beechler and Jennie Beechler. The trial court also found that the plaintiff and his wife did not do any of the things which by the terms of the alleged contract they were required to do.

[1] The only argument made by the appellant upon the appeal is that the findings are not in harmony with any of the testimony in the record. The conclusive answer to this contention is found in the record, and it is only necessary to call attention to the portions of the record which support the findings; with the portions of the record in conflict therewith, we are unconcerned, under the familiar rule regarding the power of appellate courts to review questions of fact, upon which findings have been made by the trial court upon conflicting evidence.

[2] For years prior to the date of the alleged contract Dr. Beechler and his wife had lived in Soquel, Santa Cruz county, where he conducted the White Cross Sanitarium for the treatment of persons afflicted with asthma. He was an educated man, punctilious and exact in his business habits, rarely omitting to make entries and records of his business transactions. At the time it is alleged the contract was made Dr. Beechler was about 80 years of age. He was in possession of all his faculties, and actively engaged in his business. His wife was at that time practically blind, and hence unable to read or write, but able to go about unassisted.

In 1914 Mrs. Lottie Arnold, the defendant, became an employee of Dr. Beechler at the sanitarium, and remained there continuously until the 8th day of March, 1919. Her relations with the Beechlers, according to her testimony and that of Mrs. Gregory, a neighbor and close friend of the Beechlers, were entirely harmonious, and she remained with them until the illness of her son necessitated her residence in San Francisco.

In the spring of 1918 plaintiff, an itinerant junk dealer, stopped at the sanitarium to be treated for an injured ankle. He remained there over night, and then left, but in the fall of that year he returned with his wife, and Dr. Beechler gave them a little cottage on the place in which to live. They were not regularly employed by Dr. Beechler, but occasionally did odd jobs, for which they were paid. In January, 1919, the plaintiff and his wife were given living quarters in the sanitarium, and the plaintiff worked as chore man and his wife assisted about the house. On or about February 3, 1919, Dr. Beechler ordered the plaintiff to leave the sanitarium. In consequence of this plaintiff and his wife both left the sanitarium and went to the home of a neighbor, Mrs. Gregory, where they remained for about a week. On February 10, 1919, a patient from the sanitarium brought to Mrs. Gregory's house a note from Dr. Beechler, stating that he wished Mrs. Wallenback to return to assist with the cooking and housework. In reply to this note Mrs. Gregory wrote to Dr. Beechler on behalf of Mrs. Wallenback, stating that Mrs. Wallenback and her husband would return if the doctor would treat Wallenback more kindly, and that Mrs. Wallenback would do the cooking if she received in compensation therefor $1.50 a day and board for herself and husband. Mr. and Mrs. Wallenback returned to the sanitarium that afternoon, and Mrs. Wallenback was paid according to her own terms. She states she was paid under this arrangement only until March 8, 1919, the date of the alleged contract, but receipts bearing her signature and dated subsequently to March 8 were introduced in evidence. The weakness of this evidence lay in the fact that the year did not appear after the month and day. Mrs. Wallenback took advantage of this fact, and stated that she had never received money for her services after March 8, 1919, and that the receipts must have been for another year. However, from considerable testimony in the record, the trial court was justified in believing that Mrs. Wallenback was not working for Dr. Beechler in March, 1918, and, therefore, the receipts could have been for no other year than 1919.

As previously stated, Mrs. Arnold left the sanitarium on March 8, 1919, to return to San Francisco. Plaintiff and his wife testified that the alleged contract was signed on that afternoon between 4 and 5 o'clock. Mrs. Gregory, a neighbor, testified that she was with Mrs. Beechler when Mrs. Arnold left the house; that she remained there all afternoon, and until after 5 o'clock; that she was constantly with Mrs. Beechler; that no contract was discussed or signed by Mrs. Beechler.

In the month of August, 1919, Mr. and Mrs. Wallenback left the sanitarium and went to a ranch which they owned near Boulder Creek. They testified that Mrs. Wallenback was directed by Dr. Beechler to take a vacation. Mrs. Gregory testified that they told her in July they were tired of working for others; that they had plans for making their living upon their own property, and would go to it and work for themselves. In September, 1919, while the Wallenbacks were at Boulder Creek, Dr. Beechler sold his sanitarium, and with his wife moved to San Francisco into a home which he had purchased there, and Mrs. Arnold and her son lived with them until the death of the doctor. Mrs. Beechler died in September, 1920, and Dr. Beechler in March, 1921.

The record contains numerous incidents and circumstances which are irreconcilable with the existence of the alleged contract. Said contract, offered in evidence, is as follows:

"Soquel, Santa Cruz Co.—March 8th.

"In the year of our Lord 1919. This agreement made and entered into. Between Dr. James Beechler M. D. and Jennie Beechler his wife the Partys of the first part, and L. T. Wallenback and Carrie Wallenback the Partys of the second Part. Agreement to take care of the Partys of the first part during their lifetime; and take full charge of the white cross Sanitorium; and the Partys of the second part farther agrees to be good and kind and take care of both in sickness, and in death. The partys of the first Part agrees to give and convey to the Partys of the second Part all the property he now owns or may hereafter own., all drugs and fermuals included, for their care. All wills or contracts shall be Null and void if made through undue influence, without this contract is canceled by the Partys of the Second Part.

"The partys of the second Part farther agree to give the Partys of the first Part a good burial and Pay all debts if there be any, and they farther agree to devide the property equally with their adopted daughter Jennie Stephenson if the Partys of the first Part die within one year. If the Partys of the first Part live longer than one year the Partys of the second Part shall be the legal and lawful heirs of all the Estate of the first Partys.

"James Beechler, M. D.

"Jennie Beechler.

"Carrie Wallenback."

It is asserted by the plaintiff and his wife that the foregoing document was prepared by the doctor, a man of education and business experience, and that at the doctor's request plaintiff took it to a stenographer to be typewritten. The original draft was not produced, but the signatures were added to the typewritten copy. The errors in spelling are attributed by the appellants to the stenographer, whose name or place of business could not be recalled by Wallenback. Wallenback testified that he was unable to read or write, except to the extent of writing his name. Specimens of Mrs. Wallenback's handwriting were offered in evidence. She was asked on the witness stand to write certain extracts read to her from the contract, and she displayed the same peculiarity in the spelling of the word "parties" as is apparent in the alleged contract. This and many other illuminating similarities between the specimens of her handwriting and the signatures of Dr. Beechler and his wife to the alleged contract were pointed out by the expert witness called on behalf of defendant.

Shortly before the death of Dr. Beechler plaintiff consulted an attorney, and as a result of that conference the attorney wrote the following letter to Dr. Beechler:

"An old gentleman by the name of Wallenback has requested me to take up with you for settlement a claim for services rendered by him to you at Santa Cruz, all the circumstances of which I am advised you are perfectly familiar with. He advises me that you promised to pay him at said time, but that you left the locality without seeing him. This matter must be adjusted. I assume that you are aware that this matter can be taken up not only through the courts, but through the office of the labor commissioner of the state of California, so give this matter your prompt attention."

True, the writer of this letter stated upon the witness stand that this letter was entirely his own idea—was not suggested by his client, and did not really state the claim of his client, but was sent merely to see what sort of a reply would be received from Dr. Beechler. However, we think the letter is of some significance despite this testimony. There is also evidence that some time after the date of the alleged contract Wallenback told Mrs. Gregory that he had a contract with Dr. Beechler by which he had been given an option to purchase the sanitarium for $7,000. Wallenback also stated upon the witness stand that he had obtained such a contract. Just why he should be interested in paying $7,000 for property which the doctor was already under contract to convey to him for his services is not made clear to us. After the Beechlers moved to San Francisco, in September, 1919, no attempt was made by plaintiff and his wife to communicate with them, nor to care for them, nor to render any service whatsoever. Mrs. Wallenback stated that they learned of the death of Mrs. Beechler from a friend in Oakland, and that notice of the death of the doctor came to her and to her husband through the newspapers.

It seems to us that the findings of the trial court are the natural and proper ones deducble from the evidence, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 29(2)—Unlawful detention and prayer for rent and judgment quieting title held properly pleaded in answer in suit for specific performance; "arose out of same transaction."

In a suit for specific performance of an alleged oral agreement to sell land wherein plaintiffs claimed ownership, it was proper under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 437, for the answer to allege as a defense plaintiff's unlawful possession and detention and to ask, under section 438, for affirmative relief for recovery for use and occupancy, and that defendants' title be quieted, since the claim for rent and prayer for quieting title "arose out of the same transaction" within sections 437, 438.

2. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 94(2)—Tenant denying landlord's title held not to have right to notice to quit.

A tenant who denies his landlord's title cannot claim a right to any notice to quit.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Evidence held sufficient to create that conflicting condition in the evidence into which an appellate court will not enter to inquire as to where the truth lies.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Suit by Albert Wedderien against Alonzo W. Wood and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert F. Shippee, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. [1] This is an action for specific performance of an alleged oral agreement to sell real property which the complaint states had been partly performed by the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered for the defendants, quieting their title to the property involved as against the plaintiff, adjudging that defendants have possession and the value of the use and occupation of the premises. The defendants Alonzo W. Wood and Ellie Wood, answering, claim to be the owners of the property in question and asked to have their title to said property quieted as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff moved to strike the allegations of this character from the answer, which motion was denied. One of the grounds upon which appellant relies is that this motion should have been granted. To sustain this contention he relies upon section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure and asserts that the paragraphs of the answer sought to be stricken out are neither a general nor special denial of the material allegations of the complaint, nor a statement of new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim.

As we have said, the suit is one for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real property. The answer admits that the plaintiff has been in possession of the property; alleges facts which, if true, establish that the possession and detention thereof was unlawful; and asks affirmative relief for the recovery of rent for the use and occupancy of the premises, and also that the title of the defendants Alonzo W. Wood and Ellie Wood be quieted. We think these matters were appropriate to be litigated in the instant action and to be pleaded by way of answer. In so far as the character of the possession of the property by plaintiff was concerned, the allegations of unlawful detainer constituted a part of the defense.

The claim for rent clearly arose out of the same transaction as that which is the basis of the plaintiff's alleged cause of action, and hence was a proper matter to be pleaded by way of the answer. Sections 437, 438, Code Civ. Proc. For the same reason it was permissible to seek to quiet the title of the defendants as against the plaintiff's claim to ownership of the property in question. The mere filing of this action alleging the existence of a contract to convey was sufficient to render the defendants' title unmarketable. Had the plaintiff seen fit to have dismissed, the defendants could have secured relief only through an action to quiet title. The cloud which rested upon defendants' title grew out of the transaction which formed the subject matter of the instant suit. Defendants might have instituted a separate proceeding to quiet title, but they were not required to do so.

[2] Appellant specifies 10 particulars in which it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. The first three are grouped together under the assertion that the evidence does not uphold the finding of respondents' ownership of the property and the appellant's unlawful withholding of its possession on the 1st day of November, 1920. It is admitted that the respondents may be regarded as the owners from the date of recording the sheriff's deed which occurred September 30, 1920; however, the claim is made that plaintiff was at least a tenant from month to month and entitled to one month's notice to quit. Such a notice was given on October 27, 1920. The tenant who denies his landlord's title cannot claim a right to any notice. McCarthy v. Brown, 113

Cal. 15, 45 Pac. 14; Abbott v. Kellogg, 18 Cal. App. 432, 123 Pac. 227.

Therefore if the evidence supports the findings that the allegations in the complaint of the making of the oral agreement for the sale of the property are untrue, and also those findings of fact establishing defendants' ownership, the plaintiff must be held to have been in unlawful possession on November 1, 1920. The sheriff's deed was recorded before that date, and so, for the purpose of these three specifications of error, the findings are sustained.

[3] The next point which merits comment is that the evidence is insufficient to support finding No. 3, to the effect that the allegations in the complaint of an oral contract giving plaintiff the right to purchase under certain conditions, and that pursuant to said contract plaintiff paid defendants a sum in excess of $1,000, and entered into possession of the property are untrue. The trial court found that no such contract as that alleged was ever made. The evidence is susceptible of this construction, and hence the judgment will not be disturbed upon this ground. The complaint alleges the agreement to have been made on February 14, 1918. Plaintiff's testimony was that the arrangement was oral. Alonzo W. Wood testified concerning the same conversation that he made the remark that if Wedderien could get the money within three months he would throw $150 off from the principal sum of $2,531.10, then owing to the defendants. The witness was then asked: "Did he make any further offer of payment of that sum or any other sum?" To which he replied, "No, sir," thus denying the agreement as alleged in the complaint and testified to by the plaintiff. Although there is other evidence in the record to sustain the court's findings here under consideration, the testimony above quoted is alone sufficient to create that conflicting condition in the evidence into which an appellate court will not enter for the purpose of inquiry as to where lies the truth. It may be added that if the contract of sale was not made, the delay upon the part of defendants in asserting their rights which occurred could not create such an agreement.

Paragraph III of the complaint states that pursuant to the verbal agreement to which reference has been made, plaintiff entered into possession of the premises, and paid certain interest to the defendants and taxes upon the property and paid out more than one thousand dollars for its upkeep and repair. This the findings hold to be untrue, and appellant insists that there is no evidence in support thereof. If no agreement such as that alleged was ever made, it necessarily follows that the plaintiff did none of the acts related in pursuance thereof.

The other specifications of insufficiency of the evidence, as well as of error in admitting it, become immaterial by reason of the upholding of the findings already discussed. For example, the sufficiency of the attempted tender need not be considered, since the alleged contract whose provisions were intended to be availed of never existed.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHAIN v. KATZE et al. (Civ. 3829.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 20, 1923.)

Brokers $\Leftrightarrow$ 65(2)—Broker guilty of fraud in execution of agency forfeits right to compensation.

If a broker is guilty of fraud in the execution of his agency, or is not faithful to his trust, his right to compensation is lost.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Suit by Joseph Chain against H. C. Katze and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, and L. E. Nathan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action for an accounting, alleging that defendants, whom he had employed as brokers to represent him in the purchase of certain real property, had been guilty of fraud in the execution of their agency and that they had wrongfully converted to their own use certain moneys with which he had intrusted them. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants have appealed.

Substantially the following facts are shown by the evidence or were found by the trial court: Defendants, who are real estate brokers, were employed by plaintiff as his agents to negotiate for the sale to him of certain real property in the city of Bakersfield owned by one Chin Yen, and upon which was situated a hotel. After accepting the employment defendants, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff, denied that they had been employed as the latter's agents to negotiate for the sale of the property to him, and claimed that they themselves had bought the property from Chin Yen, and that they were reselling it to plaintiff as his vendors, and in furtherance of their purpose to defraud they falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that the purchase price of the property was $34,000, when as a matter of fact it could be and was purchased from the owner, Chin Yen, for $31,000, as defendants well knew. By reason of this treacherous conduct on the part of his trusted agents plaintiff was induced to and did pay to them certain sums of money aggregating $3,159.10. The sums expended by defendants in their negotiations with Chin Yen, including their personal expenses, amounted to $2,928.50, which amount, when deducted from the $3,159.10 so paid by plaintiff to defendants, left a balance of $230.60, for which plaintiff recovered judgment.

Though crediting defendants with certain items of expense incurred by them in the course of their employment, such as traveling and telephone expenses, the trial court refused to allow them the commission to which they claimed they were entitled as compensation for services performed by them in negotiating for the property. There was evidence tending to show that in the community where this transaction occurred 5 per cent. of the selling price is generally considered to be a reasonable compensation for services honestly and faithfully performed by a broker in successfully negotiating for the sale of real property to his principal. Had the court allowed such compensation in this case the defendants would have received an additional credit of $1,550, which would have left a balance in their favor of $1,319.40, instead of a balance against them of $230.60, as found by the court.

Appellants do not question the correctness of those findings whereby the court found that they had been guilty of fraud in the execution of their employment as respondent's agents. The sole point urged by them is that the court erred in not crediting them with a reasonable compensation for their services in negotiating for the sale of the hotel property to plaintiff. The contention lacks merit. The rule is so general as to be trite that, if a broker is guilty of fraud in the execution of his agency, or is not faithful to his trust, his right to compensation is lost. 9 C. J., p. 566; Hageman v. Colombet, 52 Cal. App. 350, 198 Pac. 842; Harrison v. Craven, 188 Mo. 590, 87 S. W. 962.

Where brokers employed by defendant to purchase property misrepresented the purchase price, and repudiated their agency, and represented to defendant that they purchased the Action by Charles Cohn against Joseph Chain and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, as the assignee of H. C. Katze and L. G. Helm, brought this action on a nonnegotiable promissory note for the principal sum of $1,660, and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure its payment. The note and mortgage were executed by defendants, as makers and mortgagors, to Katze and Helm as the payees and mortgagees. Defendants' answer alleges that the note was given without any consideration therefor, and that it was fraudulently procured by the payees. Judgment passed for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

The facts of this case are closely related to those involved in Chain v. Katze et al. (No. 3829) 217 Pac. 578, this day decided, and grow out of the same transaction. The payees, who had been employed by the defendant Joseph Chain as real estate brokers to negotiate for the purchase by him of certain hotel property in the city of Bakersfield, fraudulently represented to the latter that the purchase price was $34,000, whereas its price was but $31,000. Moreover, plaintiff's assignors, in furtherance of their scheme to defraud these defendants, repudiated their agency as such real estate brokers employed to negotiate for the sale of the property to their principal, and represented to him that they, themselves, had purchased the property, and were reselling it to him. By reason of this fraudulent breach of trust the defendant Joseph Chain, to complete the sum which he was led to believe would be necessary to meet the full amount of the misrepresented purchase price and to take care of certain incidental expenses, gave to Katze and Helm the promissory note in question, executed by himself and wife. The trial court, having found the facts in defendants' favor, entered a judgment canceling the note and mortgage.

Appellant urges that his assignors should have been allowed a reasonable compensation for their services as brokers in negotiating for the purchase of the hotel property. This sum, they claim, should be 5 per cent. of the actual selling price, i. e., 5 per cent. of $31,000. Had the trial court allowed Katze and Helm this sum for their services in bringing about the sale of the property to their principal, there would have been a balance due to them from Joseph Chain amounting to $1,319.40; and it is claimed that to this extent, at least, there was a valuable consideration for the note. This is the sole point made on this appeal. On the authority of Chain v. Katze et al., supra, it must be held that Katze and Helm, because of their faithlessness in the execution of their agency as real estate brokers employed by Joseph Chain to represent him in the purchase of the hotel property forfeited all right to compensation for their services.

The judgment is affirmed.

WIGHTMAN v. HALL et al. (Civ. 4048.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 21, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1923.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨78—Time of essence of option contract; courts may not extend.

Because of the nature of an option contract, time must be deemed the essence thereof, and the courts may not allow the optionee time beyond that limited in the writing in which to accept, nor is it necessary that the offeror of an option notify the optionee that the offer is no longer open when the time has expired.

2. Tenancy in common ⇨55(6) — Evidence held insufficient to establish ratification of extension on option given by cotenant.

Evidence that two co-owners of property, after a third had granted an extension on an option to purchase same, discussed the matter and carried on negotiations on the subject, held insufficient to establish a ratification of the unauthorized extension by the third co-owner.

3. Specific performance ⇨10(1)—Where unwarranted against one co-owner properly denied as to all.

Where specific performance as against one co-owner of property is unwarranted, it is properly denied as to all.

CRAIG, J. This is an action for specific performance of a written contract, giving plaintiff an option to purchase property held by the defendants as equal co-owners in common. The contract was dated September 5, 1919, and expired January 15, 1920. On the last-mentioned date Della M. Hall signed her name, followed by the word "agent," executing a writing purporting to extend the plaintiff's option to February 15, 1920. On February 14th plaintiff tendered to Della M. Hall the agreed purchase price. She rejected this offer. The contract was executed by each of the defendants, but Della M. Hall was the only one to sign the extension agreement. Time was not expressly made of the essence of either writing. The trial court denied the relief sought and entered judgment for the defendant.

[1] We think it clear that, at the time of plaintiff's tender the original option had expired for all purposes unless it was kept alive by the writing signed by "Della M. Hall, agent." A number of authorities are cited by appellant to the proposition that where time is not expressly made of the essence of the contract the mere fixing of a time or date does not make it an essential factor. These cases principally deal with contracts other than option. In Cates v. McNeil, 169 Cal. 697, 147 Pac. 944, the contract was in creating an option. It was so construed that the offer to perform was within the time stipulated. Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458, was a case where an agreement gave plaintiff 20 days in which to exercise his option to accept or reject. Later plaintiff's time was extended indefinitely, so that defendant might perfect his title. It was the court's opinion that time was of the essence of the original proposal for sale, although not expressly so stated. It is said in the opinion:

"Had no time been mentioned, the plaintiff would have been entitled to reasonable time in which to exercise his election, but, the time having been fixed, the court has no power to extend it."

This principle is applicable to the instant case. It is in accord with authority in other jurisdictions.

The rule fixing the time for the exercise of options is well stated in 21 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 931, as follows:

"Where by the terms of a contract for an option the exercise thereof is limited to a specific and definite time, it is necessary that the option be exercised before the expiration of such time, otherwise the right is gone. Attempts to exercise the option after the expiration of the time limited, on the ground that in equity time is not of the essence of a contract, have been uniformly met with the answer that where the parties have seen fit to regard time as an essential element, the courts must likewise so regard it. However true in regard to executed contracts in general, the principle has generally been regarded as having no application to an offer to make a contract which by express agreement is to remain open for a specified time. There is, moreover, a strong inclination on the part of the courts to view any delay with great strictness, on the ground that the party seeking to enforce performance was not bound, while the other party was bound."

Many English and American cases are cited supporting this statement of the law, and Vassault v. Edwards, supra, has not been questioned or qualified in this jurisdiction.

A full appreciation of the nature of an option precludes the idea that courts may allow the optionee time beyond that limited in the writing in which to accept the offer of the other party. With the lapse of time the right to exercise the option automatically expires. In this regard it is similar to an estate upon limitation, which terminates without any act of those claiming the estate to succeed to it. It is not necessary for the offerer of an option to notify the optionee that the offer is no longer open when the time limit has expired. It is not a case of cancellation of a right, for the right only existed up to a certain time and then ceased by the mere passing of that time.

The most that can be said for appellant's contention concerning the efficacy of the extension signed by Della M. Hall, as agent, is that the evidence was conflicting as to her authority. It is unnecessary to quote the testimony in detail, but there was direct testimony to the effect that she possessed no agency to bind her sisters in this transaction.

[2] The evidence upon which appellant predicates the claim that Genevieve B. Scheurer and Cora M. Scheurer ratified the act of Della M. Hall in that behalf is quite insufficient. It appears that Cora Scheurer was informed of the signing of the extension by Della after it had been executed; the former discussed the matter with the latter, and carried on "negotiations" on the subject, although the transcript does not indicate the nature of them. These facts would not justify the conclusion that a ratification had occurred. Nor is the rule of estoppel applicable here. Plaintiff was not led to do anything in reliance upon Cora M. Scheurer's conduct. He failed to take advantage of his option, and his right under the original agreement had expired before the acts or silence relied upon had occurred.

[3] We conclude that the trial court rightly held that the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance against Cora M. Scheurer and Genevieve B. Scheurer. Consequently it properly denied the prayer for specific performance against all of the defendants, since they were co-owners. Olson v. Lovell, 91 Cal. 508, 27 Pac. 765.

The judgment is affirmed.

S. L. JONES & CO. v. BOND. (S. F. 9923.)(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1923.)1. Sales —59—Sales contract not mentioning place of production held not modified by letter of credit naming place of production; "terms to be arranged."

Where contract for the sale of steel bars provided for the quantity, size, price, time, and place of shipment, and under the printed heading "Terms" had the words "To be arranged," and thereafter the parties orally agreed that payment should be in cash on delivery f. o. b., such payment to be secured by a letter of credit, the contract was complete, and, since the phrase "terms to be arranged" includes only the terms of payment and not the producer from whom the steel was to be obtained, the fact that the letter of credit subsequently obtained from a bank by the buyer authorized the buyer to draw on the bank for the steel to be shipped by a certain named steel works, being a contract solely between the seller and the bank, could not affect the contract between buyer and seller, and, since such contract did not name any particular steel producer, the seller's failure to deliver could not be excused by the fact that the steel works named in the letter of credit never produced steel bars.

2. Sales — 85(1)—Contract must clearly name production concern to excuse seller from delivery because of nonproduction by such concern.

If seller desires to be free from his obligation to deliver in the event of nonproduction by a particular concern, the contract must clearly provide to that effect.

3. Sales — 418(3)—Measure of damages for seller's failure to deliver stated.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3354, the measure of damages for breach of contract to sell personalty is the excess, if any, of the value of the property to buyer over the amount which would have been due the seller under the contract if it had been fulfilled, and in estimating such damages the value of the property to the buyer is deemed the price for which he might have bought an equivalent thing in the market nearest to the place where the property ought to have been put in his possession.

4. Sales — 418(2)—In computing damages for nondelivery of steel in Vancouver, market value in Vancouver held properly determined by adding cost of transportation to Pittsburgh market value.

In an action for damages for breach of contract for seller's failure to deliver steel bars in Vancouver, to compute the damages the market value of steel in Vancouver was properly determined by adding to the Pittsburgh market value the cost of transportation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by S. L. Jones & Co., against Vincent Bond, doing business under the name of Bond Bros. & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lent & Humphrey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Powell & Dow, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. [1] The defendant in this action appeals from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff for an alleged breach of contract. The conceded facts of the case which constitute the basis of plaintiff's cause of action are these: On January 27, 1920, plaintiff and defendant signed an instrument, partly printed and partly type-written, which provided for the delivery by the defendant to the plaintiff of 1,000 long tons of steel bars of a specified size at $3.90 per 100 pounds, f. o. b. Vancouver. Shipments were to be made in February, March, and April, subject to "Hunt's inspection, buyer's account." On the face of this instrument, under the printed heading "Terms," the parties inserted the words "To be arranged." Thereafter the parties arranged for a letter of credit, which was issued by the Bank of California on February 11, 1920. This letter of credit authorized the defendant to draw on the bank at sight for and on account of the plaintiff "for any sum or sums not exceeding in all $92,000 U. S. currency covering 1,000 long tons steel bars (order No. 83, to be shipped by Port Moody Steel Works, Ltd., Port Moody, B. C., on or before April 30, 1920."

No steel was ever delivered, and it is for this failure to deliver that damages were sought and recovered. Defendant contends that the instrument of January 27, 1920, is insufficient in and of itself to constitute either a formal contract between the parties or a memorandum, under the statute of frauds, for the reason that it affirmatively appears from the phrase "Terms. To be arranged" in said instrument contained, that the terms of credit or payment were not agreed upon, but were to be the subject of future negotiations between the parties.

It is to be noted that defendant does not claim that there was no contract whatever between the parties. The defendant, however, denies that any contract was established as of January 27, 1920, but claims that the terms of payment were agreed upon and settled by subsequent arrangements between the parties, and that a binding contract thereupon came into existence. One of the terms of this contract, so the defendant argues, was that payment should be made only for steel shipped by the Port Moody Steel Works. With this fact as a basis the defendant contends for the conclusion that, inasmuch as the Port Moody Steel Works never commenced operations and produced no steel, delivery by defendant under the contract was excused.

Even if it be conceded that the first portion of the defendant's contention be correct, namely, that the terms of payment subsequently agreed upon must be considered as a part of the contract ultimately consummated, and assuming that, had the parties relied exclusively upon production by a specified mill for performance, the failure of such mill to operate would have excused delivery, nevertheless we are of the opinion that the defendant's contention cannot be maintained. This must be so, we take it, for the reason that we find nothing in the contract between the seller and the buyer indicating or tending to indicate that it was the intent of the parties to limit the subject-matter of the contract to steel which was to be fabricated at and by the Port Moody mills.

The contract of January 27, 1920, between the parties was entire and complete on its face, except as to the terms of payment thereafter to be arranged. It will be noted that no mention is made in the instrument executed on that date of the Port Moody mills or of any other place of production, nor do we find any other indicia that these mills were exclusively in the minds of the parties. The phrase "Terms. To be arranged" cannot, by even the most liberal construction, be construed to mean anything more than that the method and manner of payment was to be thereafter arranged. Obviously it was not intended to nor did it include the idea that there was open to settlement the question of where the steel should be obtained. The written instrument of January 27, 1920, therefore, contained all the details of the agreement for the purchase and sale of the steel, with the exception of the method of payment to be later agreed upon. Thereafter the parties did arrange and orally agree upon the terms of the payment, i. e., payment to be cash upon delivery of the steel f. o. b.; such payment to be secured by a bank letter of credit. That these were the terms of payment subsequently agreed upon is evidenced, not by the letter of credit, but by the fact of the issuance of the letter of credit. The letter of credit was not, therefore, a part of the contract between the parties, but is only evidence of the fact that they had reached an agreement as to the one term not definitely agreed upon in the original agreement. This oral agreement as to the manner and method of payment, together with the written instrument of January 27, 1920, constituted the contract as ultimately agreed upon between the seller and the buyer.

[2] The bank in issuing its letter of credit inserted therein, "To be shipped by Port Moody Steel Works, Ltd." Whatever may have been the purpose of the bank in inserting this phrase in the letter of credit, the letter of credit was not part of the contract between the buyer and the seller, but was an entirely separate and independent contract between the bank and the seller. American Steel Co. v. Irving National Bank (C. C. A.) 266 Fed. 41; Bank of Taiwan v. Gorgas-Pierle Mfg. Co. (C. C. A.) 273 Fed. 660; Frey v. Sherburne, 193 App. Div. 849, 184 N. Y. Supp. 661. And although the seller might have refused to accept a letter of credit in that form, the delivery and acceptance of the letter of credit did not constitute a modification of the contract between the seller and the buyer. In other words, the result of the dealings was that the seller remained obligated to furnish the steel contracted for from whatever source he could obtain it, and that the buyer remained obligated to pay for the steel upon delivery, since these were the obligations imposed by the contract between the seller and the buyer, as embodied in the written instrument of January 27, 1920, and the subsequent oral agreement as to the manner and method of payment. The seller, by reason of the insertion by the bank in the letter of credit of the phrase "To be shipped by Port Moody Steel Works, Ltd.," could not claim payment from the bank unless the steel was delivered f. o. b. cars at Port Moody. This circumstance, however, did not relieve him from his obligation under his contract to furnish the steel to the buyer. If a party desires to be free from his obligation to deliver a commodity in the event of nonproduction by a particular concern, it is incumbent upon him to make a clear provision to that effect in his contract. Law v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 112, 142 Pac. 52, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 842. Because of the absence of such a provision in the contract herein sued upon, we conclude that the defendant was not legally excused from performance of the terms of the contract by the failure of the Port Moody mills to open and operate.

[3, 4] It is further contended by the defendant that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the trial court as to the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff. The measure of the damage caused by a breach of an agreement to sell personal property, not paid for, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract if it had been fulfilled, and in estimating such damages the value of the property to the buyer is to be deemed the price for which he might have bought an equivalent thing in the market nearest to the place where the property ought to have been put in his possession. Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3354. The testimony of several witnesses for the plaintiff was that the market price of steel at Vancouver upon the final date for delivery was $4.60 per 100 pounds. But the defendant insists that this market price was arrived at by the witnesses by adding to the Pittsburgh market price the cost of transportation, and that the actual price at Vancouver was considerably less than this price. It is, of course, a well-settled economic principle that, in order to successfully compete with other manufacturers offering the same commodity, a manufacturer must quote prices as low as his competitor, otherwise he will not get the business. If, therefore, the market price at Vancouver was lower than the total of the price quoted by eastern manufacturers of steel, plus the cost of transportation to the coast, purchasers of steel at Vancouver would not purchase the steel from the eastern mills, and these mills would be forced to lower their price or leave the field. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff, who was the Pacific coast representative for twelve eastern mills, testified that these eastern mills were competing with mills on the coast, and that because of the competition the eastern mills were forced to quote the lowest price they could. He also testified that the prices quoted by the mills he represented were not interfered with by the offering of steel at a lower price than his mills were offering steel. It follows, therefore, that the price of $4.60 per 100 pounds, which was the price quoted by the eastern mills at Pittsburgh, plus the cost of transportation, must have been as low as the price of steel offered by local mills on the Vancouver market. This evidence was therefore sufficient to support the award of the trial court of $14,560 damages based upon the market price for steel of $4.60 per 100 pounds at Vancouver.

It may be well in passing to note that, inasmuch as the market price of steel at Vancouver was quoted by witnesses for plaintiff in terms of United States money, it is, of course, clear that the Canadian rate of exchange and the value of the Canadian dollar has no bearing on the question.

Defendant was not, in our opinion, prejudiced by the trial court's refusal to allow an amendment to defendant's answer during the course of the trial for the purpose of showing an agreement to extend time for performance. The court made findings upon the matters contained in the proposed amendment. These findings are supported by the evidence.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In Bank.

Application of Howard Harron for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Marin County. Writ discharged.

Eric J. Rosenstirn, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Henry E. Greer, Dist. Atty., of San Rafael, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Upon the verified application of petitioner a writ of habeas corpus was ordered to issue to Hon. J. J. Keating, sheriff of the county of Marin, commanding him to produce petitioner before this court. According to the allegations of said application, petitioner was unlawfully imprisoned and restrained in the county jail of said county by respondent, the said sheriff, "under and by virtue of a pretended warrant of commitment issued on the 26th day of October, 1922, by Hon. Herbert de la Montanya, judge of the justice's court of the township of San Rafael, county of Marin, state of California"; that on or about August 12, 1922, before the justice of the said court, Josephine Leah Harron, wife of petitioner, swore to a complaint charging petitioner with the crime of misdemeanor, to wit, battery; that petitioner was taken into custody under a warrant of arrest and brought before the said court; that the said complaint purports to be filed on "August 12, 1912," and in the charging part it is alleged that on the 12th day of August (no year is stated) " * * * the said Howard Harron, on the said day, in said county did willfully and unlawfully use force and violence upon the person of complainant," that bail was first fixed by the said court in the sum of $1,000 but upon petitioner informing the said justice that the bail was excessive and that his home would, in consequence of his inability to furnish such bail, be broke up and he never could enter it again, the justice asked petitioner if he meant by his declaration that he would never again enter his home, to which petitioner replied in the affirmative, whereupon the justice put this question to him, "Will you put that in writing?" that petitioner said he would, and then prepared, signed, and swore to the following declaration: "I am leaving my home at 96 Minerva Ave., Fairfax, under promise to Judge De la Montanya that I will not enter it again under any circumstances. Aug. 12, 1922. Howard Harron;" that this declaration was filed with the complaint, and petitioner was released from custody upon his own recognizance; that the justice thereupon told petitioner he could go to his home accompanied by a deputy sheriff for the purpose of packing his belongings and then to leave immediately in conformity with his sworn promise; and that the justice then declared he was unable to withdraw the complaint already filed, but that the case was dismissed; that petitioner was free to go, and that the said justice then and there dismissed the case.

It is further alleged that another complaint was filed on September 5, 1922, charging the identical offense and that upon this complaint petitioner was tried, convicted, and sentenced to serve a term in the county jail.

Appended to the petition and made a part thereof are copies of the "pretended commitment" (Exhibit A), the complaint of August 12 (Exhibit B), the complaint of September 5 (Exhibit C), Docket B, containing "What purports to be a certified copy of the said Justice," referring to the proceedings of August 12 and September 5 (Exhibit D), and an abstract of the docket entry of September 5 from Docket B (Exhibit E). The only one of these papers which is certified is Exhibit D, and in this the date of the certification is not given. Exhibit D reads as follows:

"Docket B. * * * 1922. Aug. 12. Defendant duly arraigned, being, by the court, informed of all his legal rights, including the nature of the charge against him, his right to counsel at all stages of the proceedings, his right to a reasonable continuance, his right to the free services of an officer to summon witnesses on his behalf, and of his right to have a jury trial. Defendant answered that his true name is as above. Defendant released on his own recognizance. Sept. 5, in open court, and in the presence of the said defendant and his counsel, the district attorney made a motion to dismiss the complaint filed herein as above, on the ground that said complaint was defective. Motion granted by the court. H. De La Montanya, J. P.

"I hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true and correct copy of the proceedings in said case, as shown on page 202 of my Docket B in my office. H. De La Montanya, Justice of the Peace of San Rafael Township."

Referring to Docket B, the petition alleges that the first complaint was dismissed on August 12 as above alleged, denies the recital that it was dismissed on September 5, denies that the district attorney on that day or any other day made a motion to dismiss it for any reason, and alleges that the entry of the purported order of dismissal on September 5 was entered nunc pro tunc in the docket on October 28, two days after the commitment was issued. The petition then alleges the fact to be that the justice filed a certified copy of the abstract of Docket B in the superior court (the date of the filing is not alleged), which abstract contained a full recital of all the proceedings on September 5, and that it nowhere appears in the abstract that the first complaint was on September 5, or ever, or at all, dismissed, either on the motion of the district attorney, or otherwise, or at all, and that it affirmatively appears in the abstract, "as hereinabove alleged, that a second complaint charging the identical misdemeanor that had been heretofore dismissed by the said justice on August 12, 1922, as hereinabove alleged, was sworn to by the same complaining witness, and filed with the said justice." Then follow allegations as to two felony charges, purporting to grow out of petitioner's domestic difficulties which are not material to a decision herein. The petition then alleges that when petitioner appeared before the court on September 5 it was to submit to the preliminary examination on one of the charges of felony, but that, instead of such examination being held, the second complaint was filed; he was tried thereon and found guilty, whereupon a motion for a new trial and a motion in arrest of judgment were successively interposed and denied, and he was sentenced to serve 30 days in the county jail. Upon these alleged facts it is claimed by petitioner that the court dismissed the first complaint on August 12, and that the order of dismissal was not explicitly made for the purpose of amendment, within the meaning of section 1387 of the Penal Code.

Respondent filed an unverified return to the effect that he held petitioner by virtue of the said commitment, an uncertified copy of which was attached to the return, and that petitioner had been released upon the issuance of the writ. The return was accompanied by an affidavit of the justice purporting to traverse certain allegations of the petition, and to which was attached an uncertified copy of the first complaint, also an affidavit of the district attorney, denying certain allegations of the petition relating to the said felony charges, and to which affidavit was attached a partial transcript of the purported proceedings of September 5, made and certified to by the official stenographic reporter of the superior court. The docket entries were not made a part of the return. On the first hearing in this court the return was held insufficient, and respondent was granted permission to file an amended return. At the next hearing an amended, unverified return was filed, and it was stipulated that the petition might be regarded as a traverse thereto.

After oral argument the matter was ordered submitted on the filing of additional points and authorities.

The amended return is to the effect that on October 26 respondent took petitioner into custody under and by virtue of the commitment, and that he remained in such custody until November 8, when he was released on bail. The allegations which follow are that petitioner was charged in the first complaint on August 12; that he was arraigned thereon and released on his own recognizance; that on August 23, in open court, petitioner and his counsel being present, the district attorney was directed by the court to file the second complaint because of two defects in the first—that it purported to be filed on August 12, 1912, instead of 1922, and that the year was omitted in describing the offense; that the matter was then continued until September 5 when the second complaint was filed, petitioner arraigned thereon, and the case continued until September 8, on which date petitioner was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, found guilty as charged, and on his motion the case was continued until September 11, at which time motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were interposed on behalf of petitioner, and on his motion the matter was continued until September 15, on which day the said motions were argued, submitted, and denied, whereupon petitioner stating he was ready for judgment was sentenced to serve 30 days in the county jail. It is further alleged that an appeal to the superior court from the said judgment and that it was affirmed, and that the commitment was issued out of the said justices' court.

Attached to the amended return are uncertified copies of the first and second complaints, an affidavit of the justice averring that he had issued the first complaint; that certain proceedings occurred on August 23 as mentioned in the amended return; that the second complaint was filed on September 5, and that the order dismissing the first complaint "was explicitly made for the purpose of amending the same, as the court was and is of the opinion" that it did not state a cause of action. Also attached to the amended return was an affidavit of the district attorney, and a certified transcript of the proceedings of September 5, more extended than the part thereof attached to the original return of the official stenographic reporter. The affidavit of the district attorney avers that on August 23 the court informed him that he would have to file a new complaint; that on September 5 he filed the second complaint "pursuant to the order of said court, as he understood, directing him to do so, and was filed for the purpose of amending the defective one then on file."

Because of the issue of facts tendered by the pleadings and the form in which the record is presented, we have deemed it necessary thus to describe it somewhat in detail. Petitioner alleges that the first complaint was dismissed on August 12 in disregard of the provisions of section 1387, and the showing of respondent is that no action was taken looking to the dismissal of the first complaint until August 23, when the district attorney was directed to file a new complaint because of the indicated defects in the first one, and that the order of dismissal was not made until September 5, when the second complaint was filed. The showing of respondent does not include any docket entries whatever, and the return is not verified. It is apparently sought by respondent to establish the facts relied on by the affidavits of the justice and the district attorney and the reporter's transcript.

A docket is required to be kept by the justice as defined in section 93, in accordance with section 911 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

"Such entries in a justice's docket, or a transcript thereof, certified by the justice, * * * are prima facie evidence of the facts so stated." Id. 912.

An index must be kept. Id. 913. Section 1428 of the Penal Code provides:

"A docket must be kept by the justice of the peace or police justice, or by the clerk of the courts held by them, if there is one, in which must be entered each action and the proceedings of the court therein."

It was said in Garfield v. Douglass, 22 Ill. 100, 74 Am. Dec. 137, note:

"The record or entry of the justice is higher and more trustworthy than any parol evidence can be. If one record is opened to be questioned by parol evidence then another must be, and all security and confidence in the stability of records are gone."

See Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 295, 50 Pac. 534, 62 Am. St. Rep. 234.

The showing in the return is evidently not made for the purpose of explaining or supplementing the docket entries, but to take the place of them. It was suggested at the first hearing that this may not be done. On habeas corpus the burden is on the prisoner to show a lack of jurisdiction in the court upon whose process he is restrained, but defendants should be able to rely on the record of court proceedings as prescribed by law. The petition, we have pointed out, contains Docket B, and these are the only docket entries in the record. It is alleged in the petition that they are not correct, and it does not appear that any action was taken by petitioner to have them corrected. If the allegations of the verified petition are true, the entry of August 12 should have recited the order of dismissal. It does recite that petitioner was released on his own recognizance and this might indicate a halt in the proceedings. It would, however, also tend to negative a dismissal of the case as claimed by petitioner, although there is no recital of a continuance. The petition alleges that the closing sentence in the entry of September 5 did not appear in the abstract of the docket when it was filed in the superior court by the justice, but was added later, and this is nowhere denied in the return. Respondent does not claim the docket entries were omitted from the return because Docket B was made a part of the petition nor that the entries are, in fact, correct. A docket entry of the purported proceedings of August 23 is not made a part of the record. The return alleges that the case was continued from August 12 to September 5. Moreover, according to the reporter's transcript of September 5, the answer of the justice to petitioner's statement that he understood the battery charge had been disposed of "at the last hearing here," which exchange is quoted elsewhere, would indicate the order of dismissal had been previously made, and this is at variance with other parts of the return. Nor is the allegation of the petition that the first complaint was dismissed on August 12 specifically denied in the return. In this state of the record we are not prepared to hold, whatever the actual fact may be, that when the first complaint was dismissed the order was explicitly made for the purpose of amending it. We are satisfied, however, that in view of the record, especially the docket entry of August 12, it was the complaint, and not the action, that was dismissed.

[1] Petitioner's contention is that under section 13, art. 1 of the Constitution, section 1387 of the Penal Code, and the federal guaranties, he is entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus. This is based on the reasoning that, it having been held a statutory bar arises and jurisdiction lapses, entitling a defendant to discharge on habeas corpus when an order sustaining a demurrer to an indictment or information is made without directing a resubmission (Pen. Code, § 1008; Ex parte Williams, 116 Cal. 512, 48 Pac. 499; Matter of Hughes, 160 Cal. 398, 117 Pac. 437; Ex parte Hayter, 16 Cal. App. 211, 116 Pac. 370); so here, by analogy, a bar arose under section 1387, and there could be no further prosecution of the offense when the first complaint was dismissed in disregard of the provisions of that section, and petitioner would be entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus. It is stated by petitioner that it was in order to bring his case within the authority of those relied upon that he deferred seeking release on habeas corpus until the judgment became final and he was taken into custody to serve the sentence.

The analogy relied upon by petitioner is lacking in one essential element—in the cases cited there had been no trial of the general issue, while here issue was joined on the second complaint, petitioner was tried, found guilty, interposed motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, was sentenced to serve a term of imprisonment, took an appeal, judgment was affirmed, and submitted himself in execution of the judgment in order to have the questions now presented determined upon a writ of habeas corpus.

[2] After conviction and appeal the writ of habeas corpus cannot be used as a writ of error to review the proceedings in a justice's court. 29 C. J. § 36; Ex parte Collins, 151 Cal. 340, 90 Pac. 827, 91 Pac. 397, 129 Am. St. Rep. 122. It was said in the Collins Case, at page 350 of 151 Cal., at page 831 of 90 Pac. (129 Am. St. Rep. 122):

"It is further contended by petitioner that the perjury with which he was charged in the second indictment consisted in swearing to some of the same matters which formed the basis of the charge of perjury in the first indictment. From this it is argued that a verdict of acquittal on the first charge would be conclusive in favor of the defendant on any subsequent trial. United States v. Butler, 38 Fed. 498; Coffey v. United States, 116 U. S. 436, 6 Sup. Ct. 432; Cooper v. Commonwealth, 106 Ky. 909, 90 Am. St. Rep. 275, 51 S. W. 789. Similarly, it is claimed, a verdict of conviction on the first charge would preclude a conviction on the other. We need not decide whether the principle invoked has any application to the facts here presented. In any event, such acquittal or conviction in one trial is matter of defense to be relied on in the other. It does not go to the jurisdiction, and affords no ground for release on habeas corpus." (Italics ours.)

The rule is different where habeas corpus is sought upon the claim that the prisoner has been placed in jeopardy for the identical offense within the meaning of the state and federal constitutions, for this goes to the jurisdiction of the trial court to entertain the second prosecution. Ex parte Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 33 L. Ed. 118; Bens v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 266 Fed. 152; People v. Warden of City Prison, 202 N. Y. 138, 95 N. E. 729; In re Neagle, 135 U. S. 1, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 34 L. Ed. 55.

Petitioner's contention is that under the constitutional guarantees and section 1387, already mentioned, the justice's court was without jurisdiction to entertain a second prosecution for the same offense, because it failed to make an order of resubmission when dismissing the first complaint. Respondent denies the applicability of the bar in section 1387 to cases in inferior courts, and contends that petitioner failed to interpose a special plea on the trial under the second complaint, and that, therefore, the point was waived. Petitioner insists, however, that in legal effect he pleaded specially as matter of defense at the trial.

[3, 4] To constitute once in jeopardy the party must be placed on trial for a prescribed public offense, on a valid indictment, before a competent court, with a competent jury, duly impaneled and sworn and charged with the case (People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467, 479; People v. Hill, 146 Cal. 145, 79 Pac. 845), or, if the trial is by the court, it must be entered upon (Haase v. State, 8 Ind. App. 488, 36 N. E. 54; People v. Goldfarb, 152 App. Div. 870, 138 N. Y. Supp. 62; Id., 213 N. Y. 664, 107 N. E. 1083; Brown v. State, 105 Ala. 117, 16 South. 929). Section 687 of the Penal Code provides as follows:

"No person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been * * * convicted or acquitted."

The plea of once in jeopardy or a statutory bar applies to misdemeanors as well as felonies. U. S. v. Block (D. C.) 262 Fed. 205; Berkowitz v. U. S., 93 Fed. 452, 35 C. C. A. 379; City of St. Paul v. Stamm, 106 Minn. 81, 118 N. W. 154; Brink v. State, 18 Tex. App. 344, 51 Am. Rep. 317; Hazleton v. State, 13 Ala. App. 243, 68 South. 715; Noland v. People, 33 Colo. 322, 80 Pac. 887; People v. Miner, 144 Ill. 308, 33 N. E. 40, 19 L. R. A. 342; Village of Northville v. Westfall, 75 Mich. 603, 42 N. W. 1068; McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135.

Section 1429 of the Penal Code declares in part:

"The defendant may make the same plea as upon an indictment, as provided in section ten hundred and sixteen."

Section 1016 contemplates four pleas to an indictment or information:

"(1) Guilty. (2) Not guilty. (3) A former judgment of conviction or acquittal of the offense charged, which may be pleaded either with or without the plea of guilty or not guilty. (4) Once in jeopardy."

Section 1017 provides that every plea must be oral and entered upon the minutes of the court in the prescribed form. Section 1020 declares that—

"All matters of fact tending to establish a defense, other than one specified in the third and fourth subdivisions of section ten hundred and sixteen, may be given in evidence under the plea of not guilty."

[5] It has been held that the statutory procedure as to the interposition of a plea in bar must be followed in respect to once in jeopardy and any statutory bar, and that the plea is waived if not demanded, even if both trials are before the same court. People v. Bennett, 114 Cal. 56, 45 Pac. 1013; People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 481, 71 Pac. 568, 72 Pac. 48, 61 L. R. A. 245; People v. Hawkins, 127 Cal. 372, 59 Pac. 697; Rebstock v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 308, 315, 80 Pac. 65; People v. O'Leary, 77 Cal. 30, 18 Pac. 856, reversing People v. O'Leary, 2 Cal. Unrep. 843, 16 Pac.

884. A contrary view was expressed in the Bennett Case when it was before the United States District Court on a writ of habeas corpus (In re Bennett [D. C.] 84 Fed. 324), but the decision was put on the ground that habeas corpus was not the proper remedy. It was said in Huntington v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 288, 292, 90 Pac. 141, that the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Beatty in People v. Bennett, supra, became the law on this question in People v. Smith, 134 Cal. 454, 66 Pac. 669 (a charge of murder and conviction of manslaughter), but as pointed out in People v. Solani, 6 Cal. App. 103, 91 Pac. 654, nothing in the Smith Case is in conflict with the earlier cases. In the Smith Case it was held the defendant was only entitled to 10 peremptory challenges. It appears from the decision that the court announced at the commencement of the retrial that the defendant was only to be tried for manslaughter. On appeal no allusion was made to special pleas, and neither People v. Bennett, supra, nor People v. McFarlane, supra, was cited. It must be regarded as the law of this state that the constitutional and statutory pleas must be entered specially, and if this is not done they are waived. This is the general rule. L. R. A., 1917A, 1233, note, citing many authorities, including People v. Bennett, supra, and People v. Strickler, 167 Cal. 627, 140 Pac. 270.

Petitioner relies on the following portion of the reporter's transcript of September 5 to prove that he specially pleaded the dismissal of the first complaint as a bar:

"The Court (to the District Attorney): I think you had better file a new complaint. There is an error in the date, 1912 instead of 1922. (New complaint prepared by Mr. Greer.)

"The Court: Mr. Harron, here is a new complaint. (Reads complaint filed September 5, 1922.)

"Mr. Greer: Are you willing to proceed on that battery charge?

"Mr. Manning: Mr. Harron tells me he has some witnesses on the battery charge.

"Mr. Harron: I want to say this: I understood from his honor, the judge, at the last hearing here that this battery charge was disposed of.

"The Court: Simply dismissed because there was a defect in the date."

[6] It may be doubted whether this constituted the interposition of a special plea. But even if it did no finding was made thereon by the court. Whether the case is tried by jury or by the court the facts constituting the bar must be found. It has been held that, where a plea in bar was interposed in conjunction with a plea of not guilty and the jury failed to find upon the plea in bar, the defendant was entitled to a new trial. People v. Tucker, 115 Cal. 337, 339, 47 Pac. 111; see People v. Kinsey, 51 Cal. 278; People v. Fuqua, 61 Cal. 377; People v. O'Leary, 77 Cal. 30, 33, 18

Pac. 856; Id. (Cal. Sup.) 16 Pac. 884. It does not appear whether the failure to find on such plea was made a ground of motion for a new trial, nor does it appear that the question was considered on the appeal. If not, the point was waived.

According to the authorities already cited, the plea of once in jeopardy contemplates that the trial asserted as a bar must at least have been entered upon. Here there was no trial under the first complaint.

In view of these conclusions it will not be necessary to consider respondent's contentions that section 1387 of the Penal Code does not apply to proceedings in the justices' courts; nor that the first complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and that therefore the dismissal thereof could not have been the basis of a plea in bar.

It follows that, since after final judgment habeas corpus cannot be used as a writ of error, and petitioner has not met the burden of showing he exhausted below the defense upon which he must rely, he is not entitled to relief.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

MOHN v. TINGLEY et al. (L. A. 6990.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1923.
As Amended Aug. 8, 1923. Rehearing Denied Aug. 8, 1923.)

1. Limitation of actions $\S$ 127(2)—Amendment setting up no new cause relates back.

If an original complaint fails to state a cause of action and a new or different cause is not set up by the amended complaint, but new matters are added therein merely to make the original cause complete, the amendment, though made after the expiration of the period of limitations, relates back to the time of the filing of the first complaint.

2. Limitation of actions $\S$ 127(5)—Complaint for alienation of affections held not to set up new cause of action and to relate back.

Where original and amended complaints were both based on plaintiff's alleged cause of action for alienation of her husband's affections the amendment merely curing the failure of the original complaint to allege that plaintiff's husband had left her stated no new cause of action and related back to the filing of the original complaint.

3. Limitation of actions $\S$ 55(4)—Cause for alienation of affections accrues when husband leaves wife.

A cause of action for alienation of husband's affections, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 49, accrues when the husband leaves the wife, and limitations run from that time only.

4. Process $\S$ 96(4)—Affidavit as to nonresidence held sufficient to authorize publication.

An affidavit for service of summons by publication averring that one of the defendants was a resident of New York and not a resident of California was sufficient basis for order of publication under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 412, and the effect of the averments were not diminished by recital that previous copy of summons mailed such defendant in New York had been returned by him from there to attorneys for other defendant.

5. Process $\S$ 98—Order for publication need not indicate that court had read verified complaint.

It was not necessary that order for publication of summons indicate that the court had read the verified complaint, the case not being controlled by Civil Practice Act, $\S$ 30, but by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 412, under which it is sufficient if the cause of action is shown by a verified complaint on file.

6. Process $\S$ 87—Service by publication held sufficient against nonresident husband of wife sued for alienation of affections.

Service by publication was sufficient against the nonresident husband and a wife being sued for alienation of affections of plaintiff's husband; no personal judgment being sought against him and the purpose of making him a party being to permit him to assist in the defense.

7. Process $\S$ 98—Default entered on publication held not to render subsequent publication nugatory.

That a default had been entered upon a publication of summons against a nonresident defendant did not render nugatory a subsequent publication, the default order having been vacated and new proceedings instituted for service.

8. Husband and wife $\S$ 325—Woman married in another state before one year after divorce held entitled to maintain suit for alienation of husband's affections.

A woman who obtained a divorce and was married in another state within the year, contrary to Civ. Code, $\S$ 61, but residing within the state, could maintain a suit for alienation of her husband's affections.

9. Judgment $\S$ 570(1)—Nonsuit not a bar to subsequent suit.

A judgment of nonsuit suffered for any cause is not a bar to a subsequent suit on the same cause of action.

10. Husband and wife $\S$ 326—Suit for alienation held not barred by wife's contract with husband and another for separate maintenance.

A wife's action for damages for alienation of her husband's affections was not barred by contract between her husband and his debtor and the wife, whereby the debtor agreed to pay to her an indebtedness owing to the husband as consideration for her dismissal of an action for separate maintenance.

11. Appeal and error ☞1003—Appellate court will not reverse verdict sustained by any evidence.

Appellate courts are not concerned with question of preponderance or substantial character of evidence, but only as to whether there is any evidence tending to support a verdict.

12. Appeal and error ☞516—Counsel's argument printed in brief no part of record.

Although counsel for respondent printed his argument at trial as part of his brief, it is no part of the record and will not be considered on appeal.

13. Appeal and error ☞207—Request for instruction to disregard argument necessary to review.

Defendant desiring to complain of argument of plaintiff's counsel should request instruction to the jury to disregard the objectionable parts.

14. Husband and wife ☞333(5, 6)—Evidence of husband's donations to defendant's religious society and of defendant's interference in household affairs held admissible in suit for alienation of affections.

In a wife's suit for alienation of her husband's affections by defendant, who was the head of a sect or society having a homestead or location to which the husband and wife had removed at defendant's request, evidence as to donations made by the husband to such society, and of assistance of the defendant in the conduct of plaintiff's household affairs, was competent.

15. Husband and wife ☞333(5) — Evidence held not too remote in suit for alienation of husband's affections.

In an action for alienation of plaintiff's husband's affections by the leader of a society or sect, to the homestead grounds of which the husband and wife had removed at defendant's request, evidence as to the conduct of the parties during years immediately previous to the disruption, such as the husband's changed attitude after visits to the homestead, and that before coming into possession of his property he was not permitted to live in the homestead grounds, held admissible, where it was alleged that defendant's influence extended over a long period of years.

16. Husband and wife ☞333(6) — Evidence that defendant and plaintiff's husband held private conversations held admissible.

In suit for alienation of husband's affections by defendant who was the head of a society or sect on whose homestead grounds the husband and wife were living at defendant's request evidence that the defendant and husband held private conversations at which plaintiff was not present, without stating what occurred on those occasions, was not objectionable.

17. Husband and wife ☞334(3)—Verdict for $100,000 for alienation of affections held not to show passion or prejudice.

A verdict for $100,000 for alienation of a husband's affections held not so excessive as to suggest at first blush that it was arrived at by passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by Irene M. Mohn against Katherine Tingley and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Morganstern and Iverson L. Harris, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Charles C. Crouch, Hugh A. Sanders, and Wright & McKee, all of San Diego, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, Mrs. Irene M. Mohn, to recover damages from Katherine Tingley, defendant, for the alienation of the affections of her husband, Dr. George F. Mohn. Defendant Philo B. Tingley, Katherine Tingley's husband, was joined as a necessary party by amendment to the complaint, and was served with summons by publication. He having failed to appear, judgment was taken against him by default, from which he has not appealed. The jury returned a verdict against Katherine Tingley and found specially that she knowingly and intentionally enticed plaintiff's husband away from her, and that the affections of plaintiff's husband were alienated from her. Plaintiff was granted compensatory damages in the sum of $75,000 and punitive damages in the sum of $25,000. From judgment rendered thereon, defendant takes this appeal. Her principal contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. Before considering that question, however, it is necessary to determine certain points which involve respondent's right to maintain the suit.

[1, 2] 1. It is contended by appellant that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. First, it is claimed that inasmuch as the asserted period of the statute of limitations ran between the filing of the original and the second amended complaint the latter cannot be held to relate back to the former, in which no cause of action was stated. It is settled in this jurisdiction that if an original complaint fails to state a cause of action and a new or different cause is not set up by the amended complaint, but new matters are added therein merely to make the original cause complete, the amendment, though made after the expiration of the period of limitations, relates back to the time of the filing of the first complaint. Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 128 Pac. 330. No new or different cause of action was set up in the second amended complaint in the case at bar. As in Oberkotter v. Woolman, 187 Cal. 500, 202 Pac. 669, the cause of action was at all times one based on slander, so here it was at all times one based on the alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's husband. Although the original complaint was defective in that it did not allege that Dr. Mohn actually left respondent, this is no more serious a defect than a failure to allege nonpayment of a promissory note, the addition of which allegation was held not to change the cause of action in Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Leffingwell, 11 Cal. App. 494, 105 Pac. 427.

2. The second claim is that in an action of this kind the statute begins to run, not from the time one spouse actually leaves the other, but from the time of the commission by the defendant of the act which ultimately causes the spouse to leave. Supporting this contention are cited Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88, and other cases of a similar nature which it is insisted are fairly analogous to the case at bar. In Hecht v. Slaney, supra, it was held that the statute runs in favor of one chargeable as the trustee of an implied trust, and that it is not necessary for him to have denied or repudiated the trust in order to set the statute in motion; that "in such a case the statute begins to run when the wrong complained of is done." These cases are not authority for appellant's contention. They hold in each instance that the statute runs from the time the particular wrongful act was committed; that is, from the time the cause of action accrued.

[3] In the action before us the wrong complained of consists of the "abduction" of the husband (Civ. Code, § 49), and his being actually taken away from the wife constitutes a part of the wrongful act. Humphrey v. Pope, 122 Cal. 253, 54 Pac. 847. Until that occurs, the statute of limitations cannot begin to run. This action was commenced within one year of the date respondent's husband is alleged to have left her and consequently within the period of the statute, whether the period of limitations is one year under section 340, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, or two years under section 339, subdivision 1, as contended by respondent.

3. Appellant's third contention is that, as she is a married woman, her husband was a necessary party to the action; that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the person of her husband, defendant Philo B. Tingley, and therefore could not lawfully proceed against her. Defendant Philo B. Tingley was served with summons by publication, and it is contended such service was invalid because the action is one in personam and because the affidavit and order upon which publication was made were for various reasons insufficient.

[4] The main point made is that the facts stated in the affidavit for the publication are insufficient to justify the order for publication. It is averred in the affidavit that Philo B. Tingley is a resident of the state of New York and not a resident of the state of California. This statement is a sufficient basis for an order of publication of summons. Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 Pac. 1007; section 412, C. C. P. The affiant also sets forth the basis of this direct statement by showing that the previous copy of the summons and complaint mailed to Philo B. Tingley at New York City had been returned by him from there to one of the attorneys for the defendant Katherine Tingley. There was nothing in this or other statements to diminish the effect of the direct averment in the affidavit that the defendant resided in the city of New York, outside of the state of California.

[5] It is claimed that the order for the publication of summons is insufficient because it fails to indicate that the court had read the verified complaint, and appellant cites in support of that claim the case of Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342, 355. That case, however, was based upon section 30 of the Civil Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 55) which required the affidavit to state facts from which it appears that a cause of action exists against the defendant. What was said in the case of Forbes v. Hyde, supra, with relation to the affidavits upon which the order for publication was based in that case was for the purpose of showing that the complaint in that case was not treated as an affidavit within the meaning of the Practice Act even though it might have been verified. The decision in Forbes v. Hyde, supra, has no application to the case at bar, which is controlled by section 412, C. C. P., under the terms of which it is sufficient if a cause of action is shown by a verified complaint on file. It fully appears by the verified complaint on file herein, referred to in the affidavit for publication, that a cause of action existed in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants. It follows that the order for the publication of summons was properly made, and that by the publication thereof service was made upon Philo B. Tingley in the manner required by our statutes.

[6] The appellant suggests that the substituted service in this action was insufficient, citing Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565; First National Bank v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 487, 77 Pac. 1043, 103 Am. St. Rep. 95; and De La Montanya v. De La Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 Pac. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165. It is true that the trial court would have no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against Philo B. Tingley in the action. The purpose of making him a party was in order that he might assist his wife in making her defense. He was made a defendant and served in the manner provided by our law, and the question of extra-territorial jurisdiction is not involved in the case. The only party bound by the judgment was present in court in California and made her defense.

[7] It is also claimed that, as Philo B. Tingley's default had been entered upon the previous publication, he was thus put out of court and the subsequent publication was void. The default order had been vacated, and entirely new proceedings were instituted for service upon the defendant Philo B. Tingley. This defendant had the right to appear within the time limited in the summons, notwithstanding the previous entry and vacation of default based upon a previous service of summons upon him.

[8] 4. It is contended on behalf of appellant that respondent cannot be heard in the courts of this state to assert a claim growing out of her marriage to Dr. Mohn, for the reason that their marriage was consummated in contravention of the laws of this state. The facts are these: Respondent was first married to William Farley Neill at St. Paul, Minn., in 1890. She brought an action against him for divorce in this state, and in October, 1900, she obtained a decree and the custody of their only child, Isabel Neill. On November 28, 1900, respondent was married to Dr. Mohn at Yuma, Ariz. Both parties were domiciled in Los Angeles at the time, and they went to Yuma solely for the purpose of being joined in wedlock. At that time there was no provision for an interlocutory decree of divorce; section 61 of the Civil Code provided only that a subsequent marriage contracted by a divorced person during the life of the former spouse should be illegal and void unless the decree of divorce was rendered at least one year prior to such subsequent marriage.

This contention is groundless for it is well settled that section 61, Civil Code, did not operate upon or affect a decree of divorce; that it was simply a prohibition upon persons after they were divorced, and, inasmuch as such prohibition could have no extraterritorial effect, a marriage performed outside of the state in defiance of its terms was valid and binding and would be recognized in this jurisdiction. Estate of Wood, 137 Cal. 129, 69 Pac. 900; Buelna v. Ryan, 139 Cal. 630, 73 Pac. 466; Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73; Grannis v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 245, 79 Pac. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107; Estate of Elliott, 165 Cal. 339, 132 Pac. 439. Appellant relies on Wood v. Estate of Wood, 137 Cal. 148, 69 Pac. 981, wherein a widow who had married the decedent within one year of her divorce sought to enforce against her deceased husband's estate an antenuptial contract settling property rights. Plaintiff based her right to compel performance of the contract upon the proposition that she had executed it by marrying the decedent, but it was held that the consideration for the contract rested in a violation of the law of California, and that the court would not lend itself to the enforcement of such an agreement. However, that case dealt only with the contract for a property settlement, and the court expressly stated that the marriage itself was valid. Such a marriage being recognized in this state, it is entitled as well as any other to the benefit of all the safeguards which the law has established for the protection of the relationship, including the one invoked herein.

[9] 5. It is insisted the trial court erred in striking from appellant's answer, upon respondent's motion, that portion in which she set up a former adjudication of the action as an affirmative defense. A prior action had been instituted between the same parties upon the same cause of action, in which respondent was nonsuited upon the grounds that the evidence was not sufficient to prove the cause of action, and that it showed she was not the wife of Dr. Mohn, and that if she was his wife she was entitled to no relief from the courts of this state, because the marriage was in evasion of its law. Appellant claims that, so far as the motion for a nonsuit was granted with respect to the marriage, the judgment of the lower court became final when the time to appeal therefrom expired and became available to appellant as a defense in this case. This contention is without merit, for it is thoroughly settled that a nonsuit suffered for any cause is not a bar to a subsequent suit on the same cause of action. Gates v. McLean, 2 Cal. Unrep. 636, 9 Pac. 938; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542; Fleming v. Hawley, 65 Cal. 492; City and County v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 Pac. 281.

[10] 6. The next contention of appellant is that respondent's right to recover is barred by a contract between Dr. Mohn and a certain "School of Antiquity," as parties of the first part, and respondent, as party of the second part, dated December 21, 1918, wherein it was provided in effect that an indebtedness of $131.58 per month owed by the "School of Antiquity" to Dr. Mohn should thereafter be paid to respondent, in consideration of which respondent agreed to dismiss a pending action for separate maintenance she had brought against Dr. Mohn, and whereby she in effect waived all claim to Dr. Mohn's property and to support and maintenance. Appellant claims that this contract amounted to a surrender of all the rights to which respondent was entitled as a wife and that she could not compel any one to pay damages for an injury to a right which she had renounced. It requires but a statement of the agreement to demonstrate that it does not in any way affect the cause of action here sued upon. The contract was simply a provision to insure respondent her support and maintenance in return for which she relinquished certain rights in his property. It in no way affected her right to Dr. Mohn's affection, comfort, society, and protection, and did not release appellant from liability for depriving her of them.

[11] 7. The next point presented is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and to justify the court in denying appellant's motions for a nonsuit and a directed verdict. We may remark at the outset that the record is voluminous; that upon the trial counsel for the respective parties brought out in detail countless events which might bear upon the relationship between appellant, respondent, and Dr. Mohn, and that upon appeal they have argued the question of the sufficiency of the evidence minutely and at great length. This has been done notwithstanding it is not the province of appellate courts to weigh the evidence or determine the credibility of witnesses, but simply to decide whether there is evidence sufficient, as a matter of law, to support the verdict.

"It is only when the question is presented to this court as one of law under the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict or finding that this court will examine the evidence to this sole end, and when it is satisfied that substantial evidence exists to support the verdict or finding, its examination ceases at once." Estate of Moore, 162 Cal. 324, 122 Pac. 844.

Appellate courts are—

"not concerned * * * with the question of the preponderance of the evidence or as to the substantial character of the showing made by the defendants, but the single inquiry is, Does the record contain any evidence tending to support said findings?" Davies v. Angelo, 8 Cal. App. 305, 96 Pac. 909.

See, also, Larco v. Roeding, 1 Cal. Unrep. 438.

This well-established rule is stated because appellant repeatedly directs attention to such testimony; for instance, as that of witnesses whose statements under the rule of conflict we must assume were accepted by the jury.

According to the evidence, appellant was the "Leader and Official Head" of the International Theosophical Society. As already stated, respondent and Dr. Mohn were married on November 28, 1900. They had both been interested in theosophy for some time, but shortly before their marriage Dr. Mohn was expelled from the Los Angeles lodge. When that happened, Mrs. Mohn, then Mrs. Neill, withdrew from the organization, and there followed a period during which they dropped the study entirely. About that time appellant sent for respondent through a Dr. Beach, asking her to come to Point Loma, the headquarters of the society, and to bring her little girl with her. In their interview appellant asked respondent about Dr. Mohn's finances, how much money he had, and how much property he was likely to inherit. Appellant told her that she disapproved of the marriage, that Dr. Mohn would not marry her anyway "because he is not truthful," and further that Dr. Mohn had children that were not legitimate. Appellant argued with respondent and tried to prevent her from leaving, stating that if she remained her daughter would have unusual advantages in appellant's educational institution. Despite these representations, respondent left. Just prior to that time Dr. Mohn had been to Point Loma and upon his return he avoided respondent. Later he told her the conversations he had with appellant were responsible for his ignoring her the way he did. But notwithstanding appellant's opposition respondent and Dr. Mohn were married. According to respondent this relationship was characterized by mutual admiration and love; they were congenial, had similar tastes, and their life together was happy.

Shortly after her marriage respondent was subpoenaed as a witness in a libel suit which appellant brought against the Los Angeles Times. Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 144 Cal. 205, 77 Pac. 918. Her deposition was taken in which she indicated that conditions were not of the best of Point Loma. Dr. Mohn was absent at the time the deposition was taken. Upon his return he stated to respondent that he considered the incident unfortunate, but did not accuse her of falsifying. They had no trouble over the deposition, and it was not discussed again by them until 1906.

In the latter part of 1905 Dr. Mohn, unknown to respondent, made two or three trips to Point Loma at appellant's invitation. In December of that year he made a trip to Lower California and stopped off at Point Loma for the holidays, following which respondent noticed a change in his conduct toward her. He urged a change of attitude on her part toward theosophy; he said he must go to Point Loma to live; and expressed the view that they should save money in order to go there. He declared that he could not leave without her, but that with her attitude toward the work she could not go. He was unhappy and morose and talked to respondent about the matter all the time, urging her to do something so that they could go. He began to criticize Isabel Neill, although previously he had spoken of her as "about perfect."

Respondent finally wrote appellant a letter which Dr. Mohn suggested, saying she desired to do something to straighten the matter out. The negotiations which followed culminated in appellant directing respondent to go to the office of her former attorney and make a statement retracting the testimony she had given in her deposition. Respondent's letters were written in a tone of complete submission to the wishes of appellant and with an apparent anxiety to do all she could to adjust the matter, but appellant's letters indicated an unyielding attitude on her part. Respondent told Dr. Mohn she could not retract absolutely all the statements in her deposition, but he said the only way to make it acceptable to appellant was to cover everything in a general way.

Respondent signed a statement in which she stated, in substance, that when she gave her deposition she might have drawn wrong conclusions from the facts as she saw them, and that she was then in sympathy with the Theosophical Society. Further correspondence ensued; the Mohns made a trip to Point Loma and later moved to the "Tent Village," a place conducted by the society, but which was outside the homestead proper. Dr. Mohn expressed himself as feeling more kindly toward respondent after these endeavors in his behalf. He was reinstated in the society, and they lived very happily in their home outside the grounds until 1911.

In that year Dr. Mohn received about $300,000 from his mother's estate. Before then the Mohns were prevented from living inside the homestead grounds; appellant had told them it was not advisable. In that year, after he received the money, appellant opened the way and at her request the Mohns moved into the homestead, occupying a place called "North House." When they were partially settled appellant asked if she could at times entertain her friends there to have them in a homelike atmosphere. Respondent willingly acceded to the request, and appellant exercised the privilege. Upon one occasion she informed respondent that two married couples would be there. They arrived and stayed almost four months. At another time appellant came to "North House" with several people and informed respondent she would have to leave, as they wished to hold a private conference and did not want her there. Respondent immediately left and was kept out from 1 o'clock in the afternoon until 7 in the evening.

Appellant exercised an extensive control over the Mohn household. When Dr. Mohn's sister came to visit them, she told respondent to have her sleep on a window seat so she would not stay very long, knowing they had no place for her. The Mohns having put up some draperies while she was away, upon her return she said they were not suitable, and over respondent's protest Dr. Mohn insisted they be changed because "when she makes a request we have to carry it out." There was a similar occurrence with reference to the rugs. Dr. Mohn felt himself unable to keep an appointment with respondent in San Diego, because appellant would not give him permission to leave; and for the same reason he refused to go to see a sick grandniece, and at another time a sick sister. Dr. Mohn and respondent in 1911 had agreed that they would go separately to appellant with their troubles.

Before 1911 all the parties got along agreeably with Isabel Neill, who attended the "Raja Yoga" school at the homestead. It may be said with reference to Mrs. Mohn that the evidence would justify an inference that she felt a true mother's affection for her daughter, and that everything she did was in an effort to insure her welfare and happiness. Appellant insisted that Isabel resume the name of Neill, saying it would be better, for there could be no trouble over Dr. Mohn's estate with his relations if she did that. In 1911 appellant wrote a letter to respondent in which she referred to inherited "irritated conditions" and "seeds of disease" in Isabel's system. She referred to this matter again on other occasions, notably when she told Dr. Mohn of it and said the disease was syphilis. Mrs. Mohn had a blood test of Isabel taken, which showed her to be absolutely free from this disease. Appellant told respondent that for her own protection she must keep Isabel and Dr. Mohn apart, as Isabel was growing up, and that respondent should write a letter to Dr. Mohn for Isabel to sign to the effect that she wished Dr. Mohn would not show so much affection for her. Appellant refused to let Isabel come to the Mohn's when respondent was sick, saying it was a scheme for her to be near Dr. Mohn; she also refused for the same reason to let Dr. Mohn go to San Francisco at one time when Isabel was sick there, and intercepted a letter Isabel wrote to Dr. Mohn asking him to buy respondent a watch for her birthday. Appellant at one time said that Isabel was unbalanced. When Isabel was about eighteen years old appellant broke up a love affair between her and a young man, because she said if they were married they would not be of use in her work. One day appellant informed respondent Isabel was going away, which was the first respondent or Dr. Mohn knew of it. Dr. Mohn as well as respondent felt badly, but nothing was done, and Isabel went to Chicago to train for nursing. While she was there, appellant told respondent Isabel was probably deceiving her and to have her watched by detectives, insisting that she was not conducting herself properly. The report showed Isabel was living with two other girls in a rooming house approved by the Y. W. C. A., and that her conduct was above reproach. Although she did have some trouble which caused her to leave the hospital, it turned out not to be anything which would injure her name. Appellant wrote letters for respondent to send to Isabel, which respondent did not send because "they did not express her sentiments."

Isabel had been ill in Chicago, and appellant told respondent in 1916 to make arrangements to have her come west. She went to San Francisco, where respondent met her and tried to arrange for her to take a business course. While in San Francisco respondent received a communication from Dr. Mohn which indicated to her that, although appellant had a great deal to do with the plan for her to go to San Francisco, Dr. Mohn was upset about it now that she was away. It became necessary for Isabel to have an operation after respondent returned to Point Loma. The expense of this, together with the way Isabel and respondent handled it, dissatisfied Dr. Mohn. It also appears that appellant was somewhat provoked because of the treatment accorded the homestead doctor in the matter. He and appellant also appear to have felt some animosity toward the doctor who performed the operation. In August, 1917, Dr. Mohn signed a letter to Isabel in which he stated he did not approve of her conduct; that she was being entertained too much, and offered her an opportunity to come to Los Angeles, go to a mountain resort and rest up, after which he would help her get a position. He said if she did not do this he could not promise to support her in the future. Appellant's secretary said that appellant dictated this letter, saying that she was doing it at Dr. Mohn's request. Isabel declined to return to Point Loma. Subsequently appellant tried to get respondent to have a detective shadow Isabel in San Francisco, which respondent refused to do. Respondent stated that she did not get disquieting reports about Isabel other than from Dr. Mohn and appellant.

Dr. Mohn contributed most of his $300,000 to the various branches of the Theosophical Society, reserving an annual income of $4,000 for life. This income he subsequently consented to have reduced. Respondent received an allowance of $30 a month, part of which she apparently sent to Isabel. Dr. Mohn's mother had made a proposition to respondent before 1906 that if the latter would not go to Point Loma, but would stay in Los Angeles, she would leave her all her property. This offer respondent declined in order to go with Dr. Mohn. Respondent said she did not know the exact extent of his contributions to the society; that while she did not oppose them she did not encourage him to make them. Dr. Mohn became worried over finances, because, though he had put in his requisition, he had not been given his money by the manager of the homestead. He accused respondent of running up bills and of being extravagant when he had not yet secured his money to pay his taxes. Respondent went to appellant, told her of this, and also that she would like to go to San Francisco. Appellant agreed to arrange this with Dr. Mohn saying, "He is very easy to manage; I know just how to do it;" and saying she would get Dr. Mohn to give her an allowance to meet her small bills. From his subsequent treatment of her respondent learned that appellant had given Dr. Mohn opposite instructions. Two days after the conference between respondent and appellant, appellant wrote respondent a letter, ostensibly about the matter under consideration, but containing many statements of events which had never happened, and referring to respondent's feeling that she was unjustly treated by her husband. Respondent testified she had not said anything about such a matter to appellant, and that this letter opened her eyes to the fact that appellant was not treating her fairly. Appellant apparently did not settle the matter of respondent's trip to San Francisco, for Dr. Mohn said nothing about it, and when in January, 1917, respondent mentioned it to him he accused her of not co-operating with him financially, and said all she wanted of him was money for herself and Isabel. During 1916 respondent received from Dr. Mohn $254, $142.25 of which was spent in going to San Francisco when Isabel was sick in the month of May; of the balance, $58.38 was spent on herself.

By this time disagreements were arising in the Mohn household and between respondent and appellant. In the latter affairs Dr. Mohn was solicitous lest respondent offend appellant. One incident may be mentioned: The doctor who operated on Isabel in 1916 sent a bill for $400. Dr. Mohn said it was exorbitant and refused to pay it. Respondent wrote to the doctor explaining this, and saying that what Mr. Mohn wrote would be dictated by "the one who tries to control every one's affairs here and is averse to seeing any money go out," and by the homestead physician. Dr. Mohn compelled respondent to show this to appellant. The latter declared that this was the worst thing that had happened to her; that respondent was entering a wedge in her family; she told Dr. Mohn she had anonymous letters telling how respondent angled to get him before they were married; that respondent was an unreliable person; that she had perjured herself at a trial in the past; that she was untruthful; and that he could not believe what she said. Respondent became frightened. The Mohn troubles became a chief subject of conversation at the homestead. Appellant sent a message to one woman by her secretary to the effect that respondent was out of tune, and that it would not be well to be too friendly with her. When respondent refused to send a letter suggested by appellant to Isabel, Dr. Mohn became angry; said that he proposed to get into the work deeper than ever; that appellant was the best friend they had; that he did not propose to listen to any one slander her. He also told respondent she was mighty common truck compared to appellant.

Mrs. Davidson, appellant's secretary, testified she had heard appellant discuss respondent's character with Dr. Mohn; that appellant sent her to one of the students to tell her that respondent was out of tune with conditions and not to be too intimate with her; that on occasions when Dr. Mohn was present appellant discussed the inharmony in the Mohn family, and that in the way she told the story she left the impression that Mrs. Mohn was to blame for it and Dr. Mohn to be excused for his mistakes.

The financial situation continued to bother Dr. Mohn, and he told respondent that if she had $10,000 she probably would have left long ago. During three months in 1917 she received from him $90.35. Respondent stated that all the discord was caused by stories Dr. Mohn heard elsewhere and brought home. She stated that she was at Point Loma because he was there, and that statements he heard about her wishing to go elsewhere and live with Isabel were false.

On September 21, 1917, respondent wrote a letter which she read to Dr. Mohn in order that her statements could not be misquoted later, which frankly expressed her sentiments on the subject of their domestic affairs. The tenor of the letter was one of submission and regret. She expressed a kindly feeling toward and sympathy for Dr. Mohn, a deep humiliation at having their private affairs dominated by appellant, and stated that she had no grievance against Dr. Mohn; that any misunderstanding was due to the meddlesome interference of appellant. She further suggested to Dr. Mohn that she was not being treated fairly, and that for the sake of their future domestic harmony and mutual understanding it would perhaps be well for her to go away for a short time. On October 11, 1917, Dr. Mohn suggested that each get an attorney and that they should settle the matter, but he refused to go away from the homestead to conclude the arrangements.

The next day respondent consulted an attorney, and on October 13th she received a letter signed by Dr. Mohn in which he dwelt upon the many kindnesses he had shown respondent and Isabel and the money he had given them, and rebuked her for saying unkind things about appellant and for circulating false statements in her own defense. The burden of the letter was that respondent was trying to threaten him until he did for her and Isabel the things she wanted done. He offered to let her go and live with Isabel and proposed to give them money enough to live comfortably, not extravagantly; said that they might board, or hire an apartment with a kitchenette. Appellant's secretary said that this letter was dictated by appellant, who explained that she was writing it because Dr. Mohn was unable to express himself clearly. Respondent insisted that appellant wrote the letter, and it does appear that in the following January Dr. Mohn asked for a copy of it, saying that he had lost his and had forgotten what was in it; that she refused to give him a copy; and that when her deposition was taken some months later appellant's attorneys produced a copy of the letter.

Dr. Mohn told respondent that either he or she would have to leave. On February 3, 1918, he told her that he was going to get out. On the following day Dr. Mohn told respondent that he was going to Los Angeles for four or five days. When she begged him to let her accompany him he declared that it was only a matter of dollars and cents with her; that if she had money she probably would have left before; that he was going to get a copy of his letter of October 13th; that their troubles were going to be settled because he was going away. When she asked to go with him he refused to answer her; he put a few things in a grip and left, saying he would send her his address. Because of statements he had made she believed he was leaving for good.

On February 20th respondent caused all the furnishings of "North House" to be moved to a house in San Diego, where she established a home and fitted up a room for Dr. Mohn. She endeavored to communicate with him through his attorney, but was unsuccessful, and he thereafter refused to communicate directly or return to her. A provision for her maintenance was effected by the contract heretofore alluded to.

Respondent explained that her attitude toward the Theosophical Society and her conduct in becoming reinstated was due to a desire to make her husband happy and to be with him. She stated this accounted for her retracting her affidavit, which she said she did acting wholly upon the feeling that she might have been mistaken, which retraction she signed with misgivings and only upon the insistence of Dr. Mohn. She stated she tried to be in sympathy with the work; that many of its phases were agreeable to her; that she tried to do her best to make Dr. Mohn happy; that there were months when things went smoothly; that she was determined to try to get along with appellant, and to try to see things as Dr. Mohn did, up to a point where it was no longer possible. This feeling for a long time caused her to overlook things which were being done, which things she subsequently refused to endure.

A very important feature of the evidence consists of letters which passed between the various parties. Many of them refer to Dr. Mohn's donations. In some of them respondent expresses the warmest regard for the society and for appellant. In certain others she expresses different sentiments. Taken alone, respondent's letters might indicate that she had undergone a change of feeling after the suit against the Los Angeles Times; that she had entered willingly into the work; that her feeling of animosity toward appellant arose wholly after the trouble with her husband began. But viewed in the light of her explanations—that they were nearly all written at the dictation or instigation of Dr. Mohn, and that she wrote them to keep the peace—they well could have assumed a different aspect to the jury and have entirely borne out her story of the causes of her troubles. The letters which appellant wrote to respondent were full of advice and apparent good will, but they contained frequent references to respondent's having "perjured" herself in the Times trial, appellant's magnanimity in not having prosecuted her for it, statements regarding Isabel which well might have alarmed respondent, and references in a most aggrieved tone to things which respondent did which did not please appellant. Respondent insists the letters referred many times to events which had never happened; that they were written merely as records for appellant, and points out that on February 8, 1918, four days after Dr. Mohn left, appellant had four copies made of each of these letters referring to the Mohn affairs. Appellant insists that each of these letters shows that respondent lived happily for 10 years at Point Loma and then proceeded to disrupt her home. The letters, however, for a considerable period refer to some "trouble." Respondent contends this was caused by appellant and the society; appellant that it was caused by Isabel. The jury indicated by its verdict that it accepted respondent's version. It would be a hopeless task to attempt to answer seriatim the arguments appellant advances in this connection. Suffice it to say that respondent's testimony and explanation of these matters cannot be said to be inherently improbable nor irreconcilable with the rest of her story.

From the foregoing evidence we are of the opinion the jury was entirely justified in its verdict. It could have been reasonably deduced from the evidence that appellant was trying to bind Dr. Mohn to the society; that she wanted him to be interested in it; that she wished him to continue his donations; that she was hostile to respondent because the latter married Dr. Mohn and because of her testimony in the "Times" trial; that she deliberately set about to prejudice Dr. Mohn against Isabel, which, in view of respondent's devotion to her, would create discord in the Mohn family; that she interfered in the Mohn household until it caused friction; that she took Dr. Mohn's part in all their domestic differences and by her actions increased them; and that she disparaged respondent to Dr. Mohn in order to prejudice him against her. This is clearly sufficient to indicate to the jury appellant's connection with Dr. Mohn's leaving home.

We are also convinced that there was evidence that Dr. Mohn actually left respondent. The only evidence that he was not leaving for good on February 4, 1918, was his own declaration that he would be in Los Angeles for four or five days and would write respondent, and his later statement that he would be home about April 1. But opposed to this is respondent's testimony that from his conduct and other statements he gave her the impression that he was leaving for good; his own statement that he was going to "get out"; his previous statement that one or the other must leave; that he could not go on that way; the question put by him as to when "it would all end"; the several conversations they had had with reference to one or the other leaving; his suggestion that they hire lawyers to settle the matter; her suspicions that he was not telling the truth at the time he left, evidenced by his failure to write her, as he had said he would; the fact that he refused to communicate with her after she began her suit against appellant, and finally the circumstance that he did not come back to her, refused to do so, and went instead to the Point Loma homestead without making any effort to reunite the family. From all the circumstances we must assume the jury did not believe Dr. Mohn's testimony that he did not leave respondent.

Counsel for appellant have devoted a brief of considerable size to the subject of "Instances in which counsel for respondent have grossly misrepresented the record, drawn unreasonable and unwarrantable conclusions, and spoken with impropriety and indecency." Portions of respondent's brief on appeal are quoted as showing wherein the testimony has been misstated. Much of the testimony so referred to we have deemed it unnecessary to incorporate into this opinion at all. As to the remainder, assuming counsel for respondent has misstated it, in arriving at our conclusion we have been careful to distinguish between argument and the testimony contained in the record.

[12, 13] Portions of the argument delivered to the jury by respondent's counsel are objected to as being untrue, unreasonable, unsupported by the evidence, and indecent. Although counsel for respondent has printed his argument as part of his brief, it is no part of the record, and we have not considered it on this appeal. Moreover, if appellant felt her cause was prejudiced by this argument, the trial court should have been requested to instruct the jury to disregard the objectionable matter, and it does not appear this was done.

[14] Some 70 specifications of error are made to the rulings of the court on the admission of evidence. Manifestly, it is impracticable to discuss each objection separately. First, it is claimed that much of the testimony concerning the donations made by Dr. Mohn to the Theosophical Society in 1911, and that relating to the assistance of appellant in the conduct of the Mohn household affairs, was incompetent to prove an alienation of Dr. Mohn's affections, but did furnish a foundation for the creation of a prejudice against appellant. We are unable to agree with this contention. The evidence as a whole shows indisputably that appellant, as the head of the Theosophical Society, exercised an extensive control over the members, and that she was the dominating influence in the society. The theory of respondent is that appellant's interference in the Mohn domestic affairs was the result of her activity as the head of the society. In this situation, it being impossible to distinguish between appellant's official acts and those done in her private capacity, the evidence was properly admitted.

[15] The next class of testimony objected to is that showing the course of conduct of the parties during the years immediately previous to the disruption of the Mohn household, such as Dr Mohn's changed attitude after his visit to Point Loma in 1905, and the fact that before he came into possession of his property he was not permitted to live in the homestead grounds. Such matters are objected to on the ground that they are too remote in point of time. But as the influence of appellant, which is asserted to have caused Dr. Mohn to leave his wife, extended over a long period of years, and as one motive for animosity on her part toward respondent grew out of events happening long before he left, this evidence was clearly relevant.

It is asserted that much evidence, among it that indicating Dr. Mohn had shown little attention to his wife while making liberal donations to the society, was relevant "only to throw light upon the attitude of the witness' mind toward his wife and toward the defendant." Such an inquiry is permissible in actions of this kind. Adkins v. Brett, 184 Cal. 252, 193 Pac. 251. Much of the testimony concerning Dr. Mohn's financial affairs was relevant as bearing on this question, as was also respondent's testimony concerning the circumstances under which she wrote many of the letters received in evidence and many of the statements made by the various parties which otherwise would have been hearsay.

[16] Appellant objected to respondent's testimony that Dr. Mohn and appellant had private conversations at which respondent was not present. As respondent was testifying of her own knowledge merely as to the fact, and was not stating what occurred on those occasions, the evidence was not objectionable.

It is claimed the court erred in permitting evidence of the "alleged views entertained or statements made" by appellant concerning Isabel, because it was irrelevant. In view of what we have said on this subject concerning the sufficiency of the evidence, it clearly appears this was relevant.

The chief objection to all the evidence of which complaint is made is that it served to stir up the prejudice of the jury and arouse sympathy in respondent's favor. But, the evidence being admissible, its effect upon the jury would furnish no reason for its rejection.

[17] 8. Appellant earnestly urges that the verdict is based on passion and prejudice. Respondent objects to any consideration of this question for the reason that no motion for a new trial was interposed by appellant. In support of the contention that no such motion was necessary, it is urged that this court has jurisdiction to consider upon appeal from the judgment every question which might have been raised on a motion for a new trial; that since sections 956 and 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure were amended in 1915 (St. 1915, pp. 328, 209), and the remedy of appeal from an order denying a new trial abolished, an appellant would have no remedy, except in the trial court, if it were held necessary to interpose such a motion before raising on appeal a question which might have been considered on the hearing of the motion. Section 956 provides, in effect, that upon an appeal from a judgment the court may review the verdict or decision and any intermediate order which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, and from which an appeal could have been taken.

It is clear that the question of whether or not a verdict is arrived at because of passion or prejudice, in cases where the amount of the judgment is in the sound discretion of the jury, is primarily one for the trial court upon a motion for a new trial based upon that ground. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, vol. 1, p. 446; Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 106 Pac. 83. If a motion for a new trial upon this ground is denied by the trial court, we cannot reverse the judgment unless the amount thereof is "so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury." Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., supra. Whether or not we can review the evidence upon the subject of damages upon an appeal from the judgment without the interposition of the motion for a new trial, where the claim is that the verdict is excessive upon the authority of Smith v. Lightston, 182 Cal. 41, 186 Pac. 769, because such an attack upon the judgment is based fundamentally upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the judgment, is a point which we need not decide; for it is clear that upon such an appeal the appellant is in no more favorable position than she would have been if she had made the motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was excessive, indicating passion and prejudice, and such motion had been denied. Assuming that the rule controlling this court upon an appeal after denial of a motion for a new trial upon this ground is applicable upon an appeal from the judgment where no motion is made for a new trial, while the verdict in this case is very large, we cannot say under the evidence that it is so excessive as to suggest, "at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury" within the rule as heretofore announced. Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., supra. We would feel very much better satisfied with the matter, however, if the motion had been submitted to the trial judge, who had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and the parties and forming his own estimate as to the damage inflicted upon the plaintiff by the defendant.

9. Finally, appellant assigns error to the giving of certain instructions to the jury, and to the refusal to give certain others. We have examined these assignments carefully and find in the instructions no error which would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

ASSOCIATED OIL CO. v. INDUSTRIAL
ACC. COMMISSION et al.
(S. F. 10574.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1923.)

Master and servant — 375(1)—Injury to employee at employer's bunkhouse held not compensable as injury "arising out of employment."

Where an employee, living at employer's bunkhouse, was free to live in town about a mile and a half distant, an injury received, on Sunday afternoon, from falling off a defective porch where he had gone "to keep cool" was not one "arising out of the employment" within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

In Bank.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), by Charles C. Jones, opposed by the Associated Oil Company, employer. An order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Daniel W. Hone, of San Francisco, and William F. Kiessig, of Berkeley, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Petitioner in this proceeding seeks annulment of an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the applicant, Charles C. Jones, and against it as employer and carrier of its own insurance. The facts of the case are as follows: The applicant was employed as a machinist by the petitioner, Associated Oil Company, at its Camp C, near the town of Fellows. The company conducted a rooming house at the plant for its employees. The men were not required to stay there, and it was no part of the contract of employment that they should do so. Similar accommodations were available at the town of Fellows, a distance of about a mile and a half from the camp. The applicant worked six days a week, his hours being from 7 o'clock until noon, and from 1 to 4 in the afternoon. On the morning of Sunday, July 9, 1922, he worked a couple of hours overtime. That finished his task for the day. He was not required to return to his work until the next morning. A little after 5 o'clock in the afternoon, after supper time, with others, he repaired to the rooming house, but it was so hot that the men went out on the veranda "to keep cool." Jones placed a seat for himself on the edge of the porch. There were many cracks in the floor, and the leg of the chair went through one of them. There being no protecting railing, Jones was precipitated to the ground, a distance of from four to six feet. He sustained injuries to his right hip, on the basis of which, and on a finding that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, the Commission made the award.

Petitioner contends that the injury for which compensation was awarded did not arise out of or in the course of the applicant's employment, in that the latter "was engaged in pursuing a purely personal service, for his own convenience, pleasure, and benefit"; that he was performing no service for his employer, owed no duty to the latter at the time of his injury, and was not required to be upon his employer's premises at that time. The respondent Commission argues that the injuries were due to the unsafe condition of the "bunkhouse" premises provided by the employer, and, under the circumstances, are compensable. The question presented for decision, according to respondents, is "whether injuries occurring about the employer's bunkhouse situated on the employer's working premises, sustained by employees during their leisure hours while reasonably using the bunkhouse in a proper manner during intermissions from work, the injury being due to unsafe conditions of the premises provided by the employer, are within the protection of the Workmen's Compensation Act."

The general rule appears to be that, when the contract of employment contemplates that the employees shall sleep upon the premises of the employer, the employee, under such circumstances, is considered to be performing services growing out of and incidental to such employment during the time he is on the premises of the employer. 1 Schneider's Workmen's Compensation Law, p. 608, par. 279. The test is whether or not the workman is given a choice in the matter and is free as possible to come or go as he pleases. Philbin v. Hayes, 119 L. T. R. (Eng.) 133; note to 17 N. & C. C. A. 948. In some jurisdictions compensation has been awarded under situations somewhat similar to that here. A sort of legal fiction has been invoked to the effect that a servant, though "waiting," is still "serving." Those cases, however, have distinguishing features which serve to clearly differentiate them from the case here. In some instances, also, the statutes are different from ours.

It does not appear whether or not respondent Jones was living at the rooming house at the time he was injured. We think it may be correctly assumed that he was. The time was July. He testified there was "no other place to stay at, only the Associated Oil Company's place. It ain't a matter of choice. Unless you want to walk a matter of a mile and a half in the hot sun at 115 or 120, you got to stay there." It does appear that he was at the rooming house and fell from the porch on a Sunday afternoon at a time when not at work, and was neither required to work nor to be on the premises. He had a choice of going to the town of Fellows, but preferred quarters provided for his convenience by the employer, for the reason that he thus avoided walking one or one and a half miles in the hot sun. These facts do not present a case in which "the employer places the employee in such circumstances that his time is never his own, where he has no discretion as to where he shall sleep and where he shall eat; that the workman must be considered in the employ of the employer all of the time, or, at least, performing a service which is incidental to the employment he is engaged in," as was the case in Holt Lumber Co. v. Ind. Comm., 168 Wis. 381, 170 N. W. 366, so strongly relied on by respondent. The facts in that case show that the employees in the particular camp at which the injury occurred could not select their own sleeping quarters, but were compelled to sleep where the employer instructed them to sleep. It was part of the contract of employment that the employees should sleep on the premises in the bunk furnished by the lumber company.

Other cases relied on by respondent are as easily distinguished. The facts in In re Bollman, 73 Ind. App. 46, 126 N. E. 639, were that the employee was not employed for a definite number of hours of each day with no obligation to his employer for the remaining of the 24. By the terms of his agreement he was required to leave his own domicile and travel from farm to farm with a threshing outfit, to stay nights on the premises where the machine happened to be, and as watchman to guard and protect it from fire and trespassers. In Southern Surety Co. v. Stubbs (Tex. Civ. App.) 199 S. W. 343, the deceased was living upon a dredger and at all times under and subject to the orders of its captain. The storm which caused the loss of the dredger and the death of the employee "not only created an emergency which required the efforts of all employees to keep it afloat, but produced a situation which permitted of nothing else." In Taylor v. Saunders, 71 Colo. 160, 204 Pac. 608, the court held that the deceased, in remaining at the car barn after a late run, in order to take out a car at an early hour, did not assume "a position of peril merely for his own pleasure or convenience." The time for making the next run was so near at hand, the employee was acting within the scope of his employment by waiting at the car barn.

The foregoing cases serve to emphasize the conditions which must exist to entitle the employee to compensation under circumstances similar to the facts of the proceeding now under review. There is wanting in this case an essential element needed to confer jurisdiction on the Industrial Accident Commission. The injury did not arise out of the employment. Griffith v. Cole Bros., 183 Iowa, 415, 429, 165 N. W. 577, L. R. A. 1918F, 923. In that case the deceased, under regular and continuous employment by a bridge contractor, was, at the close of the day's work on the bridge and preparatory to retiring for the night, sitting in a tent specially furnished by the employer for the housing of his men, and situated near the bridge under construction. The tent was on the ground, saturated with water, and had no floor and was without lightning arresters. It was higher than surrounding objects, was adjacent to a wire fence and a pile of steel rods, and had a wire clothesline stretched inside and below the ridge pole. The tent was struck by lightning and the employee was killed. The court held that the deceased was in the course of his employment at the time of the injury, but reversed an award of the Industrial Commission upon the ground that the injury did not arise out of the employment. Subdivision 7 of section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Law of New York, (Consol. Laws, c. 67) limits compensation to "accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of employment." Construing this language, the court of that state said:

"The statute does not provide an insurance against every accident happening to the workman while he is engaged in the employment. The words 'arising out of and in the course of employment' are conjunctive, and relief can be had under the act only when the accident arose both 'out of' and 'in the course of' employment. The injury must be received (1) while the workman is doing the duty he is employed to perform, and also (2) as a natural incident of the work. It must be one of the risks connected with the employment, flowing therefrom as a natural consequence and directly connected with the work." Daly v. Bates & Roberts, 224 N. Y. 126, 127, 120 N. E. 118. The law in this state is the same. Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, 684, 685; 158 Pac. 212, L. R. A. 1916F, 1164; Ocean Acc. & Guarantee Co. v. I. A. C., 173 Cal. 313, 317, 159 Pac. 1041, L. R. A. 1917B, 336; Casualty Co. of America v. I. A. C., 176 Cal. 530, 533, 169 Pac. 76; California Casualty Ind. Exchange v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 257.

Of persuasive force, also, are two decisions of the respondent Industrial Accident Commission, the facts in which are analogous to those in the present proceeding, and in both of which compensation was denied. Webster v. C. B. Steddom, 3 Dec. of I. A. C. of Cal. 265; Mahoney v. Sterling Borax Co., 2 Dec. of I. A. C. of Cal. 700.

The award is annulled.

In re FRANCIS' ESTATE. (S. F. 10519.)

Wills ⚡132—Will in which part of date was printed not olographic, though envelope containing it bore date in testator's handwriting.

A will in which the first two figures of the year in which made were printed held not entitled to probate as an olographic will, though the envelope containing it bore on its face, in testator's handwriting, the figures "10/22/19"; the printed matter, though unnecessary to sufficiently date the will, having been made a part of it by testator along with the written matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Proceeding for the probate of the will of F. W. Francis, deceased. From an order denying probate, proponents appeal. Affirmed.

Arthur A. Chazel, of San Francisco (W. A. Breen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an appeal from an order denying probate to an olographic will. The order was based upon the fact that the first two figures of the date in the year "1919" were printed. If the date had contained the last two figures only it would have been sufficient (Estate of Lakemeyer, 135 Cal. 28, 66 Pac. 961, 87 Am. St. Rep. 96; Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 Pac. 130), but the printed figures were adopted by the testator as a part of his will, and, although the printed figures were unnecessary to sufficiently date the will, they were a part of the date, and the will was consequently not entirely dated in the handwriting of the testator. The rule announced in Estate of Thorn, 183 Cal. 512, 192 Pac. 19, is controlling. The envelope containing the will has a date on its face in the handwriting of the testator as follows: "10/22/19," and it is urged that this is a part of the will and a sufficient dating of the will. Assuming, without deciding, that the date on the envelope is a part of the will, the rule announced in Estate of Thorn, supra, nevertheless controls, for it was held in that case that, although all essential portions of the document were in the handwriting of the testator, and the printed matter constituted a mere repetition of what was already written in the handwriting of the decedent, the testator having made the printed matter as well as the written matter a part of the will, the will for that reason is not entirely in his handwriting. Hence the fact that the testator twice dated the will would not constitute an olographic will, where one date was not in the testator's handwriting.

Order affirmed.

MYERS, J. I concur solely because I must agree that this case is ruled by the decision in Estate of Thorn, and if a change is to be made in the rule as there announced it should be by legislative enactment.

SOMERS v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. (S. F. 10260.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1923.)

1. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⚡407—Common-law bond as assignee construed like contract in connection with assignment.

A common-law bond for performance of duties as assignee for benefit of creditors is to be construed in accordance with the rules governing interpretation of contracts, and must be read in connection with the contract of assignment referred to and the nature of the obligations secured.

2. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⚡407—Bond by assignee held contract of guaranty or suretyship on which assignors' lessor could have sued assignee, surety, or both, immediately on default in rent; "contract of guaranty or suretyship;" "indemnity contract."

A bond conditioned on faithful performance of the principal's duties as assignee for benefit of creditors under a contract obligating him to pay the expenses of carrying on the debtor's business, including rent, held not a contract of indemnity within Civ. Code, § 2772, but one of guaranty or suretyship (section 2787), on which an action could have been commenced by lessor under section 2807, against the principal, surety, or both, immediately on default in payment of rent, assignee's obligation, if conditional, becoming absolute on fulfillment of the condition, while the surety's obligation is deemed unconditional, where the terms import no condition precedent (section 2806).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Guaranty.]

3. Guaranty ⚡4—Indemnity ⚡1—Principal and surety ⚡5, 6—"Indemnity contract" and "contract of guaranty or suretyship" distinguished.

Promisor, in an indemnity contract, undertakes to protect promisee against loss or damage through liability to a third person, while a guarantor or surety undertakes to protect him against loss or damage from a third person's failure to carry out his obligations.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Indemnity.]

4. Guaranty ⚡4—Indemnity ⚡1—"Indemnity contract" and "contract of guaranty" distinguished.

The promise in an indemnity contract is an original, not a collateral, undertaking, while a contract of guaranty is a secondary obligation existing only where there is some principal or substantive liability to which it is collateral.

5. Limitation of actions ⚡47(3)—Action on bond of assignee for benefit of lessee's creditors held barred after five years from assignee's default in payment of rent.

An action brought by a lessor against the surety on a bond of assignee, for the benefit of lessee's creditors, more than five years after assignee's default in payment of rent, held barred by the statute, though brought within the statutory period after return of an unsatisfied execution on a judgment for the rent, even if the bond were a contract of indemnity, the loss accruing and the amount being definitely fixed when the default occurred.

6. Indemnity ⚡1—Bond not construed as contract of indemnity unless language, applied to obligation, may be so construed.

The rule that courts incline strongly to construe bonds as contracts of indemnity cannot apply, unless the language thereof, applied to the obligation sought to be enforced, is susceptible of such construction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by George B. Somers against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment against it by default, it having declined to answer after the overruling of its demurrer to the complaint. It is alleged in the complaint that on or about the 22d day of November, 1912, plaintiff's assignor, the W. J. Somers Company, entered into a written contract of lease with Force-Hewitt Company, of certain premises in San Francisco, for a term of three years, and that the latter occupied said premises under said lease up to the time of the assignment hereinafter referred to; that on or about the 14th day of July, 1915, the said Force-Hewitt Company, by an instrument in writing assigned to one J. L. Smith, for the benefit of its creditors, all of its property, including the said lease, in trust, to sell and dispose of the same, to collect the proceeds therefrom, to carry on said business, and to pay from the proceeds thereof all expenses connected with the carrying on of said business and the administration of said trust, together with such other debts as are made preferences by law, and then the claims of said Force-Hewitt Company in full, and then to reconvey and deliver the remainder to said Force-Hewitt Company; that the said Smith accepted the said trust, and that on or about the 14th day of July, 1915, said Force-Hewitt Company delivered to him all of its property, together with an assignment of said lease, and he entered upon the performance of his trust, and carried on said business, and elected to accept said lease and to hold and use said premises for the benefit of the creditors of his assignor, and as such trustee he occupied and used said premises as a tenant of said W. J. Somers Company, under the terms and conditions of said lease up to the 28th day of March, 1916; that on or about the 22d day of July, 1915, the said Smith, as principal, and this defendant, as surety, executed and delivered to the creditors of said Force-Hewitt Company a written undertaking whereby they covenanted with said creditors that, if the said Smith, as such trustee, should not faithfully and truly account for all moneys, assets, and effects of said Force-Hewitt Company which should come into his hands, or should not in all respects faithfully perform all his duties as said trustee, they would pay to said creditors whatever loss they might sustain by reason thereof, not exceeding the sum of $5,000; that said Smith as such trustee did not faithfully perform his said duties and did not faithfully and truly account for the assets of said estate, in that he failed, neglected, and refused to pay the rent that accrued under said lease for the period from December 28, 1915, to March 28, 1916, notwithstanding that he, as trustee, had sufficient funds belonging to said estate for such purpose; that thereafter said W. J. Somers Company commenced an action against said Smith as trustee to recover said unpaid rent, in which said action it recovered judgment against him, which became final on the 16th day of December, 1920, and that execution issued thereon and was returned unsatisfied, whereupon this action was brought by plaintiff herein, as assignee of said W. J. Somers Company, against the defendant, as surety on said bond, to recover the amount due upon said judgment, including the costs and interest accrued thereon.

Defendant's demurrer was both general and special, but it relies herein upon two principal contentions: (1) That said W. J. Somers Company was not a creditor of Force-Hewitt Company at the time of the execution of the bond sued upon, and therefore was not an obligee thereunder. (2) That if it was such obligee, and if the obligation of Smith to pay rent under the lease was an obligation secured by the bond, the cause of action thereon arose immediately upon his default in the payment of the rent, and that therefore this action, having been commenced more than five years thereafter, is barred by the statute of limitations.

Respondent's contentions are: (1) That the provisions of the lease gave rise to an existing obligation which constituted his assignor a creditor of the Force-Hewitt Company, and that the obligation of Smith to pay rent thereunder was one of the obligations secured by the bond. (2) That the bond sued on is an indemnity bond, as distinguished from one conditioned to pay a certain sum of money or to do a certain act; that no right of action arose thereon, and the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the aggrieved obligee suffered damages, and that damage could not be shown until judgment had been obtained against the assignee and the judgment proven to be valueless. For the purposes of this decision the validity of respondent's first contention will be conceded.

[1] The assignment herein is not a statutory assignment, but is concededly valid as a common-law assignment. The bond is not a statutory bond, but its validity as a "common-law bond" is not questioned; that is to say, it is a contractual obligation which is to be measured and construed in accordance with the ordinary rules of law governing the interpretation of contracts. It is in the following terms:

"Know all men by these presents, that we, J. L. Smith of San Francisco, California, as principal, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, a corporation, as surety, are held and firmly bound unto the creditors of Force-Hewitt Company, a corporation, in the sum of five thousand and 00/100 dollars ($5,000.00) in lawful money of the United States, to be paid to the said creditors of Force-Hewitt Company, a corporation, for which payment, well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, and our heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns, jointly and severally, by these presents.

"The condition of this obligation is such, that, whereas the above J. L. Smith was on the — day of July, A. D. 1915, appointed as assignee for the benefit of creditors of Force-Hewitt Company, a corporation, and has accepted said trust with all the duties and obligations pertaining thereto:

"Now therefore, if the said J. L. Smith as said assignee shall faithfully and truly account for all the moneys, assets, and effects of the estate of said Force-Hewitt Company, a corporation, which shall come into his hands and possession, and shall in all respects faithfully perform all his duties as said assignee, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

[2] For the purpose of arriving at its meaning and effect it is, of course, to be read in connection with the provisions of the contract of assignment to which it refers, and consideration must be given to the nature of the obligations for which it stands as security. The condition of the bond here invoked is that said Smith "shall in all respects faithfully perform all his duties as said assignee." The particular duty here claimed to have been violated is the duty arising from the contract of assignment "to pay from the proceeds of said business and property all expenses connected with the carrying on of said business and the administration of said trust;" the rent accruing during his occupancy being one of those expenses. If respondent has any right of action upon the bond, it must be upon the theory that the same stands as security for the performance by the assignee of his direct obligation to pay rent to respondent's assignor in the amounts and at the times specified in the lease. In other words, in order to show that he has a cause of action upon the bond the respondent is compelled to so construe it that its condition is, in effect, that the assignee shall well and truly pay the rent to fall due under said lease during the time he retains possession of said premises. So regarded, it is a plain contract of guaranty which is "A promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another." Civ. Code, § 2787. The obligation of the bond is joint and several, and there seems no reason to doubt that an action could have been commenced against the principal or the surety named therein, or both of them, immediately upon the default in payment of the rent. The Code expressly provides that "a guarantor of payment or performance is liable to the guarantee immediately upon the default of the principal, and without demand or notice." Civ. Code, § 2807. In this aspect of the bond it is immaterial whether the obligation of the assignee was absolute or conditional. If it was conditional it became absolute when the condition was fulfilled, and if it was not fulfilled the bond did not become an actionable obligation. If it was an actionable obligation at all, it was a direct obligation from the assignee to the lessor. Let us concede that the assignee's obligation to pay rent was conditioned upon his possession of trust funds available therefor. Then, if he did not possess such funds, the obligation to pay rent never arose, but if he did possess them the obligation arose and was breached when the rent fell due, as an obligation owing directly to the lessor. The surety's obligation was breached thereby at the same time, and the lessor could then have sued both the assignee and his surety, jointly or severally. The foregoing relates to the obligation of the assignee, not to that of the surety. The latter "is to be deemed unconditional unless its terms import some condition precedent to the liability of the guarantor" (Civ. Code, § 2806), and we find no such import in the terms used herein.

[3, 4] "Indemnity" is defined by our Code as:

"A contract by which one engages to save another from a legal consequence of the conduct of one of the parties, or of some other person." Civ. Code, § 2772.

"Contracts of indemnity are distinguishable from those of guaranty and suretyship, in that in indemnity contracts the engagement is to make good and save another from loss upon some obligation which he has incurred or is about to incur to a third person, and is not, as in guaranty and suretyship, a promise to one to whom another is answerable." 22 Cyc. 80.

Viewing the bond herein as security against loss resulting from default in the payment of rent, it is clear that it must be regarded, not as a contract of indemnity, but as a contract of guaranty or suretyship.

"The essential distinction between an indemnity contract and a contract of guaranty or suretyship is that the promisor in any indemnity contract undertakes to protect his promisee against loss or damage through a liability on the part of the latter to a third person, while the undertaking of a guarantor or surety is to protect the promisee against loss or damage through the failure of a third person to carry out his obligations to the promisee." 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 168.

Another distinction between the two is that the promise in an indemnity contract is an original and not a collateral undertaking (22 Cyc. 80), while a contract of guaranty is a secondary and not a primary obligation, and can exist only where there is some principal or substantive liability to which it is collateral.

"If there is no primary liability on the part of the third person, either express or implied, that is, if there is no debt, default, or miscarriage, present or prospective, there is nothing to guarantee, and hence there can be no contract of guaranty." 28 C. J. 887.

The bond herein is clearly collateral to the contract of assignment. The cases relied upon as authority for the conclusion that the bond herein, considered in conjunction with the assignment, is a contract of indemnity do not support this conclusion. Hormel v. American Bonding Co., 112 Minn. 288, 128 N. W. 12, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 513, does not hold that a bond such as the one herein is a contract of indemnity. It holds that where such a bond is furnished by a compensated surety engaged in that business it is to be construed under the rule applying to insurance contracts, most favorably to the insured, and not under the general rule applying to contracts of guaranty and suretyship, most favorably to the surety. The cases of Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 99 Md. 423, 58 Atl. 437, 105 Am. St. Rep. 313, U. S. Fire Ins. Co. v. American Bonding Co., 146 Wis. 573, 131 N. W. 994, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 661, and Bank, etc., Co. v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 128 N. C. 336, 38 S. E. 808, 83 Am. St.

Rep. 682, are to the same effect. Each of these cases holds that, for the purpose of construing such bonds, they will be regarded as in the same category with contracts of insurance. But in every one of those cases the action was brought directly against the surety, without first having prosecuted to judgment an action against his principal.

[5] It may be conceded, however, for the purposes hereof, that the Code definition is not exclusive, and that a contract may be in fact and in law one of indemnity, though not coming within the limits thereof. But if we assume that the bond herein may be regarded as a contract of indemnity against loss to result from default in the payment of rent, it is yet true that the loss had fully accrued and the amount thereof was definitely fixed and ascertained as soon as the default occurred. Nothing then remained to be done, to perfect, complete, or make certain the right of action against the bondsman.

Even in the case of a bond which is strictly a contract of indemnity against loss to result from default on the part of the principal, no case has been cited which is authority for the conclusion that, where the loss has fully accrued, and the amount thereof fixed as soon as the default occurs, it is necessary to first prosecute an action to judgment against the principal before proceeding against the surety, except the case of Gilbert v. Henck, 30 Pa. 205. This case, which was decided in 1858, goes still further and holds that, upon a contract of strict guaranty, guaranteeing the payment of rent under a written lease, it is necessary to first secure judgment against the lessee and have execution returned unsatisfied before proceeding against the guarantor. In this it is out of line with all the California cases and is not to be followed here. Stone v. Hart (Ky.) 66 S. W. 191, held merely that in the case of a statutory assignment for the benefit of creditors and a faithful performance bond in connection therewith, no cause of action arose thereon against the surety in favor of a creditor whose claim was disputed by the assignee until the same had been allowed and ordered paid by the court. It did not hold that the creditor was required to prosecute a separate action to judgment against the assignee. The cases of Seattle v. Northern Pac. R. R. Co., 63 Wash. 129, 114 Pac. 1038, and Norris v. Reynolds, 131 App. Div. 818, 116 N. Y. Supp. 106, are not in point at all upon the question here under consideration. Yarbrough v. Colley, 6 Ky. Law Rep. 121, was an action by a creditor against the surety upon the bond of a statutory assignee for the benefit of creditors, upon the claim that the assignee had wasted the assets. The court held that this action could not be maintained until the creditor had first prosecuted an action against the assignee in which the assets could be marshaled and the priority of claims determined.

Speaking of the liability of the sureties upon the bond, the court said:

"Their liability is measured by the interest the creditor has in the assets of the assigning debtor, and this is the measure of damages for a breach of the bond. If the estate proves insolvent, paying only a certain per cent. upon its settlement, the sureties, in the case of the default of the trustee, could only be held for that portion of the assets that the creditor would be entitled to under distribution."

Priet v. De la Montanya, 3 Cal. Unrep. 122, 22 Pac. 171, in so far as it is upon the point at all, holds by implication that such an action may be maintained directly against the surety as soon as the loss is sustained. Northern Assurance Co. v. Borgelt, 67 Neb. 282, 93 N. W. 220, makes it clear that when a bond is conditioned to indemnify, the cause of action thereon accrues as soon as pecuniary loss ensues therefrom. Cases are of frequent occurrence in the reports wherein action has been brought directly against both the principal and sureties upon faithful performance bonds similar to the one at bar, without first exhausting the remedy against the principal, and in which the propriety of such an action was not questioned. See, for example, Evans v. Gerken, 105 Cal. 311, 38 Pac. 725; Ventura County v. Clay, 114 Cal. 242, 46 Pac. 9; People v. Smith, 123 Cal. 70, 55 Pac. 765; County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 62 Pac. 257, 312, 65 Pac. 12, 459; People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 55, 68 Pac. 576; Wolf v. Aetna Indemnity Co., 163 Cal. 597, 126 Pac. 470; Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, 129 Pac. 978, 981.

It may be conceded that if the default of the assignee had consisted of a failure to account for the funds passing through his hands, or of a misappropriation thereof, it would be necessary, before any creditor could maintain an action upon the bond, to first prosecute to judgment an action against the assignee, in order to liquidate the liability of the latter and to determine the ratable proportion thereof accruing to the creditor plaintiff. That was the situation in Yarbrough v. Colley, supra. Or if, because of the default in the payment of rent, the assignee had been evicted from the premises with a resulting injury to the business, then, before any creditor could maintain an action upon the bond for such loss, it would, for like reasons, be necessary for him to first prosecute his action to judgment against the assignee.

[6] It may be conceded, as stated in Northern Assurance Co. v. Borgelt, supra, that courts incline strongly to construe bonds as contracts of indemnity, but this rule cannot apply unless the language of the bond, in its application to the obligation sought to be enforced, is susceptible of such construction. As the court said in that case:

"A clear distinction is made between bonds conditioned to pay a certain sum of money or to do a certain act, and bonds conditioned to indemnify. A cause of action accrues upon a bond conditioned to do a certain act as soon as there is a default in performance."

The bond here sued upon was conditioned to do a certain act, namely, to pay the rent. If it was not so conditioned, the respondent has no right of action thereon. If it was so conditioned his right of action against the surety arose as soon as there was a default in performance, and is therefore barred.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WILBUR, C. J.; LAWLOR, J.; WASTE, J.; KERRIGAN, J.; SEAWELL, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. One of the grounds urged upon the petition for rehearing is that we have failed to determine the question whether respondent was a creditor of the assignor and an obligee included in the bond. In the former opinion filed herein we determined that question in the affirmative. Appellant, in its petition for rehearing, did not ask for a reconsideration of the former decision as to this point, but expressly stated that it was content to be bound thereby. For this reason we did not reconsider the questions involved in the former decision upon this point, and that question is to be considered, for the purposes of this case, as decided in the affirmative.

The application for rehearing is denied.

HULEN v. STUART. (S. F. 10146.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1923.)

1. Corporations ⇐82—Contract of president with purchaser of stock to buy it back on demand enforceable.

A written agreement by the president of a corporation with a prospective purchaser of stock to buy it back at the end of a year on demand, in case no dividend was paid, is enforceable by such purchaser against him.

2. Corporations ⇐82—In an action on an agreement to buy back stock at certain price, buyer need not allege damages equaled such sum.

Where an officer, as an inducement to a prospective purchaser of stock, agreed to repurchase the stock for $100 per share at the end of the year on demand, if no dividends were paid, in an action on the agreement, the purchaser having alleged that the stock had no value at the end of the year when demand was made, it was unnecessary, under Civ. Code, §

3311, providing that the detriment caused by the breach of buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract, over the value to the seller, to allege that he had been damaged in such sum.

3. Damages ⚡141—Election to sue for wrong measure of damages does not preclude recovery, according to correct measure.

Though it is possible for a party to a contract, broken by the other party to it, to make such election of remedies as to preclude him from thereafter seeking and obtaining damages, if he has not made such an election and is entitled to recovery, the fact that he seeks damages according to a wrong measure does not preclude the court from according him the damages to which he is entitled.

4. Corporations ⚡82—Recovery on agreement to buy back stock held not to be defective, because technical tender of stock not made.

Where plaintiff was induced to purchase stock in a corporation by a written agreement to buy back the stock at the end of the year on demand, if no dividends were paid, but, on the plaintiff's demand for performance, defendant induced plaintiff not to make tender of the stock, by promising to buy the stock in another year if no dividends were paid, held that, under Civ. Code, § 1440, and section 1511, subd. 3, providing that tender is excused when the party is induced not to make it by act of the other party, plaintiff's tender of performance was excused, and defendant cannot defeat plaintiff on the ground that a technical tender was not made within the year.

5. Corporations ⚡82—Under agreement to buy back stock "in one year from date," tender should be made after year expires; "offer of performance after specified time."

Where, to induce a prospective purchaser to buy stock, a written agreement was made to buy back the stock "in one year from date," on demand, if no dividends were paid, the purchaser had no cause of action until after the expiration of the year, and was not required to make demand and tender of stock before that time, and a demand, after defendant was in default, was not ineffective as an offer of performance after a specified time fixed therefor within Civ. Code, § 1490.

6. Appeal and error ⚡1011(1)—Weight given to conflicting evidence for trial court.

The weight to be given to conflicting evidence is for the trial court.

7. Appeal and error ⚡931(4)—Supreme Court may draw necessary inferences from findings to support judgment.

In an action by a buyer of stock in a corporation, under a written agreement to buy back the stock at the end of a year if no dividends were paid, though evidence was insufficient to support a finding of tender, and though there was no finding of facts excusing tender, the Supreme Court is entitled to draw necessary inferences from the findings to support the judgment, and hence, since from the entire record it is evident that, if more complete findings had been made, they would support the judgment, the judgment will not be reversed.

8. Contracts ⚡322(1)—Burden on party, who notified other that he would not perform, to show that prior to time of performance he notified of willingness and ability to perform.

Under Civ. Code, § 1440, declaring when performance of a contract is excused, if a party to a contract notified the other that he will not or cannot perform, the burden is on him to show that prior to the time of performance he notified the other party of his willingness and ability to perform.

Kerrigan and Myers, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benjamin K. Knight, Judge.

Action by Bethana Esther Hulen, executrix of the estate of William Yancey Hulen, deceased, against A. V. Stuart. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; MYERS, J., dissenting.

Lucas F. Smith, of Santa Cruz, Lucas F. Smith, of Los Angeles, and Stanford G. Smith, of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

Ralph H. Smith, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff, as executrix of her deceased husband's estate, brought this action to recover from defendant the sum of two thousand dollars and interest, alleged to be due by reason of an unfulfilled agreement to repurchase certain corporation stocks sold by the defendant to the decedent in his lifetime.

As a cause of action, the plaintiff alleged that on or about the 15th day of September, 1915, William Yancey Hulen, the decedent, purchased from defendant 20 shares of the capital stock of the Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Company, and paid therefor the sum of $2,000; that at the time of the purchase, and as part of the consideration and inducement offered by defendant to her husband to purchase the stock, the defendant agreed in writing to repurchase the same if Hulen wished to sell in one year, and to pay therefor the sum of $100 per share, and, in addition, interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from the date of the purchase, provided no dividend had been paid on the stock; that within one year, and immediately upon the expiration of that period from the date of sale, Hulen demanded that defendant repurchase the stock at the agreed price, and that plaintiff, as executrix, after the death of Hulen, made like demand and tendered such stock to defendant, but that defendant refused at all times to repurchase the same. There is an allegation that no dividend has ever been paid upon the stock, which has no value, and plaintiff has been unable to sell the same. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment against the defendant in the sum of $2,000, together with interest at 12 per cent. and costs of suit. The defendant answered, specifically denying the allegations of the complaint. The finding of the court was in favor of plaintiff, and judgment followed as prayed for. The defendant has appealed.

From the record it appears that prior to September, 1915, there had been formed a corporation known as the Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Company. The defendant Stuart owned the controlling interest in the company at that time and was its president. The company being in need of money with which to pay its help during the canning season of 1915, the defendant entered into an arrangement with Hulen, plaintiff's testate, that if Hulen would purchase 20 shares of the capital stock of the corporation at the par value of $100 per share, he [defendant] would buy the stock back in one year. Hulen accepted the arrangement and paid $2,000 to the defendant. At the time, and as part of the transaction, the defendant executed and delivered to Hulen an agreement reading as follows:

"Santa Cruz, California, Sept. 15, 1915.

"This is to certify that W. Y. Hulen has bought twenty (20) shares of the capital stock of the Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Company at $100 a share, the total amount paid being two thousand dollars ($2,000). And I, A. V. Stuart, agree to buy said stock from Mr. W. Y. Hulen, in one (1) year from this date, including 12 per cent. interest per annum, in case there be no dividend paid on said stock by the end of one year, and providing Mr. W. Y. Hulen wishes to sell said stock at the date above named at par value, $100 a share. And furthermore, will say this agreement is made in good faith in duplicate. A. V. Stuart, President Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Co. Witness: Daniel F. Gallivan.

"This is to certify that I further agree to pay all or any assessments that may be made on said above capital stock of the Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Co. during the life of this contract, being one year from this 15th day of September, 1915. [Signed] A. V. Stuart, Pres. of the Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Co."

No dividends were paid within the year, and upon the expiration of that period Hulen demanded of the defendant that he repurchase the stock. Stuart refused. There is a flat contradiction in the record as to what occurred in this connection. The plaintiff testified she was present when demand was made by her husband upon Stuart that he repurchase the stock. The defendant replied, "Oh, no; you got the stocks there; I can't buy them." "He said for us to hold them, and then, if we didn't get no dividends at the end of the next year, he would buy them, for he was very bad off for money." Defendant denied that any demand was made upon him and testified that at the expiration of the year Hulen signified his willingness to keep the stock. On October 7, 1916, shortly after the expiration of the year, the defendant gave to Hulen a check of the Santa Cruz Fruit & Olive Canning Company, signed by the secretary and by himself, as president, for $240. Mrs. Hulen testified that this check was for the interest at 12 per cent., according to the terms of the agreement. Defendant's testimony is that at the end of the first year Hulen came to him—

"about getting a dividend or something. * * * He did not say he wanted him [Stuart] to take the stock back. * * * He was perfectly satisfied, and so he says, 'Our year is up on that contract for that interest or the dividend.' * * * I said, 'What do you want to do about it?' and he said, 'All I want is the $240, or whatever dividend they are making; if it is that much, I want that.' I said, 'How about keeping in the company; are you satisfied?' 'Perfectly satisfied, Mr. Stuart,' he said; 'I am willing to go on.'"

The contention of the defendant however, was not, in the opinion of the trial court, supported by sufficient evidence upon which to base a finding, and it found that a demand for the repurchase was in fact made by Hulen.

[1, 2] The complaint clearly states a cause of action for the return of the purchase price of the stock, with interest, in accordance with the terms of the agreement executed by the defendant to Hulen. Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 471, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013; Dickinson v. Zubiate Min. Co., 11 Cal. App. 656, 662, 106 Pac. 123; Williamson v. Marshall, 54 Cal. App. 24, 28, 200 Pac. 1058. On still another theory the complaint states a cause of action, under section 3311 of the Civil Code, which provides:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be * * * the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller. * * *"

Having alleged that the stock had no value, and that the defendant promised to pay a specified amount, for which judgment is prayed, it was unnecessary to allege that plaintiff had been damaged in such sum. An allegation and proof under the first theory, of the value of the stock was also immaterial for the reason that plaintiff's right to repayment did not depend upon its value; and, as to the statement of a cause of action, it is likewise immaterial whether or not defendant accepted plaintiff's tender of a return of the stock. Dickinson v. Zubiate Min. Co., supra, 11 Cal. App. at page 663, 106 Pac. 123; Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land

[3] Even though the plaintiff in stating her cause of action had mistaken the measure of the recovery which she sought, it would have made no difference. It is possible for a party to a contract, broken by the other party to it, to make such an election of remedies as to preclude him from thereafter seeking and obtaining the remedy of damages; but if he has not made such an election, and is entitled to recover, the fact that he seeks damages according to a wrong measure is almost wholly inconsequential, and does not preclude the court from according him the damages to which he is entitled according to their true measure. Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, 371, 199 Pac. 509; Bartlett v. Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank, 79 Cal. 218, 223, 21 Pac. 743, 12 Am. St. Rep. 139.

[4] The title to the stock passed at once to Hulen when issued subject to his right to rescind and return the property under the terms of the agreement. Guss v. Nelson, 200 U. S. 298, 302, 26 Sup. Ct. 260, 50 L. Ed. 489; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 328, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093. The duty of redelivery of the stock by Hulen to Stuart, and the payment for the same by Stuart, became concurrent, mutually dependent, and to be performed simultaneously. This being true, Hulen, before he could require the performance of the duty devolving upon Stuart to repurchase the stock should have offered and have been able to fulfill all conditions concurrent so imposed upon him, upon like fulfillment by Stuart. Porter v. Plymouth Gold Min. Co., 29 Mont. 347, 360, 74 Pac. 938, 101 Am. St. Rep. 569; Hellings v. Heydenfeldt, 107 Cal. 577, 585, 40 Pac. 1026. There is an allegation in the complaint that the stock was tendered to the defendant, and the trial court has found that it was; but the evidence does not support the finding. It does appear, however, that the defendant, in response to the demand made by Hulen, immediately admitted his inability to comply with it, thus rendering a tender unnecessary. Tatum v. Ackerman, 148 Cal. 357, 360, 83 Pac. 151, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 908, 113 Am. St. Rep. 276; Civ. Code, § 1440. Performance was excused when Hulen was induced not to make the tender or offer of performance by the act of Stuart in promising to buy the stock in another year if no dividends were paid. Civ. Code, § 1511, subd. 3; Pierce v. Lukens, 144 Cal. 397, 77 Pac. 996. Having induced Hulen to act upon that belief, it is too late now for defendant to change his position, and defeat the plaintiff on the ground that a complete technical tender was not made. Herberger v. Husman, 90 Cal. 583, 585, 27 Pac. 428.

[5] The appellant contends that the evidence fails to establish that a tender and demand for the repurchase of the stock was made during the life of the agreement. Assuming that the testimony of plaintiff is conflicting as to whether or not a first demand was made within one year from September 15, 1915, it clearly appears that a demand was made at the expiration of the year. The defendant testified that "at the end of the first year—that is, along about September 15 or 16, 1916—Mr. Hulen came to [him] about getting a dividend or something." Defendant's obligation was not to buy the stock from Hulen "within" one year, but "in one year from date," implying that the repurchase would occur at the end of the period mentioned. Standard Dictionary. Viewed in the light of the entire transaction, including the conduct of the parties, according to the testimony of both plaintiff and defendant, the decedent Hulen had no cause of action against defendant until he waited the passage of the year, and then notified defendant that he desired to sell. Assuming a demand was made before the expiration of the year, Hulen preserved his cause of action by renewing his demand and notifying defendant that he desired to sell, when he received the check for the interest in October following. The renewal of the notice and demand was not an offer of performance after a specified time fixed therefor, within the meaning of section 1490 of the Civil Code, but a further (possibly the first) notice and demand, after defendant was in default. Howard v. Galbraith, 13 Cal. App. 373, 377, 378, 109 Pac. 889.

[6] There is evidence in the record from which appellant argues that Hulen did not intend to vest title to the stock in Stuart at the time he made the demand for the repurchase. It is apparent that the trial court was not impressed with the weight of such testimony. It has accepted as true the testimony of the plaintiff that neither her husband nor she ever attempted to sell the stock. As executrix of her husband's estate, she has it in her possession. The claim of the defendant that the $240 paid to Hulen was in the nature of a dividend is met by the testimony of the plaintiff that it was paid and accepted as, and was in fact, interest paid in accordance with the terms of the agreement. There is no satisfactory proof that any dividends were ever paid by the corporation. Stuart, and stockholders to whom he had given agreements to repurchase similar to the one entered into by him with Hulen, sold their stock upon reorganization of the Canning Company. Hulen did not. Appellant advances this fact as an argument in further support of his contention that Hulen was satisfied with owning stock in the concern, and desired to retain his connection with the business. The weight and effect to be given to this circumstance, and to the testimony by which it was established, were matters for the consideration of the court below. Acts of a party, after breach of a contract by another in dealing with the property which is the subject of the transaction, do not necessarily deprive him of his right to maintain his action for damages. Phillips v. Stark, supra.

[7, 8] There remains to be considered the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment under either theory of the case. The court found a tender, but there is no evidence to support the finding. It did not find any facts excusing a tender. The findings in other respects are as comprehensive as the pleadings. The court found that, when demand was made by Hulen, the defendant refused, and at all times since has refused, to repurchase the stock. The evidence is that he said he could not. After one party to a contract has notified the other that he will not or cannot perform, the burden is upon him to show that prior to the time of performance he notified the other party of his willingness and ability to perform. Howard v. Galbraith, supra; Tatum v. Ackerman, supra; Civ. Code, § 1440. The ultimate fact was the amount, if anything, due plaintiff from defendant by reason of his refusal to repurchase the stock. This the court ascertained and found from the evidence, and necessarily included the whole controversy. Tower v. Wilson, 45 Cal. App. 123, 133, 183 Pac. 87. We are entitled to draw necessary inferences from findings in order to support a judgment. Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 49, 97 Pac. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106. From the facts found, and from the judgment ordered, it is evident, in the light of the entire record, that if more complete findings had been made they would have been adverse to the contentions of the appellant. If that be so, the failure to find further is not a ground for the reversal of the judgment. Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 342, 66 Pac. 309.

The plaintiff, as executrix, still retains possession of the stock. The certificates were produced in court, and can be indorsed and delivered to the defendant, upon payment of the amount of the judgment, as was contemplated in Williamson v. Marshall, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SEAWELL, J.

KERRIGAN, J. I dissent. The judgment in this case awards to the plaintiff, as the executrix of the estate of her deceased husband, William Y. Hulen, the sum of $2,000, being the amount of the agreed purchase price of 20 shares of the capital stock in a corporation, upon the mere breach on the part of the defendant of his agreement to purchase said stock, with nothing in the record to show either that title to the stock had passed to and vested in the defendant, or that the said sum of $2,000 was the difference between the contract price of the stock and the amount realized upon a sale thereof pursuant to the provisions of section 3049 of the Civil Code, or between such contract price and its market value at or within a reasonable time after the breach.

In this state, the measure of damages for the breach of a buyer's agreement to pay for personal property is laid down in sections 3310 and 3311 of the Civil Code, and the provisions of those sections make no distinction between shares of stock in a corporation and goods or commodities forming the subject of general commerce. The first of those sections reads as follows:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is vested in him, is deemed to be the contract price."

As above stated, there is no evidence in the record that the title to the stock in question ever vested in the defendant. On the contrary, an actual tender being excused by the announced inability or refusal of the defendant to take and pay the price thereof, the stock was retained by Hulen for some two years, when he died, and by his executrix for another two years, when this action was brought. During that period Hulen was elected a director of the corporation; a change of control occurred by the coming in of new stockholders, who purchased a large majority of the stock, paying its full par value. At that time the defendant, if by any act or suggestion on the part of Hulen he had been apprised that Hulen regarded the title to these 20 shares as having passed to and vested in him, could have disposed of the same at an advantageous price. Thereafter the corporation became involved in financial difficulties, and its stock became practically worthless. Then, for the first time and some two years after the breach by the defendant, Hulen attempted by private sale to dispose of the stock, but without success. Another two years passed, and the plaintiff, as the executrix of Mr. Hulen, now deceased, renewed the attempt, with a similar result. These attempts to dispose of the stock at private sale may be taken as conclusive that the plaintiff or her predecessor did not consider that title thereto had vested in defendant, since in that event such a sale would have constituted a conversion of the stock. Bennett v. Potter, 16 Cal. App. 183, 116 Pac. 681. It seems clear, therefore, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the defendant the contract price of the stock upon the theory that the title hereto had vested in said defendant.

This brings us to the measure of damages prescribed by section 3311 of said Code. That section provides:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be:

"1. If the property has been resold, pursuant to section 3049, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the net proceeds of the resale; or

"2. If the property has not been resold in the manner prescribed by section 3049, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller.

It is apparent that Hulen or the plaintiff, being still in possession of the stock, could have proceeded under the first subdivision of this section and have sold the stock in the manner provided for the sale of a pledge, and have brought suit for the difference, between the amount realized at such sale and the contract price. This neither of them attempts to do. The plaintiff is therefore relegated to the second subdivision of said section for her measure of damages, which is "the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract over the value to the seller"; and this "value to the seller" is defined by section 3353 of the Civil Code to be:

"The price which he could have obtained in the market nearest to the place at which it should have been accepted by the buyer and at such time after the breach of the contract as would have sufficed with reasonable diligence for the seller to effect a resale."

As a matter of fact the plaintiff seems to have adopted as her measure of damages the one prescribed in said subdivision 2, since, in praying for judgment for $2,000, she alleges in her complaint that the stock has, and at the time of the breach of the contract had, no value—an allegation which would be entirely superfluous in a complaint for the recovery of the contract price. Moreover, at the trial she introduced evidence of the market value of the stock, attempting to show that it had no value. It may be conceded that, had she established the worthlessness of the stock at the time indicated in said section 3353, Civil Code, namely, "at such time after the breach of the contract as would have sufficed with reasonable diligence, for the seller to effect a resale," the amount of the judgment given in her favor could not be questioned; but the fact is that the only evidence of market value offered by the plaintiff referred to a time two years and four years after the breach. On the other hand, as already indicated, the record contains evidence introduced by the defendant that a few months after the breach of the contract many shares of this stock changed hands at a price of $100 per share, that such sum was its market value, and that the assets of the corporation would have warranted even a higher price. This evidence was competent to establish market value. Moffitt v. Hereford, 132 Mo. 513, 34 S. W. 252. It was uncontradicted and unimpeached, and the finding of the trial court that the stock was valueless at that time is in plain disregard of such evidence and demands a reversal of the judgment.

The prevailing opinion seems to proceed upon the theory either that title to this stock passed to the defendant by the mere demand of Hulen that defendant take the stock as agreed, or that the plaintiff was entitled in any event to recover the contract price.

That in this state a person making a tender in performance of an obligation must by some act indicate to the person to whom performance is due that he intends to pass title to the thing offered necessarily results from the terms of section 1502 of the Civil Code, which provides:

"The title to the thing duly offered in performance of an obligation passes to the creditor, if the debtor at the time signifies his intention to that effect."

The intent of the seller with respect to passing title when he makes a tender is a question of fact. Clark v. Rush, 19 Cal. 393; Todd v. Lyon, 55 Cal. App. 67, 202 Pac. 899. The intent of the seller to pass title to the buyer does not inevitably, or at all, follow from a mere tender. A tender, without more, indicates that the seller offers to pass title pursuant to the terms of the contract. If the contract provides that payment is to be made upon delivery, then the tender implies that the title is to pass concurrently with the payment of the purchase price by the buyer, but not otherwise. Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co., 106 Cal. 441, 39 Pac. 853; Katzenbach v. Breslauer, 51 Cal. App. 756, 197 Pac. 967. In the case at bar the necessity of some action on the part of Hulen to signify his intention that title to the stock should pass to the defendant is emphasized by the fact that there was in fact no tender. Even if an actual tender had been made, it was still incumbent upon Hulen, in order to comply with the section of the Civil Code last quoted, to signify at that time his intention to pass title.

The prevailing opinion disposes of the question of the passage of title, upon which turns the all-important question of the measure of damages, by the statement that—

"The ultimate fact was the amount, if anything, due plaintiff from defendant by reason of his refusal to repurchase the stock. This the court ascertained and found from the evidence, and necessarily included the whole controversy."

But the court's determination of the amount due from the defendant to the plaintiff was based upon its finding that the stock from the inception to the end of the transaction was valueless, and this finding is not only unsupported by the evidence, but is directly opposed to it. In fact, it appears to me have been inadvertently made, since it is not confined to the time to which the evidence of the worthlessness of the stock was addressed, namely, two and four years after the breach of the contract, but includes the time at which the original purchase was made by plaintiff's testator, and other times when the stock was changing hands for its par value, as to which times not even the plaintiff introduced any evidence that it was not worth the price at which it was being bought and sold; and it is not necessary to say that this court is not concluded by a finding which is entirely unsupported by the evidence.

Nor is the question of rescission involved in the case, as seems to be suggested in the prevailing opinion. The defendant's obligation was to purchase from the plaintiff's testator stock which the latter had acquired directly from the corporation. In a case where a party to a contract is entitled to rescind, all parties, when the rescission is duly effected, are restored to their former status, which includes their relation to the title to the property, so that in a case where a formal tender is excused the title would pass without it; otherwise in a case, such as the present, of the breach of an executory contract for the sale and purchase of personal property.

I conclude, therefore, that there being no evidence in the record of any act on the part of the plaintiff or her testator vesting title to the stock in question in the defendant, and the finding of the trial court that the said stock was without value being based exclusively upon evidence relating to a period too remote from the breach of the contract, and the record containing ample evidence upon which to base a finding that said stock had a market value of $100 per share at a time material to the controversy, the finding in plaintiff's favor is against the evidence, and cannot support the judgment.

COHN et al. v. GOODDAY et al. (Sac. 3437.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 13, 1923.)

1. Trusts ⚡92½—Conveyance of property by trustee to one with knowledge of trust, with no consideration except oral promise to fulfill trust, is valid.

Where the holder retaining legal title to property is himself a trustee thereof under either a valid, express, or constructive trust, and he conveys the same to a grantee having full knowledge of the existence of the trust, and takes the deed absolute in form to the property, but with no other consideration than his oral promise to fulfill the trust, the burden of a constructive trust is cast on the grantee of such a conveyance; such trust not being void under Civ. Code, § 852, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973.

2. Trusts ⚡52—Voluntary constructive trust held not affected by assumption of additional burden.

Where the voluntary constructive trust assumed by A. was primarily a trust to administer and distribute the residue of property among brothers and sisters when their mother should die, such trust was not affected by A.'s assumption of an additional burden, after the mother's death and with the consent of all beneficiaries, to continue the trust in favor and during the life of an ill sister, assuming that the additional burden was not legally imposed, but merely postponed the final distribution of the trust property to the beneficiaries under the original trust agreement.

3. Limitation of actions ⚡19(3)—Action to establish trust held governed by five-year statute.

A suit to establish and enforce a voluntary constructive trust held not governed by the limitation period of four years of Code Civ. Proc. § 343, but by section 318, requiring actions for the recovery of real property to be brought within five years.

4. Limitation of actions ⚡103(2)—Limitation does not run against enforcement of voluntary trust until repudiation by trustee.

The statute of limitations does not commence to run against the enforcement of a voluntary constructive trust until there has been a repudiation by the trustee.

5. Trusts ⚡365(2)—Failure to assert division of trust property for years held not laches, defeating suit by beneficiaries to enforce voluntary constructive trust.

Where plaintiffs had a right to rely on their brother's acceptance and faithful administration of a voluntary constructive trust he had assumed, their failure to insist on a division of the trust property during the long years of his devotion of its proceeds to the care of their ill and indigent sister, was not laches, which would defeat their suit to establish and enforce the trust.

6. Trusts ⚡282—Estate of beneficiary, who received more than others by consent of all beneficiaries, held entitled to same share as other beneficiaries.

Where beneficiaries of trust property were entitled to equal shares on their mother's death, but agreed that one of their sisters should stand in the shoes of their mother in receiving monthly payments, and that when they ceased, by reason of the sister's death or the cessation of her necessities, the residue of the trust property was to be divided according to the terms of the original trust, a denial to the estate of that sister of her original share of the trust property would violate the terms of the trust.

7. Appeal and error — 882(19)—Defendant held not entitled to complain of limited scope of action, where he could have broadened it by answer or cross-complaint.

In a suit to establish and enforce a voluntary constructive trust, defendant held not entitled to urge on appeal that the trial court should have ordered and had a full accounting of all trust property, where defendants could have broadened the suit into one for a final accounting by affirmative matter in their answer, or by way of cross-complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Suit by Levi Cohn and others against Lena Goodday, as administratrix, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Bond & Dierup, of Chico, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This appeal is by the defendants from a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action to establish a trust in certain real estate and compel conveyances of certain interests therein to the plaintiffs. The facts of the case are in the main undisputed and may be summarized as follows:

In the year 1895 one Hirsch Cohn was the owner of the real estate involved in this action. He was the father of Levi Cohn, Edith Fisher, Charles Cohn, Harry Cohn, D. S. Cohn, Amelia Cohn, Sarah Schwartz, Lena Goodday, and Abe Cohn, and was the husband of Henrietta Cohn, who was the stepmother of his aforesaid children. On April 19, 1895, Hirsch Cohn and his wife, Henrietta Cohn, joined in a deed to Levi Cohn and Charles Cohn, two of the former's said sons, conveying the said real estate to them, and also executed a bill of sale transferring to his said two sons certain personal property, which is not involved in this action. The said two sons of Hirsch Cohn thereupon, and of even date with said instruments, executed a declaration of trust affecting both forms of said property, whereby they obligated themselves to pay to Hirsch Cohn during his lifetime the sum of $125 a month, and also to pay to their stepmother, Henrietta Cohn, if she survived their father, the sum of $75 monthly during her lifetime; and to deliver the residue of said property after the death of said Henrietta Cohn to the aforesaid nine children of Hirsch Cohn by his first wife, share and share alike. The said trustees were empowered by said instruments to administer, sell and convey said property. In January, 1896, a further agreement was executed between the parties to the express trust thus created, by which it was agreed that Charles Cohn should become and be the sole trustee thereunder, and that Levi Cohn should be released from the duties and obligations of said trust. A conveyance was thereupon made of an undivided one-half of said real estate by Levi Cohn to Charles Cohn, pursuant to such latter agreement, and thereafter Charles Cohn proceeded to perform the conditions of said trust by the payment to his father of the monthly sum specified therein until the latter's death in May, 1899, and thereafter by the payment to Henrietta Cohn, his widow, of the monthly sum of $75 until her death in September, 1902. Upon the death of Henrietta Cohn the said nine children of Hirsch Cohn became entitled to the residue of the trust property in equal shares according to the terms of the trust. It appeared, however, that Sarah Schwartz, one of the beneficiaries of said trust and a sister of the remaining beneficiaries thereof, was then in ill health, in danger of becoming blind, and was without adequate means of support, and that her share in the property derivable from said trust would not be sufficient for her maintenance. In consequence of these conditions, all of her sisters and brothers, the other beneficiaries of said trust, orally agreed between themselves and with her, and also with said trustee, that the property should not be distributed at said time, but should remain in the hands of said trustee, and that he should pay out of the funds derived from the further administration thereof to Sarah Schwartz the sum of $75 per month, or more, if necessary, for her support as long as she lived, or until such time as she should no longer be in need of the same, and that the property should await distribution under the terms of said trust until said time.

In July, 1903, it was deemed advisable by all of the parties concerned that the real property affected by said trust should be transferred by Charles Cohn to Harry Cohn, and that he should assume the obligations of said original trust, and also the superadded oral obligation with regard to Sarah Schwartz. All of the parties having orally agreed to this transfer, Charles Cohn conveyed the said real estate to his brother, Harry Cohn, by a grant deed absolute in form, and thereafter Harry Cohn administered the same according to the terms of the written trust and oral understanding of the parties, until April 5, 1906, when it again seemed advisable to all of the interested parties that Harry Cohn should transfer said real estate to his brother, Abe Cohn, and that he, in turn, should assume to carry into effect the obligations of the trust. In accordance with the oral agreement of the parties to that effect, Harry Cohn conveyed to Abe Cohn the said real estate by a grant deed absolute in form, and thereupon Abe Cohn undertook and thereafter continued to carry into effect the terms of the original trust and the oral understandings of its beneficiaries with respect to the monthly payments to be made to Sarah Schwartz, up to the time of her death in the year 1918. Abe Cohn himself died a little more than a year after the death of his sister, Sarah Schwartz, and never during his lifetime denied that he held said real estate subject to whatever trust existed or continued by virtue of the original agreement between his father, Hirsch Cohn, and his elder brother, Charles Cohn, and also subject to whatever obligation was created by the oral understandings of his brothers and sisters as to the payment of the proceeds of said property to the extent of $75 monthly to Sarah Schwartz during her lifetime.

After the death of Abe Cohn, his sister, Lena Goodday, who had become the executrix of his will, by the terms of which he had bequeathed to her daughters the residue of his estate, denied the existence of any trust in Abe Cohn to convey the residue of said real estate to the plaintiffs herein, and thereupon plaintiffs herein commenced this action against said Lena Goodday, as executrix of the last will and testament of Abe Cohn, and also against herself and her said husband, M. Goodday, individually to establish and enforce the provisions of said original trust to have themselves declared to be the owners of an undivided seven-ninths of said real estate and to compel a conveyance thereof to that extent to them. To the complaint of said plaintiffs, setting forth, in substance and with somewhat more of detail, the foregoing facts, the said defendants interposed a general and special demurrer, among the several grounds of which was a plea that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer being overruled, the defendants answered, denying most of the averments of said complaint for want of information or belief, and particularly denying that Abe Cohn during his lifetime held the title to said real estate subject to the trusts set forth therein, and affirmatively averred that any such trust as was alleged therein was void under the provisions of section 852 of the Civil Code and section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants also averred that the plaintiffs' cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They further pleaded the defense of laches on the part of plaintiffs in the institution of the action.

Upon the trial and submission of the cause upon the issues thus framed the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusion of law wherein it found seriatim that all of the allegations of the 25 paragraphs of the plaintiffs' amended complaint were true, and also that each of the 27 paragraphs of the defendants' answer were untrue, and as a conclusion of law from the foregoing findings of fact the trial court found that the cause of action set forth in the plaintiffs' amended complaint was not barred by the plaintiffs' laches or delay in the institution of said action nor by the statute of limitations, and that the trust as averred in said complaint was not void under the provisions of section 852 of the Civil Code, or of section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but in all respects a valid and existing trust enforceable against the estate of Abe Cohn, deceased. Judgment was accordingly ordered and entered in the plaintiffs' favor for the relief demanded in their said complaint, together with costs. From such judgment the defendants have taken and prosecuted this appeal.

[1] The first contention of the appellants is that the plaintiffs' amended complaint is insufficient to allege, and that the evidence in the case is insufficient to establish, that the defendants' deceased testator, Abe Cohn, was the trustee of an express trust. This contention, which is based upon the provisions of section 852 of the Civil Code defining express trusts in real estate, may be conceded to be well founded, and is in fact not very seriously disputed by the respondents herein. The appellants, having thus established this contention, proceed to argue that the plaintiffs' amended complaint is insufficient to aver, and that the proofs are insufficient to show, that Abe Cohn, their deceased testator, was the trustee of a constructive trust affecting the said real estate. The defect in said complaint, according to the appellants' contention, is that it fails to allege the existence of such a confidential relation between Abe Cohn and his brothers and sisters, the children of Hirsch Cohn, as would suffice to give rise to a constructive trust based upon the grant to him of the property in question and upon his oral agreement of even date with such grant to hold the said property subject to the trust of devoting a definite portion of its proceeds to the care and maintenance of Sarah Schwartz during her lifetime and of delivering over the residue of the property to the rest of his brothers and sisters upon the death of Sarah Schwartz. This contention on the part of the appellants is based upon the proposition that the relation existing between brothers and sisters is not in itself, and merely because of their blood ties, sufficient to create the presumption or sustain the finding that a constructive trust was or could be created by oral understandings between them at the time of the execution of a deed absolute in form to the one of them sought to be charged with the relations and duties of a trustee and the others affecting the property so conveyed and in the absence of the allegation and proof of fraud. It is true the District Court of Appeal so held in the case of Bacon v. Soule, 19 Cal. App. 428, 434, 126 Pac. 384, and that it was justified in so holding by what was said by this court in Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 356, 62 Pac. 555, and appellants argue that, this being so and the complaint herein having alleged no actual fraud on the part of Abe Cohn in taking the deed absolute in form to the property in question, and the evidence having shown no such fraud, the plaintiffs' pleadings and proof are sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court to the effect that Abe Cohn held the property in question in trust for the purposes set forth in said complaint.

The difficulty with the appellants' contention in this regard consists in the fact that this is not one of those constructive trusts which depend upon the existence of confidential relations between the grantor and grantee of the conveyance or between the grantee thereof and others who might be the beneficiaries of such a trust; nor is this a case which comes within the rule laid down in Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143, or Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 Pac. 543, or the other cases cited by the appellants as sustaining their contention. This is not the case of the owner in fee simple of a tract of land conveying it by deed of gift absolute in form to a grantee or grantees upon an oral understanding as to the creation of a trust in the real estate conveyed. This is a case wherein the holder of the legal title to the property is himself a trustee thereof under either a valid express or constructive trust, and who conveys the same to a grantee having full knowledge of the existence of said trust, and who with such knowledge takes a deed absolute in form to the property, but with no other consideration than his oral promise to undertake the fulfillment of the trust. In such a transaction the burden of a constructive trust is cast upon the grantee of such a conveyance. The rule upon this subject is thus stated in Perry on Trusts and Trustees (6th Ed.), § 217, wherein the learned author says:

"Another large class of constructive trusts arises from purchases or conveyances from trustees or other persons holding a fiduciary relation to property. It is a universal rule that, if a man purchases property of a trustee with knowledge of the trust, he shall be charged with the same trust in respect to the property as the trustee from whom he purchased"—citing a long line of authorities.

The Supreme Court of this state early recognized this to be the rule in this class of cases, and applied it in Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 3 Pac. 641; Scrivner v. Dietz, 84 Cal. 295, 24 Pac. 171, and in the quite recent case of Lamb v. Lamb, 171 Cal. 577, 580, 153 Pac. 913. This salutary rule has the fullest application to the facts of the case at bar. The appellants do not question the validity of the original trust created by Hirsch Cohn, and of which his son Charles Cohn was the trustee of an express trust. Charles Cohn, as trustee, conveyed the property to his brother, Harry Cohn, by grant deed, having no other consideration than that the latter would accept and faithfully perform the terms and conditions of the trust of which he was himself one of the beneficiaries, and of the nature and burdens of which he was fully aware. Harry Cohn thus became the voluntary trustee of a constructive trust, and faithfully fulfilled its conditions for a season, and then transferred the property by grant deed absolute in form to his brother, Abe Cohn, who, like himself, was a beneficiary of the original trust and was familiar with its terms, and who took over the property upon no other consideration than that of his promise to carry said trust into effect. He thus also became and continued during his lifetime to be the voluntary trustee of a constructive trust under the rule above laid down. The fact that he occupied at the time of the conveyance to him a confidential relation to his brothers and sisters, arising out of his fraternal tie, while it furnishes a reason for his assumption and fulfillment of the terms of the original trust, was not essential either to its creation or validity, since his trusteeship arose, not out of those relations, but out of the fact that he had taken over the trust property with full knowledge of the trust by which it was burdened, and with no other consideration than his agreement to fulfill the conditions of the trust. He thus assumed and thereafter continued to bear the burden with the benefit of the grant. The cases relied upon by the appellants touching the origin and validity of involuntary constructive trusts have no application to the facts of the case at bar.

[2] The voluntary constructive trust which the appellants' testator, Abe Cohn, assumed in taking over the trust property from his brother, Harry Cohn, on April 5, 1906, was primarily the trust to administer and to distribute the residue of the trust property among his brothers and sisters in accordance with the terms of the original express trust created by the transaction between Hirsch Cohn and his two sons, Levi Cohn and Charles Cohn, the obligations of which the latter expressly assumed upon the retirement of Levi Cohn from the trusteeship, and which obligations were cast upon Harry Cohn by the conveyance to him of said property, and which he, in turn, cast upon Abe Cohn by the like transfer of the trust property to him. In the meantime the stepmother, Henrietta Cohn, had died, and the portion of said trust requiring the monthly payment of $75 to her had ceased to be effective, but a new condition had arisen out of the needs of Sarah Schwartz, the sister of both the trustee and the beneficiaries of the trust, which seemed to her brothers and sisters to justify the continuance of the trust in being, and the payment to her of the sum formerly paid monthly to their stepmother. This was orally agreed to by all of the parties, and was accepted and carried into effect by the then trustee, Harry Cohn, up to the time of his transfer of the trust property to his brother, Abe Cohn, and by the latter thereafter. In taking over the said property Abe Cohn not only accepted the obligation of the original trust still in full force and effect, but accepted also orally the additional burden of the payment of the said monthly sum to said Sarah Schwartz according to the oral agreement of all of the parties concerned. This latter burden may not have been legally imposed under the strict rule relating to the creating of trusts in real estate as laid down in the cases of Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 Pac. 543; Doran v. Doran, 99 Cal. 311, 33 Pac. 929; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 18 Pac. 429, 9 Am. St. Rep. 242; Brisson v. Brisson, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, and the other cases cited by the appellants. But the fact that it may or may not have been a valid trust under these authorities is, as to this branch of the case, immaterial, since the only effect of this added oral attempt to change the direction of the fund theretofore paid monthly to Henrietta Cohn, so as to render the same payable to Sarah Schwartz, was merely to postpone the final distribution of the trust property to the beneficiaries thereof under the original trust until such a time as Sarah Schwartz should die or as her necessities should cease. Whether this diversion of this portion of the trust fund was legal or not cannot affect the legality of the portion of the original trust remaining in effect after the death of Henrietta Cohn, and which is the only portion thereof which the plaintiffs herein are seeking to enforce in this action.

[3] The appellants' next contention is that this action is barred by the statute of limitations. The only section of the Code of Civil Procedure which the defendants pleaded in their demurrer and also by their answer as constituting a bar to the maintenance of this action was section 343 thereof, which section provides that "an action for relief not heretofore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." The present action is in form an action to have it declared that Abe Cohn during his lifetime held, and that the defendants herein as his successors in interest hold, the legal title to the real estate in question in trust to convey the same to the plaintiffs herein, and that said plaintiffs be adjudged the owners of an undivided seven-ninths thereof, and that said defendants be by the judgment of the court required to execute and deliver a deed or deeds conveying to said plaintiffs their respective shares in said real estate. It is thus in no material respect to be distinguished from the case of Bradley Bros. v. Bradley, 20 Cal. App. 1, 127 Pac. 1044, which was an action to have it adjudged that the defendant held the title to certain real estate as a trustee for the plaintiff and that the legal title thereto be conveyed to him. Section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure was pleaded in bar of that action, but that court held that said action was one to determine the ownership of the property in dispute and to compel a conveyance of the title thereto to the rightful owners thereof, and was therefore an action for the recovery of real property within the meaning of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence that section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure had no application to that form of action. A petition for a rehearing of said cause was denied by this court.

The present case is also indistinguishable from the case of Hillyer v. Hynes, 33 Cal. App. 506, 165 Pac. 718, which was an action to enforce a constructive trust and to compel a conveyance of the legal title to the beneficiary thereof, and which the court held to be in effect an action for the recovery of real property, to which the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure had application, and to which the provisions of section 343 of said Code could not be applied. The court cited in support of its said conclusion the case of Bradley Bros. v. Bradley, supra, and also the case of Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 Pac. 820. In this latter case the action was one wherein it was sought to have the defendant declared a trustee for the plaintiff as to certain real estate and to quiet the plaintiff's title thereto, and this court, after a very full review of the authorities, held it to be an action for the recovery of real property, which was not barred by the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants herein have not pleaded the bar of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence upon these authorities have not sufficiently pleaded the defense of the statute of limitations in bar of the present action.

[4] But even had they done so, or if section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure could be given application to this form of action, we are satisfied that upon the facts of this case the trust sought to be established and enforced in this action was a voluntary constructive trust, against the enforcement of which the statute of limitations would not commence to run until there had been a repudiation thereof by the trustee. Lamb v. Lamb, 171 Cal. 577, 581, 153 Pac. 913; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 108 Pac. 506; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555;

Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 20 Pac. 1108; Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal. 436, 25 Pac. 22. There was no such repudiation. On the contrary, Abe Cohn as such trustee was faithful to the trust during his life. Its attempted repudiation by the appellants, Lena Goodday, as executrix of his last will and testament, and by Lena Goodday and M. Goodday, as devisees under said will, occurred only a short while before the commencement of this action.

[5] The defense of laches is wholly without merit. The plaintiffs had a right to rely upon their brother's acceptance and faithful administration of the trust he had assumed, and their failure to insist upon a division of the trust property during the long years of his devotion of its proceeds to the care of their ill and indigent sister cannot be attributed as a fault, or held to defeat their present cause of action.

[6] The appellants further urge that the estate of Sarah Schwartz is not entitled to receive the equal share of the trust property assigned to it by the judgment of the trial court, for the reason that during her lifetime she received in the monthly sums paid her by the trustee much more than her said share would have amounted to. In making this contention the appellants concede the validity of the oral agreement between the beneficiaries of the original trust as to these payments to Sarah Schwartz. The undisputed evidence as to the terms of such oral agreement shows, and the trial court has found, that the understanding of all of the parties concerned was that Sarah Schwartz should stand in the shoes of her stepmother in the matter of receiving these monthly payments, and that when they ceased by reason of her death, or the cessation of her necessities, the residue of the trust property was to be divided according to the wishes of Hirsch Cohn as expressed in the terms of the original trust. This being the agreement, the validity of which the appellants concede, it follows that their contention in this regard is devoid of merit, since to deny to the estate of Sarah Schwartz her original one-ninth share of the trust property sought to be distributed in this action would be to violate the terms of said agreement.

[7] The appellants finally insist that the trial court should have ordered and had a full accounting of all of the trust property both real and personal, from the inception of the original trust to date before attempting to distribute that portion thereof which consists of real estate and which is the subject of this action. But the parties to this action have presented no such issue in their pleadings, but have been content to confine the relief sought to the residue of the real estate which was the subject of the original trust. Had the defendants and appellants herein desired that the action as thus limited by the plaintiffs' complaint should be broadened into an action for a final accounting they should have presented that matter affirmatively in their answer or by way of cross-complaint. Not having done so, they cannot be heard to urge this contention for the first time upon appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLENDENIN v. WHITE et al. (Civ. 2621.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 25, 1923.)

1. Waters and water courses ⇨157—One maintaining ditch over another's land held licensee with right to enter and make repairs.

Where one for more than 20 years has maintained a ditch over another's land, pursuant to an agreement between the parties, has entered each year for the purpose of removing obstructions, held, that his rights were at least those of a licensee and irrevocable.

2. Husband and wife ⇨25(6)—Wife held to have ratified agreement of husband as agent for her permitting construction of ditch.

Testimony by a wife, the owner of property, as to an agreement by her husband to permit the construction of a drainage ditch across her land, held sufficient to establish a ratification of such agreement by her.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨158½(1)—Damage for injuries from stoppage of drainage ditch maintained under license held recoverable.

Where persons across whose land a drainage ditch had been maintained for more than 20 years, pursuant to an agreement between them, refused to permit the upper landowner to clear the ditch of obstructions, with the result that water backed up and killed 368 pear trees, held, that damages were recoverable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by L. P. Clendenin against Josephine White and Chester White, her husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. M. Crawford, of Lake Port, for appellants.

Tindall & Davis, of Lake Port, and Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff and defendants are adjoining landowners, plaintiff's land being higher in elevation than that of defendants; that there are certain springs on plaintiff's land from which water flows over and across plaintiff's and defendants' lands through a ditch constructed "in a well-defined depression where the water from said springs formerly flowed before the construction of said ditch"; that, more than 20 years ago, "plaintiff and defendants by mutual consent and with the express understanding and agreement that said ditch should be used jointly across the lands of plaintiff and defendants for the purpose and use of carrying the water from said springs off from and over the lands of plaintiff and defendants * * * constructed said ditch * * * along and over the lands which the water was accustomed to flow from said springs"; that the water from such springs has been conducted through the ditch for more than 20 years, and that the ditch is necessary for the drainage of plaintiff's land; that each year since the construction of the ditch it has become filled with sediment and that plaintiff and his agents have gone upon defendants' land and "with the acquiescence and assistance of said defendants have cleaned out said ditch to the depth of about two feet and to its natural condition when first built"; that in the year 1921 the defendants for the first time forbade plaintiff's repair or use of the ditch; and that plaintiff has been damaged thereby in the sum of $1,000 by reason of the consequent accumulation of water on his land. The prayer is for a judgment establishing plaintiff's right to repair and use the ditch, restraining defendants from interfering therewith and for damages in the sum of $1,000. The answer denies the alleged facts upon which plaintiff's right to the use of the ditch is based. The court found that the land alleged to belong to defendants is the property of defendant Josephine White and that Chester White is her husband and her manager and agent. The other facts are found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint. Judgment was rendered awarding plaintiff damages in the sum of $368 and granting other relief as prayed for.

[1] The evidence shows that from the year 1877 to 1899 there was a ditch running through the lands of the parties for the purpose of carrying away water from the springs mentioned in the complaint. This ditch followed a different course through defendants' land from that of the ditch here in controversy. It seems not to have served its purpose effectively. Plaintiff testified that up to the year 1899 the water spread out over the defendants' land, and that the ditch constructed in that year "took all the water into one channel." Defendant Chester White testified that the water ran "all over the field" on defendants' land, and that the new ditch "confined it." In the year 1899 the plaintiff and Chester White agreed upon the location of the present ditch through defendants' land, and that the ditch should be used jointly by the parties. White plowed furrows to mark the course of the ditch, and plaintiff constructed it along the line so marked. The old ditch was thereupon abandoned and the new one seems to have successfully carried off the water and prevented it from spreading out over the lands of the parties. Plaintiff went upon defendants' land and cleaned out the ditch every year but one, which was a dry year, from 1899 to 1921, without objection on the part of defendants, and water was drained through it continuously during that time. The ditch in controversy was constructed by plaintiff for the benefit of both parties pursuant to the oral agreement between him and White. Putting the case most strongly against plaintiff, his rights are at least those of a licensee. "Where a licensee has entered under a parol license and has expended money, or its equivalent in labor, in the execution of the license, the license becomes irrevocable, the licensee will have a right of entry upon the lands of the licensor for the purpose of maintaining his structures, or, in general, his rights under his license, and the license will continue for so long a time as the nature of it calls for. * * * In the case of irrigating ditches, drains, and the like, the license becomes in all essentials an easement, continuing for such length of time under the indicated conditions as the use itself may continue." Stoner v. Zucker, 148 Cal. 516, 520, 83 Pac. 808, 810 (113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 7 Ann. Cas. 704); Gravelly Ford Co. v. Pope-Talbot Co., 36 Cal. App. 717, 178 Pac. 155; Irrigated Valleys Land Co. v. Altman (Cal. App.) 207 Pac. 401; Cairns v. Haddock (Cal. App.) 212 Pac. 222.

[2] Appellant contends that Josephine White is not bound by her husband's parol agreement with plaintiff. Plaintiff testified that Chester White has resided on the White property for 30 or 35 years, and during all of that time has had charge of the White property. This testimony was not contradicted. Mrs. White testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Chester White is your husband? A. He is. Q. Does he manage your place there for you? A. I think I help. I don't think he has entire management of it; no. Q. Well, you leave it to him to look after the fences, do you? A. Yes. Q. He also looks after the ditches on the property; you leave that to him? A. He usually talks those matters over with me. Q. And you know of this ditch being constructed there in the year 1899? A. I don't remember the year. Q. Well, about that time? A. I suppose so. Q. Do you remember the construction of it, whenever it was? A. Yes; I do. * * * Q. You acquiesced in the construction of it? A. I really had nothing much to do with it. I was busy with the family and the house. Q. Mrs. White, do you approve of any contract that your husband made with Mr. Clendenin at that time about the ditch, or do you disapprove? A. I don't know as there was any question. I never interfered very much. Q. Well, you approved of anything your husband did? A. I have just let it go, a good many times. Q. You never objected? A. Some things I have objected to. Q. You didn't object to Mr. Clendenin? A. Not at that time. Q. Did you at any time within the year? A. No; not about the ditches."

The foregoing testimony justifies the inference that Mrs. White had knowledge of the agreement between her husband and the plaintiff and of the construction and use of the ditch by the latter. The operation of the ditch was of benefit to her own land. She accepted such benefit for a period of more than 20 years, during which time she must have known of plaintiff's annual expenditures upon that part of the ditch which was upon her own land. Having received the benefits of her husband's agreement with plaintiff during all that time she must be held to have ratified it, even if he was unauthorized to make it. "Ratification of a contract made by an agent need not be in express terms in order to bind the principal." Ford v. Lou Kum Shu, 26 Cal. App. 203, 210, 146 Pac. 199, 202. "If it is fairly inferable from the words or conduct of the party it is sufficient. Like the act of conferring antecedent authority upon an agent it may be either express or implied." Pope v. Armsby Co., 111 Cal. 159, 163, 43 Pac. 589, 590. Under a state of facts somewhat similar in principle to those of the instant case, where a son, acting for his father without express authority, had given a parol license to construct a sewer through the father's land, it was said: "The authority of the son to fully represent the father in what he proposed, either originally or by ratification, is too apparent to admit of question." Alderman v. City of New Haven, 81 Conn. 137, 70 Atl. 626, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 74. The facts of this case warrant a like observation as to the authority of Chester White to represent his wife.

[3] The drainage ditch carried off the water from certain parts of plaintiff's land which had theretofore been too wet for the growing of fruit trees. After the construction of the ditch, plaintiff planted pear trees upon the land so drained. Defendants' interference with plaintiff's use of the ditch caused the water to back up and kill 368 of these trees. There is no doubt that the plaintiff suffered damage to the extent found by the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRISAFULLI BROS. v. CUCAMONGA
VINTAGE CO. (Civ. 3691.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1923.)

1. Brokers $\S$ 86(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that commissions had been paid by application on customer's indebtedness as agreed.

In an action by a broker to collect commissions under a written contract of employment, evidence as to whether plaintiff authorized defendant company's president to apply his commissions on contract indebtedness of other customers held sufficient to support the finding for defendant.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1) — Findings based on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the finding of the trial court is sustained.

3. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 139(3)—Statute held not to apply to broker's direction to apply commissions as payment on contracts of others, since he actually answered for debt of others.

Where a broker, under a written contract to secure contracts for purchase of wines, earned commissions and later made contracts for other buyers with his company, authorizing the company's president to apply his earned commissions as payment on the later contracts, the statute does not apply, since he actually answered for the debt or default of others instead of agreeing to, and the possibility that the exact amount due the broker was not ascertained when the application was made is immaterial.

4. Brokers $\S$ 86(1)—Production of corporate books not essential to prove acceptance of broker's application.

In a broker's action for commissions earned under a written contract to secure contract buyers of wine, where defendant corporation contends that plaintiff authorized application of his earnings to payments on other contracts, production of the corporate books to show acceptance of plaintiff's application was not essential, since it is the fact of payment and not the condition of the books that matters.

5. Trial $\S$ 51—Counsel's assurance that conversations will prove cancellation of claim sufficient to admit them.

In an action for broker's commissions under a written employment contract, the trial court properly admitted evidence of conversations on counsel's assurance that they would establish a cancellation of plaintiff's claim by application of his commissions at plaintiff's request to contracts of others with the company.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Crisafulli Bros. against the Cucamonga Vintage Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Adams, Adams & Binford, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Plaintiff's assignor, G. Crisafulli, and the Cucamonga Vintage Company entered into a contract in writing, dated November 7, 1918. Under this agreement G. Crisafulli became entitled to commissions amounting to $1,950.06. These sums were earned through his services rendered as a broker in procuring for the defendant two contracts to purchase wine, referred to as the Mariani Bros. and Bellanca & Co. contracts, and which were dated October 31 and November 7, 1918, respectively. The contract between G. Crisafulli and the defendant was executed just after the other contracts mentioned, and stipulated that the broker should receive a commission of 2 cents per gallon for one sale and 3 cents per gallon for the other.

On November 21, 1918, Crisafulli, acting as agent and broker for Joe Finelli and one E. Penna, executed contracts for each of these parties by which they agreed to buy Cicilian wine from the company. The contracts contained this provision:

"The buyer agrees to pay ten dollars ($10) per barrel within five days from this date, balance to be paid by sight draft attached to bill of lading."

Under these two contracts the plaintiff was entitled to receive $3,000 on or before November 26, 1918. Neither Penna nor Finelli ever made any payment to the defendant, but the trial court found that Crisafulli directed the application of his commissions earned under the Mariani Bros. and Bellanca & Co. contracts to payment upon the $3,000 due defendant under the Finelli and Penna contracts; and that in this way the plaintiff's claim had been paid.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding. It is true that the testimony is conflicting, but we think that it justifies the construction placed upon it by the superior court. Three witnesses testified that Crisafulli authorized the president of the defendant company to make the application of the commissions which he sues to collect upon the $3,000 owing the company. Referring to a conversation in January, 1919, the witness Thomas, president of the Cucamonga Vintage Company, testified that Crisafulli said "to apply these commissions against these contracts" and further, "and we made some annotations that we were doing that, at the time." Another witness gave his recollection of the same conversation. This was H. I. DeBerard, the vice president of the Cucamonga Vintage Company, and who also acted as bookkeeper. He testified that Crisafulli said,

"That is all right, you have your commission applied on those contracts, and that is sufficient funds, and it will be all right."

He said:

"I'll fix the cars in case they don't take them. Q. He agreed to stand behind them in the event they didn't take them? A. Yes. Q. Then it wasn't at this conversation that Mr. Crisafulli first said to apply it; it had already been said by Mr. Crisafulli before this and also in your presence? A. Yes, sir. Q. You knew all about understanding that this sum was to be applied, this commission was to be applied on those contracts, didn't you? A. Yes, sir."

Another witness, A. J. Perelli-Minetti, recounted a conversation with Crisafulli carried on over the telephone. The witness, who represented the company, informed Crisafulli that the amount called for under the Finelli and Penna contracts had not been paid. Then, according to the witness, Crisafulli replied:

"That is all right, you just apply the money that is due me on this commission on the Mariani and Bellanca contracts."

Mr. Perelli-Minetti also testified to another conversation, at which were present beside the witness, Crisafulli, Thomas DeBerard, and Carlo Perelli-Minetti. This was apparently the same occasion referred to by the witnesses Thomas and DeBerard. Perelli-Minetti states that Crisafulli said in Italian:

"What you people are afraid of? You have more money on account of this contract than you ever had in any other contract, and he turned to me after I told him to say in English, and he told me we could apply the money due him on commissions of Mariani and Bellanca contracts."

The witness was then asked:

"When that remark was made, what did you and the other gentlemen present say with reference to that instruction; did you accede and agree to it?"

To which he replied:

"Yes, we said we were satisfied."

[2, 3] Appellant contends that from these and other parts of the transcript the true arrangement between the parties was that Crisafulli agreed to answer for the debt or default of Finelli and Penna on their contracts, but that such agreement, not being in writing, was void under the statute of frauds. There is other evidence to support this theory, but since we are satisfied that the testimony which we have quoted is sufficient to support the findings of the trial court, it would serve no useful purpose to include all of the testimony given in this opinion. The most that can be said is that there is a conflict in the evidence. It is unnecessary to say that under such circumstances the findings will be sustained. As the trial court interpreted the transaction, Crisafulli did not merely agree to answer for the debt or default of others, but he actually answered for the same and paid the sum of his commission upon the amount owing the defendant by Finelli and Penna. The fact is immaterial, if it be one, that the exact amount due Crisafulli was unascertained when the application was made. The number of gallons sold was known, but one witness testified that sometimes a barrel of wine was lost in shipment, which, of course, might reduce the amount of the broker's commission slightly.

[4] Nor was it necessary that the defendant prove its acceptance of Crisafulli's offer by the production of books showing an entry to that effect. It is the fact of payment and acceptance, and not the condition of the defendant's books, which is important. Anaheim v. Parker, 101 Cal. 483, 35 Pac. 1048. Books are competent, but not conclusive or essential, evidence to prove such transactions.

[5] What we have said disposes of the contention that the evidence of the conversations to which reference has been made was improperly received. The trial court pursued the proper course in admitting the evidence upon the assurance of counsel that it would establish a cancellation of plaintiff's claim by the application of it to the amounts owing from Finelli and Penna to the defendant company.

The judgment is affirmed.

LANE MORTGAGE CO. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO.
(Civ. 4484.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 22, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1923.)

Attachment $\S$ 192, 344—Undertaking held not statutory bond for release of attachment, but one obligating maker to pay to plaintiff whatever judgment was obtained without first issuing execution.

An undertaking reciting it was given for the release of property attached in a former action and running directly to plaintiff in that action, its maker, defendant, agreeing that it would on demand pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment might be recovered in that action, held not a statutory undertaking within Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 540, for the release of attached property, but a direct undertaking to plaintiff to pay whatever judgment was obtained by him in the former action, so that a showing that an execution in the former action had been issued and returned unsatisfied was not a condition precedent to recovery on the undertaking.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Lane Mortgage Company against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lloyd W. Moultrie and E. A. Lane, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant upon an undertaking given by the defendant to the plaintiff for the release from attachment of the property of certain defendants which had been attached in an action by the plaintiff against said last-named defendants and was being held by the sheriff prior to its release upon the giving of said undertaking.

The sole contention which the defendants in the present action offer upon this appeal is that said undertaking was in form and effect the statutory undertaking provided under the terms of section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the release of attached property by the attaching officer, and that this being so the plaintiff was not entitled to a recovery thereon in the absence of a showing that an execution in said former action had been duly issued and returned unsatisfied prior to the institution of the present action. In making this contention the appellant relies upon the case of Passow & Sons v. U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 31, 170 Pac. 1124, and it is conceded by the respondent that if the undertaking sued upon herein is to be held the statutory undertaking provided for in said section of the Code, the above-cited case must be given full application to the case at bar and the judgment herein be reversed. The respondent, however, maintains that said undertaking is not such statutory bond, but, on the other hand, is a common-law bond given by the defendant herein directly to the plaintiff herein pursuant to an agreement between the parties to said former action as to the release of the property of the defendants therein upon the execution and delivery of said bond binding the surety company as the maker thereof directly to the plaintiff for the payment of whatever judgment was obtained by it against the defendants in said former action, and hence that the case of Passow & Sons v. U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co., supra, has no application to the facts of the case at bar. The respondent in making this contention relies upon the case of Kast v. Pacific Surety Co., 185 Cal. 450, 197 Pac. 339, as conclusive upon the question, and we are satisfied that its contention in this regard must be sustained. The undertaking in question recites that it is given pursuant to an agreement between the parties to said former action for the release of the property attached therein. It runs directly to the plaintiff in said action, and its maker by its express terms agrees and promises that, in case the plaintiff recovers final judgment in said former action, "we will on demand pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action."

The case of Kast v. Pacific Surety Co., supra, distinguishes an undertaking in this form from that under consideration in the Passow Case, and upon the reasoning and authority of said more recent decision it follows that the judgment herein must be affirmed and it is so ordered.

STAFFORD v. HILL et al. (Civ. 4047.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 10, 1923.)

1. Costs ⇨254(5)—Amount paid for reporter's transcript used on former appeal under the alternative method held properly allowed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, providing that a party entitled to costs "may recover entire amount paid out by him in connection with said appeal, and the preparation of the record for the appeal," an amount paid for a reporter's transcript of testimony used on a former appeal of the cause under the alternative method is properly allowed as an item of cost.

2. Costs ⇨205—Verification of memorandum of costs held sufficient.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1033, 1034, providing what a verification to a memorandum of costs must contain, held, that a verification to the effect, among other things, that the items of the memorandum "are true and correct, and have been necessarily incurred in this cause," was sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by C. C. Stafford against Frances B. Hill and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals from an order taxing costs and refusing to strike memorandum of cost from files. Order affirmed.

See, also, 200 Pac. 33.

Herbert Cutler Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Vincent Hannon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order taxing costs and denying a motion to strike a memorandum of costs from the files.

[1] Appellant objects to an item of costs allowed by the trial court, being the amount paid for a reporter's transcript of testimony used on a former appeal of the cause under the alternative method. Appellant cites Sime v. Hunter, 55 Cal. App. 157, 202 Pac. 967, as authority for her claim that such an item is not properly taxable as costs, but the opinion in that action does not possess the force which appellant attributes to it. There the item was for a copy of the reporter's transcript used on the appeal, the copy having been paid for by the respondent and having been procured for the private use of that party in connection with the appeal. The respondent claimed the item as costs and it was properly disallowed, of course. Here, however, the item claimed was expended by the appellant on the former appeal, respondent here, for the reporter's transcript which he filed with the District Court of Appeal under the alternative method. This item was properly allowed under the provisions of section 1027, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that a party entitled to costs on appeal "may recover all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal, and the preparation of the record for the appeal." Under the terms of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, providing for the alternative method of appeal, the reporter's transcript filed by an appellant is a part of the record on appeal.

[2] It is insisted by appellant that the memorandum of costs should have been stricken for the reason that it was not verified as required by law. The verification is to the effect, among other things, that the items of the memorandum "are true and correct and have been necessarily incurred in this cause." This language is in exact accord with the requirements of sections 1033 and 1034, Code of Civil Procedure, providing what such verifications must contain, but appellant contends that under the language of section 1027 of the same Code the verification should show that the amounts set forth in the memorandum were actually paid out. The point is without merit. Section 1027 has nothing to do with the form or contents of the verification. It merely provides what items of expenditure may be recovered as costs.

Order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BRITT. (Cr. 946.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 26, 1923.)

1. Rape $\S$ 35(4)—Proof held not at variance with information as to time offenses committed.

In a prosecution for rape, testimony of the prosecutrix as to the time of alleged offenses held not at variance with the information.

2. Rape $\S$ 51(2)—Corpus delicti held sufficiently established.

Testimony of a physician that at the time of trial prosecutrix was seven months advanced in pregnancy, together with that of the complaining witness, held sufficient to establish corpus delicti.

3. Rape $\S$ 52(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, testimony by the prosecuting witness as to criminal intimacy with defendant, her father, held sufficient to sustain conviction.

4. Rape $\S$ 57(1)—Defense of an alibi held for jury.

In a prosecution for rape, where the prosecuting witness testified that the offense occurred on a Saturday during a particular month, testimony by defendant seeking to establish an alibi to the effect that he had been employed at another place every Saturday during the month, if assumed sufficient to conclusively establish such fact, held only to take the question of guilt to the jury.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 539(1)—No abuse of discretion in permitting leading questions.

In a prosecution for rape, where at the time of trial the prosecuting witness was dead, and her testimony given at the preliminary examination admitted under Pen. Code, $\S$ 686, and where the magistrate conducting such preliminary examination had permitted her to answer leading questions and had allowed a rigid cross-examination by defendant's counsel, held, that the admission of such questions, which could not then be reframed, was not an abuse of discretion.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1170(3)—Error in excluding particular testimony held cured by subsequent admission.

Possible error, in sustaining an objection to a question as to whether the prosecutrix in a prosecution for rape had ever had intimate relations with another than defendant, held cured by the admission of subsequent testimony in answer to a similar question.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1170(2)—Exclusion of company record properly admissible held not prejudicial error where witness testified fully as to contents.

In a prosecution for rape, where defendant sought to establish an alibi by showing that he had been employed at another place on the date of the alleged offense, error in refusing to permit the introduction of a permanent record of the employing company held not prejudicial where the witness producing the same was permitted to testify fully as to its contents.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(6)—Instruction as to necessity of proof of particular date of offense held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for rape where the information charged two offenses on particular dates, an instruction "that it is wholly immaterial on what day or night the offense charged in the information was committed, provided you believe from the evidence it was committed and that the same was committed within three years prior to the filing of the information" held not reversible error where no attempt had been made to establish any offenses other than those charged, or where the testimony admitted did not establish other offenses.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 1178—Review of criticized instructions unaccompanied by citations of authority or argument unnecessary.

Criticized instructions, both given and refused, need not be reviewed on appeal, when unaccompanied by either citations of authority or argument.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 1037(1)—Alleged misconduct of counsel need not be reviewed, where objection not made during trial.

Review of alleged misconduct of counsel on appeal was not required, where objection was not made during trial.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 1166½(6)—Excusing women on jury panel in prosecution for rape held not prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for rape, where the court on the day on which the trial was commenced excused the women on the jury panel, and where no objection was made by counsel to such action, held, in the absence of any showing that the jurors who did serve were not competent, fair, or qualified, that the action of the court was not prejudicial.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 730(7)—Remarks of counsel as to agreement for male jury held not prejudicial misconduct, in view of instruction.

In a prosecution for rape, remarks of prosecuting attorney in his opening argument relating to the advisability of having a male jury, and concerning an agreement between counsel for dismissal of women on the panel, held not prejudicial misconduct, in view of an instruction by the court to disregard statements by counsel of facts not in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Otha F. Britt was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHENK, Justice pro tem. The defendant was accused by information in four counts; the first and third counts charging statutory rape on or about the 15th day of June, 1921, and on or about the 15th day of September, 1920, respectively, and the second and fourth counts charging incest at the same times at which the alleged rape was committed. A verdict of guilty as to each count was returned by the jury. A motion for a new trial as to counts 2 and 4 was granted. A similar motion as to counts 1 and 3 was denied, and sentence thereon was pronounced. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The contentions of the appellant are: (1) That the corpus delicti was not established; (2) that the evidence was insufficient to warrant or sustain a conviction; (3) that the trial court made prejudicially erroneous rulings during the course of the trial; (4) that instructions were improperly given or refused; and (5) that he was not given a fair trial because of certain matters occurring at the trial and which will hereinafter be more particularly noted.

[1, 2] The prosecuting witness, Beulah Britt, died before the trial, and her testimony given at the preliminary examination was offered and received in evidence under section 686 of the Penal Code. She testified that she was the daughter of the defendant; that she was 14 years of age at the time of the alleged offenses. As to the first count she testified that the defendant had sexual intercourse with her "either the first or middle part of June," 1921, about two weeks before school closed, which was about June 20, and when she and her mother and the defendant lived on Alessandro street in the city of Los Angeles. As to the third count she testified that the defendant also had sexual intercourse with her in the same city when their home was on Maple avenue; that they moved to Maple avenue "in July about a year and a half ago." The date of her examination at the preliminary hearing was January 5, 1922. She testified that this occurred when her mother was at the Los Feliz hospital; that her mother returned from the hospital in November, and that she had been at the hospital five weeks. The time thus fixed would place the commission of this act in September, 1920. No fatal variance as to the time alleged and proved is shown (People v. Williams, 153 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323). By the testimony of a physician produced on behalf of the people it appeared that the prosecuting witness had been examined on December 28, 1921, and found to be pregnant, and that she had been pregnant for about seven months. There was no dispute as to the age of the prosecutrix. The jurisdictional facts were established, and the testimony of the complaining witness constituted the necessary proof of criminal agency. No more was required to establish the corpus delicti. Peo- ple v. Flores, 34 Cal. App. 393, 167 Pac. 413; People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 146 Pac. 890. In addition, proof of pregnancy for seven months by examination made about seven months after the offense charged in count 1 tends further to prove criminal agency. People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 46 Pac. 896.

[3] There is no force in the suggestion that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction. The testimony of the prosecutrix was not improbable and upon her statements alone the jury was authorized to convict.

"The truth or falsity of * * * testimony [of the prosecutrix] was exclusively for the determination of the jury and the trial court." People v. McCoy (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 1016; People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 Pac. 404; People v. Akey, 163 Cal. 54, 124 Pac. 718; People v. Crawford, 24 Cal. App. 396, 141 Pac. 824.

Appellant urges that from the evidence taken as a whole a miscarriage of justice has taken place, and that this court should so declare as a matter of law. This contention has resulted in an examination of the entire record. The defense was an alibi, and that the charge was a result of a conspiracy between the wife and the daughter to lay the blame for the latter's condition upon the father, in order to persuade or coerce him not to leave home and abandon his family as he had threatened to do when he learned of the daughter's condition after the examination by the physician. The defendant denied that he had ever had illicit relations with his daughter, but the investigating officers testified that after his arrest he admitted partial penetration. This was sufficient to warrant the jury in concluding that the crime had been completed. Section 263, Pen. Code.

[4] The prosecutrix testified that the offense alleged in count 1 was committed about 7:30 or 8 o'clock on a Saturday morning in the early part of June. Defendant was a brakeman on the Southern Pacific. He produced a railroad clerk who had charge of the records of the company and who testified from the time book that the defendant, during the month of June, was working on the Fillmore-Oxnard local in Ventura county on every Saturday in that month. The defendant testified to the same effect, and further stated that when he had finished his Saturday run he would take the train for Los Angeles, arriving at home on Sunday morning, where he would remain until Monday morning. Mrs. Edna Britt also testified that her husband was not at home on Saturdays in the month of June, that he came home on Sunday morning, and left between 5 and 6 o'clock on Monday mornings, and remained away the rest of the week. The foregoing constitutes the evidence on the alibi. Assuming that it was conclusively shown that the defendant was not at home on any Saturday morning in June, it did appear without question that he was at home every Sunday. Under these circumstances it cannot be said that the testimony of the prosecutrix as to the particular act charged was not convincing because she had been mistaken as to the day of the week. Defendant was at home on Sunday of every week. The effect of this evidence was for the determination of the jury. The defense of an alibi was not interposed as to the charge alleged in count 3 of the information.

As to the defense of conspiracy, Mrs. Britt testified, on behalf of the defendant: That after she and her daughter had gone to a doctor's office and had been informed that the girl was pregnant she told the defendant about it. That he was very angry and threatened to leave them. That the girl then said, "Well, why not blame it on to my father, and he won't leave then at all." That the daughter had resisted the suggestion of her father that she be placed in a home, and said that "she was going to blame it on her father if she was sent out there." That there was an agreement between herself and Beulah that the defendant would be accused. That the girl had told her that a 15 year old boy was responsible for her condition, but notwithstanding this information that she did not advise her daughter not to tell the story about her father. The prosecutrix denied that she had any such agreement with her mother. She testified that she had never discussed such a question with her mother, that she told her mother that her father was the cause of her condition, and that she had told everybody else he was, "because he has done it."

On cross-examination she testified that after she had been to the doctor's office she had talked with her mother many times in the presence of her father about her condition. On this point the testimony was as follows:

"Q. Did you and your mother ever discuss this afterwards? A. Discuss it? Well, she talked to me lots of times. Q. Talk about it at all? A. Yes, she talked about it. Q. Ever say anything to your father in your presence about it? A. She used to fuss at him but that was all, in my presence. Q. What did she say when she was fussing at him? A. She fussed at him for being the cause of my condition. Q. What did he say at that? A. Lots of times he said it never would have happened if she had not been out there at the Los Feliz hospital. Q. Didn't you tell your mother that your father had never had anything to do with you? A. No, sir."

The foregoing statement attributed to the father was not denied by him. The jury undoubtedly questioned the credibility of the mother's statements as to the alleged conspiracy. An inspection of the record compels the conclusion that the jury was justified in returning the verdict.

[5] Numerous rulings of the court during the course of the trial are assigned as error. Most of them are accompanied by neither argument nor citation of authority. The first contention is that the court erred in permitting leading questions to be propounded to the prosecutrix. As above stated her testimony was contained in the transcript of the proceedings had before the magistrate at the preliminary examination. The magistrate permitted her to answer leading questions. The witness was rigidly cross-examined by defendant's counsel before the magistrate. She was dead at the time of the trial, and the questions could not be reframed in the superior court. No abuse of discretion of the trial court under the circumstances has been shown.

[6] Exception is taken to the ruling of the court sustaining an objection to a question as to whether the prosecutrix had ever had intimate relations with any one else. Later on, however, she was permitted to answer a similar question, and admitted such relationship with a 15 year old boy. If there was any error it was cured by the subsequent questions and answers.

[7] The defendant offered in evidence the time book of the conductor on the Fillmore-Oxnard run of the railroad where defendant was employed in June, 1921. Objection that a proper foundation had not been laid in that the handwriting of the conductor had not been identified was sustained, and this ruling is assigned as error. The clerk in the office of the railroad company who had custody of such records testified that the book was a permanent record of the company, taken in the ordinary course of business. The foundation for the introduction of the book in evidence was sufficient, but the error in excluding it was not prejudicial, for the reason that the witness producing the same was permitted to testify fully as to the contents of the record pertaining to the time that the defendant was on duty in Ventura county. This was the only purpose of the offer.

A letter passing between mother and daughter was offered in evidence by the defendant, and a general objection to its introduction was sustained. The document was inspected by the court and marked for identification, but no record of its contents is found, hence it is impossible to pass upon its admissibility.

[8] Exception is taken to seven different instructions given by the court. The principal contention is with reference to the following:

"The court instructs the jury that it is wholly immaterial on what day or night the offense charged in the information was committed, providing you believe from the evidence it was committed, and that the same was committed within three years prior to the filing of the information in this case."

When a particular act is alleged and other acts of a similar nature between the same parties are proved for the purpose of showing a lascivious tendency this instruction has been held to be prejudicially erroneous. People v. Elgar, 36 Cal. App. 114, 171 Pac. 697; People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323. The theory upon which this instruction was denounced in those cases is stated therein as follows:

"A verdict of guilty could have been rendered under such an instruction, although no two jurors were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, or at all, of the truth of the charge, as to any one of these separate offenses. Even worse than that was possible. As to every specific offense which there was an attempt to prove, and which could be met by proof, the defendant may have established his defense, and yet upon the general evidence of continuous crime, which, in the nature of things, he could only meet by his personal denial, he may have been convicted."

In each of those cases there was proof of acts not charged for the purpose of showing an immoral tendency. Obviously this rule can have no application in a case where no offenses are proved other than those alleged. It therefore becomes necessary to determine whether any offense or offenses were proved other than those charged in counts 1 and 3 of the information. Appellant contends that the first intimation of any offense in the record is the testimony of the prosecutrix wherein she stated: "Well, over on Maple avenue I slept with him," and that no date was fixed for this occurrence. In this counsel is mistaken as to the failure to fix the time, for by computation the date of this offense is readily fixed as having taken place in September, 1920, and is the offense charged in count 3. The method of arriving at this date is set forth above in the consideration of the contention that the corpus delicti had not been established and need not be repeated.

The fact that the prosecutrix testified that at the Maple avenue house at the time alleged in the third count her father committed the act "about three times" does not compel an election. She made no attempt to identify either of the three separate acts, but bulked them in the one comprehensive statement that her father at that house committed the act about three times. Under such conditions it is not possible that two or more or any number of jurors less than the 12 could have believed the testimony as to one of these three acts at the Maple avenue house and disbelieved it as to the others. On the contrary, her broad general statement left but two alternatives for the jury, i. e., to accept her statement in its entirety, or to reject it in its entirety. Having found the defendant guilty upon that count which, as the circumstances of the case show, does in effect charge an offense committed while the defendant resided with his daughter at the Maple avenue house, we must conclude that the jury as a whole accepted as true the testimony of the prosecutrix that at that house the father committed the act about three times. That being the situation, appellant could not possibly have suffered prejudicial error because no election was made as between these three acts. The cases of People v. Elgar and People v. Williams, supra, are therefore not controlling.

It is further contended that a separate offense was intimated by a question propounded by the district attorney to the prosecuting witness as follows: "You say that the first time this occurred was in Kansas City, Mo.?" and that the jury might draw the inference therefrom that an offense not alleged had taken place in Kansas City. An inspection of the record discloses that defendant's counsel objected to this particular question and that the objection was sustained. Furthermore, the court instructed the jury that "if any counsel had intimated by questions, which the court has not permitted to be answered, that certain things are or are not true, you must disregard such questions and refrain from any inferences based upon them." The defendant was therefore not called upon to meet any charge except those alleged and proved.

[9] The other instructions criticized by appellant, both given and refused, are accompanied by neither citation of authority nor argument requiring consideration. Under these circumstances they need not be further commented upon. Moore v. San Vicente Lumber Co., 175 Cal. 212, 165 Pac. 687, and cases there cited; People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 201 Pac. 955.

[10] The appellant assigned as error certain statements of and questions propounded by the court and the district attorney during the course of the examination of witnesses. Each assignment has been considered in so far as the action of the court is concerned, and as to the district attorney it is assumed that counsel intended to charge him with misconduct and not with error, but no assignment of error or misconduct as to these matters was made by counsel during the course of the examination of the witnesses, consequently no extended consideration of points now raised is required. Each contention in this regard, however, has been examined and is found to be untenable.

[11] This case was on the calendar in the trial court in the forenoon of the day on which the trial was commenced. The court excused the women on the jury panel until the following morning, and directed the men to return at 2 o'clock. He stated in effect that the case would not be reached before 2 o'clock and excused the witnesses until that hour. The order excusing the women on the panel until a later time is now assigned as error, as having been made out of the presence of the defendant and without his consent. No objection was made by counsel in the trial court to this method of procedure, and there is no suggestion that the jurors who did serve were not competent, fair, and qualified to act. The defendant was not prejudiced by the order, so long as an impartial jury was obtained. People v. Harris, 45 Cal. App. 547, 188 Pac. 65; People v. Lee, 17 Cal. 76. See, also, note People v. Barker, 1 Am. St. Rep. 519.

[12] Misconduct is charged against the district attorney for using the following language in his opening argument to the jury:

"Now, no doubt you have all surmised that we have mutually agreed upon a male jury because of the peculiar character of the case. I am constrained to say Mr. Morse thought, as well as I did —."

Here the district attorney was interrupted by defendant's counsel with his assignment and then proceeded:

"I was about to say Mr. Morse himself was very courteous about the matter and realized we would have to call a spade a spade, and that certain language which would develop in the testimony would be very difficult for either of us, hard boiled though we may be —."

This was also assigned as misconduct. Defendant's counsel did not deny that such an arrangement had been agreed upon before the trial commenced, and, even if an agreement to that effect had been made in the presence of the jurors, it is difficult to see how they would thereby be prejudicially affected against the defendant. The court instructed the jury that—

"If counsel upon either side have made any statements in your presence concerning the facts in the case you must be careful not to regard such statements as evidence, but must look entirely to the proof in ascertaining what the facts are."

The remarks of the district attorney in view of this instruction could work no possible prejudice to the defendant's rights. The character of some of the testimony was such as to prompt a desire on the part of counsel for both sides to avoid trying the case before a mixed jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILLIS. (Cr. 689.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 30, 1923.)

Physicians and surgeons § 6(1/2)—Chiropractors held within statute penalizing practice without licenses; "diagnose" and "disease" defined.

A chiropractor who practices without a license is guilty of a misdemeanor within St. 1917, p. 114, § 17, requiring any person "who shall practice or attempt to practice, * * * any system or mode of treating the sick * * * or diagnose * * * for * * * any disease," etc., to have a certificate, though his conception of "disease" and "diagnose" may differ from the therapeutic; the statute contemplating the popular meaning of these terms rather than refinements, and the words "practice or attempt to practice any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted" applying to him whether he "diagnosed" or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Disease.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

J. E. Willis was convicted of practicing medicine without a license, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Helms, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was convicted under an information charging that he—

"did willfully and unlawfully practice a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted in the state of California, without then and there having a valid unrevoked certificate of license from the board of medical examiners of the state of California so to do."

The statute (section 17, Stats. of 1917, p. 114) provides:

"Any person who shall practice or attempt to practice, or who advertises or holds himself out as practicing, any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted in this state, or who shall diagnose, treat, operate for, or prescribe for, any disease, injury, deformity or other mental or physical condition of any person, without having at the time of so doing a valid unrevoked certificate as provided in this act, * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction therefor shall be punished as designated in this act."

No attack is made upon the validity of the statute, but the claim of appellant is that in following his peculiar mode of treatment he is not subject to its provisions. His brief contains an interesting and illuminating discussion of the philosophy and technique of the chiropractic system, but we perceive therein no reason for exempting such practitioners from the requirements of this wholesome law, designed, as it is—

"to protect both the individual and the public from the dangers and evils which might result from treatment by those not possessing the knowledge and skill requisite in the treatment of diseases with which mankind is afflicted." People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 156 Pac. 451.

The general trend of appellant's contention may be disclosed by the following quotation from his brief:

"The science of chiropractic is separate and distinct from the science of medicine and surgery and from all other known forms of what is generally termed 'drugless practice.' The particular difference consists in two things: First, excepting the science of chiropractic, each and every other science having to do with improvement or benefits to the human body, bases its effects upon an attempt to heal the body or to cure the body, and may therefore be generally referred to as a therapeutical science, as contradistinguished from the science of chiropractic, which makes no claim to being a science or art of healing the body or treating the diseases of the body. * * * In the second place, chiropractic differs from the so-called therapeutical sciences in this: That chiropractic does not recognize disease as an entity, and consequently it cannot treat diseases, nor men nor women for diseases. Chiropractic only aims to establish and maintain the normal function of the tissues of the body by permitting a normal transmission of nerve energy to take place between the nerve centers and the general tissues of the body. The present Medical Practice Act in the state of California never did, does not, and never will apply to chiropractors, because the Legislature that enacted it, and the act itself expresses nothing but therapeutic language. The very prohibition contained in the penalizing part of the Medical Practice Act provides 'that every person who practices any mode or system of treating the sick or afflicted,' except as there-in provided shall be punished," etc.

There is much more to the same effect, and the whole brief, we may say with due deference to the learned counsel for appellant, might be regarded as an appropriate article for a medical journal or a valuable contribution to propaganda in favor of this peculiar system of treatment, but it seems idle to say that it offers any defense to the charge of which appellant was convicted.

Of course, it matters not whether the chiropractor recognizes the existence of "disease," as that term is generally used, or what nomenclature he adopts to designate such condition of discomfort. The statute contemplates a departure from a state of health or what appellant is pleased to term "a defective functioning of some organ of the body, or to a morbid condition affecting certain tissues of the body, after this defective functioning or morbidity has existed a sufficient length of time to indicate its presence in the body by symptoms." Common folks generally prefer the simpler term employed by the statute, but if appellant and the followers of his system of practice favor a more euphonious designation, the law will not deny them that privilege. The law, however, does not permit the practice of the "healing art" without a suitable license, no matter what peculiar views of the nature of physical ailments may be entertained by the practitioner.

Appellant's defense is no more reasonable than would be that of a man charged with murder who should claim that he could not commit the offense because he did not believe that there was such a thing in existence as a "human being."

The claim that he could not be legally convicted because in his practice he does not "diagnose" human ailments seems to us equally specious and fanciful. The term as applied to pathology is defined in People v. Jordan, supra, as "the recognition of a disease from its symptoms." Therein it is said:

"To diagnose a case is as much a part of the practice of medicine as the drawing of pleadings or the giving of advice are parts of the practice of law."

And the court quotes with approval the language of Mr. Justice Holmes in Collins v. Texas, 223 U. S. 288, 32 Sup. Ct. 286, 56 L. Ed. 439, as follows:

"The plaintiff in error professes, as we understand it, to help certain ailments by scientific manipulation affecting the nerve centers. It is intelligible therefore that the state should require of him a scientific training. [Citing cases.] He, like others, must begin by a diagnosis. It is no answer to say that in many instances the diagnosis is easy—that a man knows it when he has a cold or a toothache. For a general practice science is needed."

Indeed, it is difficult to conceive of any one trying to restore to a normal condition a person who is abnormal without a prior investigation and determination, in a general way at least, of the character of the abnormality. Manifestly, there are no fixed limits to a diagnosis. It may not amount to a scientific classification of the ailment, but it may go no further than an observation of the most obtrusive symptoms, and may be accurate or inaccurate, and yet be within the contemplation of the statute. It seems like an unjust aspersion on the character and intelligence of this respectable body of practitioners to intimate that they attempt to restore "the normal activity of the tissues" without any inquiry or investigation as to what tissues are affected and in what manner their activity may be abnormal.

Moreover, if it may be said that there may be treatment without diagnosis, then the appellant is equally guilty, because the statute enumerates various acts which separately or together constitute an offense. One of these is:

To "practice or attempt to practice any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted * * * without having at the time of so doing a valid unrevoked certificate as provided in this act."

If he does this either with or without a diagnosis he is chargeable with the offense. People v. Saunders (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 120.

The foregoing covers the ground of appellant's objection to the verdict, and we are satisfied there is no merit in his contention.

It may be added that appellant does not question the fairness of the trial judge. To the contrary, he declares "that throughout the entire proceeding, including the argument on the motion for a new trial, the learned lower court was all that could be desired in courtesy and in kindness, both to the defendant and to defendant's counsel," but he adds that he feels the court acted "in all sincerity upon a mistaken view of the law."

We think the lower court properly interpreted the law, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re FITZGERALD'S ESTATE. ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP OF MONTEREY AND LOS ANGELES v. TYNAN et al. McLINDEN et al. v. SAME. (Civ. 4189, 4190.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 3, 1923.)

1. Wills ⚡812—Charitable residuary bequest diminished, rather than specific bequest to bring total within statutory limitation.

Under Civ. Code, § 1313, limiting the portion of an estate which may be bequeathed or devised to a charitable or benevolent society or corporation by a person leaving legal heirs, where both specific bequests and residuary bequests are made for charitable purposes, the specific bequests must be paid in full, and the residuary bequest diminished, if necessary, to bring the entire charitable bequests within the prescribed limitation.

2. Wills ⚡13(2)—Residuary bequest to bishop as corporation sole held charitable and subject to statutory limitation; "charitable or benevolent purposes."

A bequest, "I give, devise, and bequeath to the Roman Catholic Bishop of * * * a corporation sole, all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, * * *" held a bequest for charitable or benevolent purposes within Civ. Code, § 1313, such as was subject to be diminished in order to keep the total of charitable bequests, both specific and residuary, within the statutory limitation.

3. Wills ⚡734(1)—Charitable bequests bear interest under statute after becoming due.

Under Civ. Code, § 1369, providing that legacies bear interest from the time they become due, legacies for charitable or benevolent purposes are entitled to interest after they become due, as are others.

4. Wills ⚡734(1)—Residuary legatee, precluded from taking all of residuum by statute, held entitled to interest on portion taken.

Where the residuary legatee was precluded from taking the whole of the residuum by the limitations contained in Civ. Code, § 1313, so that there was an unbequeathed remainder, held, that the named residuary legatee was, under section 1369, entitled to interest on the portion he did receive after it became due.

5. Wills ⚡734(1)—Statute limiting charitable bequests does not limit right to interest.

Civ. Code, § 1313, limiting the portion of estates of persons leaving legal heirs which may be bequeathed to charitable or benevolent purposes, does not preclude a legatee from recovering interest on a charitable bequest after it becomes due.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Catherine Fitzgerald, deceased. Two appeals from a decree directing distribution; one by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, the other by Annie McLinden and others. Decree affirmed.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant and respondent Roman Catholic Bishop, etc.

M. J. McGarry, of Los Angeles, for respondent executors.

Rohe, Yakey & Devin, of Los Angeles, for respondent Mary Fitzgerald.

H. A. Massey and Ben F. Gray, both of Los Angeles, for appellants and respondents Annie McLinden, Sarah Sloan, Rosie Heaton, and Theresa Fitzgerald.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for other respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In case No. 4189, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, a corporation sole (hereafter called the bishop), appeals from a decree of distribution of the estate of Catherine Fitzgerald, deceased. In case No. 4190 Annie McLinden, Sarah Sloan, Rosie Heaton, and Theresa Fitzgerald appeal from the same decree.

We will first consider the appeal in case No. 4189. The questions presented on this appeal arise out of the fact that by her will the decedent made several gifts to charitable societies or corporations which, according to the decision of the court, collectively exceeded one-third of the estate of the testatrix, leaving legal heirs. The testatrix died on the 3d day of May, 1918. At that time section 1313 of the Civil Code read as follows:

"1313. Restrictions on devises or bequests for charitable uses. No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy and each of them shall be valid; provided, that no such devise or bequest shall collectively exceed one-third of the estate of the testator, leaving legal heirs, and in such case a pro rata deduction from such devises or bequests shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of such estate; and all dispositions of property made contrary hereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law; and provided, further, that bequests and devises to the state, or to any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution, are excepted from the restrictions of this section."

See St. 1917, p. 272.

The total distributable estate of the deceased, after settlement of the final account of the executors, and at the time of the entry of the decree of distribution, was $39,973.07. The specific bequests for charitable uses in the aggregate amounted to $11,300. The residue of the estate (after payment of all charges against the estate, including the specific bequests, but not including interest on bequests), amounted to $12,693.07.

The will by its terms gave to the bishop all of the residue of the estate. The court determined that this bequest to the bishop was a bequest to a charitable corporation, organized for charitable purposes, and therefore determined that the total of charitable bequests was $23,993.07.

The court further found that, since only one-third of the estate (being $13,324.36) could lawfully be devised or bequeathed to such charitable societies or corporations or persons, the bishop was only entitled to receive that part of the residue which, together with the specific charitable bequests (but exclusive of interest), did not exceed said sum of $13,324.36. This reduced the amount of the residue distributable to the bishop from the sum of $12,693.07 to the sum of $2,024.36, exclusive of interest.

The court further determined that the bequests were entitled to bear interest at 7 per cent. per annum from May 3, 1919, to December 14, 1921, on all of the legacies, including the residuary bequest. It is provided by sections 1368 and 1369 of the Civil Code that legacies are due and deliverable at the expiration of one year after the testator's decease, and that they bear interest from the time when they are due and payable (with exceptions not pertinent to this case).

Accordingly, the court by this decree of distribution awarded to the bishop, under the residuary bequest, the sum of $2,024.36, plus interest, $362.31; total, $2,386.67; and found that (after allowing also the interest on the other legacies) there remained of the residue of the estate the sum of $5,347.80.

The court being of the opinion that under section 1313, Civil Code, this remainder should go to the heirs at law, distributed said sum of $5,347.80 in equal shares to Annie McLinden, Sarah Sloan, Rosie Heaton, Theresa Fitzgerald, and Mary Fitzgerald, who were the surviving sisters and next of kin of the decedent.

[1] On the appeal of the bishop, it is contended in his behalf that the court erred in cutting down the residuary bequests to him as a corporation sole, thereby giving said undisposed of balance to decedent's sisters. It is admitted, under the authority of the Estate of Sloane, 171 Cal. 249, 152 Pac. 540, the court correctly held that, where both specific bequests and a residuary bequest are made for charitable purposes, the specific bequests must be paid in full, and the residuary bequest diminished, so as to bring the entire charitable bequests within the provisions of section 1313, Civil Code. But it is contended that paragraph 31 of the will (the residuary bequest) is not a gift to a "charitable or benevolent society or corporation or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses." The proposition of the bishop (appellant) is that—

"The Roman Catholic bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, receiving a devise and bequest to its own use and with no trust imposed by the testatrix, does not come within the purview of section 1313, Civil Code."

The language of the residuary bequests is as follows:

"I give, devise and bequeath to the Roman Catholic bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, a corporation sole, all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, whether real, personal or mixed, and wheresoever situated."

[2] It will be seen at once that the decision here depends upon the answer to the question whether or not said corporation sole is a charitable or benevolent corporation, within the meaning of section 1313, Civil Code. Said section 1313 was added to the Civil Code in the year 1874. At the time of the death of the decedent, Mrs. Fitzgerald, it had not been amended, except by an amendment made in 1917, when the last proviso was added thereto. This addition does not affect the present case.

Corporations sole are provided for by section 602 of the Civil Code. This section was enacted in 1878, and has been amended twice; once in the year 1880, and once in the year 1897. Since 1897 it has read (with omissions not material here), as follows:

"602. Religious societies may become a corporation sole. Whenever the rules, regulations, or discipline of any religious denomination, society, or church so require, for the administration of the temporalities thereof, and the management of the estate and property thereof, it shall be lawful for the bishop, chief priest, or presiding elder of such religious denomination, society, or church to become a sole corporation, in the manner prescribed in this title as nearly as may be, and with all the powers and duties, and for the uses and purposes in this title provided for religious incorporations, and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and provisions in said title prescribed.

"Every corporation sole shall, however, for the purposes of the trust, have power to contract in the same manner and to the same extent as a natural person, and may sue and be sued, and may defend, in all courts and places, in all matters and proceedings whatever, and shall have authority to borrow money, and give promissory notes therefor, and to secure the payment thereof by mortgage or other lien upon property, real or personal; to buy, sell, lease, mortgage, and in every way deal in real and personal property in the same manner that a natural person may, and without the order of any court; to receive bequests and devises for its own use or upon trusts to the same extent as natural persons may; and to appoint attorneys in fact. * * *; provided, all property held by such bishop, chief priest, or presiding elder shall be in trust for the use, purpose, and behoof of his religious denomination, society, or church. * * *

The second sentence of section 602 as above quoted was first inserted therein by the amendment of 1897.

Section 604a was added to the Civil Code in the year 1913 (St. 1913, p. 566), and amended in the year 1917 (St. 1917, p. 784). It provides for the formation of religious corporations as corporations aggregate, with boards of directors. The purposes and powers of such a corporation, as defined in the statute, are in large part the same as those of a corporation sole. But in defining the power of such a corporation to receive bequests and devises, instead of using the precise terms used in section 602 to define the same power of a corporation sole, section 604a says that a corporation organized under section 604a "may receive bequests and devises for its own use, or upon trusts, to the same extent as a natural person, subject, however, to the provisions of section thirteen hundred thirteen of the Civil Code of the state of California, and may appoint attorneys in fact."

Counsel for appellant, the bishop, points to that part of section 602, Civil Code, which gives to a corporation sole the right "to receive bequests and devises for its own use or upon trusts to the same extent as natural persons may," and argues therefrom that, since the gift in this case was to the corporation sole, without mention of any trust or trusts, the corporation is therefore entitled to receive the gift for its own use to the same extent as natural persons may, and that this right excludes from the gift the characteristics or obligations of a trust. Appellant then directs attention to the provisions of section 604a which we have quoted, and argues that the inclusion in section 604a of the proviso relating to section 1313, and its omission from section 602, amounts to a legislative declaration of intention that the corporation sole may receive a bequest or devise not subject to the limitations of section 1313; and that, since the gift in the will now under consideration does not specify any trust, therefore the gift presumably was to the corporation sole "for its own use," and for that reason should not be construed as a charitable bequest."

We think that there is no convincing force in the argument which seeks to interpret the provisions of section 602 by those of section 604a. Section 602 was in existence, and contained the clause in question, for many years before 604a was enacted. The correct interpretation of section 602, prior to the enactment of section 604a, necessarily would have been ascertained without reference to section 604a. We are of the opinion that the later enactment, relating to religious corporations having a board of directors, in which extra care was taken to specify that bequests and devises to such corporations, either for their own use, or upon trusts, are subject to the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code, is so far unrelated to the subject-matter of section 602 that it throws no light upon the intention of the Legislature in the enactment of section 602, as it stood in the year 1913 and long prior thereto.

In the decree of distribution the court found "that the Roman Catholic Church is a Christian church, organized not for profit but for religious purposes and to promote the worship of God and to administer to the spiritual needs of mankind and to bring mankind under the influence of religion, and to that end the said Roman Catholic Church follows and spreads the teachings of Jesus Christ, as expounded in the Holy Bible. That the rules, regulations, and discipline of said Roman Catholic Church having so required for the administration of the temporalities thereof and the management of the estate and property thereof in the diocese of Monterey and Los Angeles," the said corporation sole was brought into existence in the manner prescribed by law, "with all the powers and duties, and for the uses and purposes and the behoof in said title provided for religious incorporations, and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and provisions in said title prescribed, with power of succession; and that the said Roman Catholic bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, a corporation sole, holds and administers all the assets and temporalities of said Roman Catholic Church and bishop in said diocese of Monterey and Los Angeles."

A gift to a church is a charitable one, for it is well settled that a Christian church lawfully existing is a charity. A gift to a church without restrictions as to the use to be made of the property is a gift to be applied for the promotion of public worship and of religious instruction, which must necessarily influence other than church members, and has all the elements of a public charity. 5 R. C. L. p. 327, and cases there cited. Having in mind these facts and principles, we turn again to the statement in section 602, Civil Code, which gives to a corporation sole "for the purposes of the trust," power to contract, etc., as a natural person may; "to receive bequests and devises for its own use or upon trusts to the same extent as natural persons may." If the words "or upon trusts" were not there, we think that the words "for its own use" would have to be interpreted in the light of the character of the corporation as an instrumentality for the administration of the temporalities of the church. "The purposes of the trust" are those purposes having relation to the administration of the temporalities of the church. A gift to the corporation "for its own use" is in effect a gift to the church for its own use, and this is a gift for charitable purposes. This view is emphasized by the further proviso in section 602, that "all property held by such bishop, chief priest, or presiding elder shall be in trust for the use, purpose, and behoof of his religious denomination, society, or church." This leads to the further conclusion that the words "or upon trusts" refer to specific and limited trust purposes defined in the gift. This is illustrated in the present case. The will of decedent, among its specific devises and bequests, gave to the bishop the sum of $5,000, "to be used by him for the education and support of such deserving young men as the said bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles may select from the diocese of Monterey and Los Angeles, who, having the vocation for the priesthood, yet have not the necessary means to procure the required education or to support themselves during the course of studies essential as a preliminary to their education." Here there is a specific trust to the bishop for a limited purpose, a purpose for which he is directly empowered by the statute to receive the bequest. The residuary bequest, however, being not limited to a specific purpose, is one for the general use and benefit of the church within said diocese. Nevertheless, being a gift for those uses, it retains the character of a charitable bequest. As such it is subject to the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code.

[3, 4] In case No. 4190 four of the sisters of the decedent direct their appeal to that part of the decree which allowed interest on the charitable bequests, including the allowance of interest on the principal sum distributed to the bishop under the bequest to him of the residue of the estate. Section 1369 of the Civil Code, in providing that legacies bear interest from the time when they are due, makes no distinction between legacies for charitable purposes and any others. We think it is beyond question that specific charitable bequests share in the legal right to interest from and after the time when they become due. It only remains to consider whether the same rule applies to a charitable bequest of the residue of an estate.

Under ordinary circumstances, where the total amount of the charitable bequests, including the residue and interest thereon, does not exceed one-third of the distributable assets of the estate, this question would not arise. For, since the residuary legatee would receive all of the residue, it would not concern him to analyze the gift for the purpose of distinguishing part of it as interest. Nevertheless, if curiosity led to such inquiry, it may be that, under the strict reading of the statute, a part of the sum so received would be interest. In the present case, however, since there is (because of the law) an undivided or unbequeathed remainder over and above the amount which the residuary legatee may receive, it here becomes necessary to determine whether he is entitled to interest.

We think that he is entitled to the interest claimed by him and awarded by the court. The effect of the law limiting the total amount of charitable bequests to one-third of the distributable assets is that, under the facts of this case, the residuary bequest is no longer any different in its nature from a specific bequest. Construing the will, together with the statute, the so-called residuary legatee has become entitled, not to the entire residue of the estate, but only to a specific sum, leaving a residue that goes to the legal heirs because it cannot be distributed under the will. Under these circumstances, we see no valid reason why the said "residuary legatee" is not entitled to the benefit of the statute which allows interest on all legacies.

Counsel for appellant, after searching the authorities, concede that this exact question has not been passed upon in this state by any decision. They cite a few cases from which they claim that the conclusion for which they contend should be implied. Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457, 516; In re Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 611, 33 Pac. 451; Estate of Sloane, 171 Cal. 248, 152 Pac. 540. In these decisions it was held or assumed that the value of the disposable property of the estate, one-third of which may be given to charitable uses, must be fixed as of the time of distribution, because that is the time when the allowed claims against the estate, and costs of administration, have been determined and the amount of the residuum has become fixed. But it is equally true that for the same reason that is also the time when the amount of interest due can be ascertained.

[5] We agree with counsel for the residuary legatee in his contention that the right to interest is derived from the statute and not from the will. Therefore the limitation contained in section 1313 of the Civil Code, wherein it is provided that the devises or bequests contained in a will shall not collectively exceed one-third of the estate of the testator leaving legal heirs, applies to the principal only of such devises or legacies. It is not a limitation or denial of the right of any legatee of a gift for charitable purposes, to receive interest on his legacy in the same way that interest is allowed on any other legacy.

For the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that the decree of distribution is in all respects correct.

The decree is affirmed.

Ex parte SNYDER. (Cr. 1008.)

1. Criminal law — 641 (1)—Failure to allow private consultation with counsel while confined in jail held violation of constitutional rights.

Where one legally confined to jail and charged with a felony was permitted to interview his attorney only when seated opposite him at a table, with a fine mesh screen between them, such that the exchange of articles or papers was impossible, and the reading through the screen difficult, and where chairs of other persons were so close that privacy was impossible, held, that accused's constitutional right to the assistance of counsel had been violated, nor would the fact that complaint was made by the counsel, rather than accused, affect his right to relief.

2. Criminal law — 641 (1)—Counsel demanding private consultation with one confined in jail need not specify reasons or necessity therefor.

Failure to permit one confined in jail to privately consult with his counsel in the preparation of his defense cannot be excused, on the ground that counsel making the demand for a private consultation did not disclose any reason why such a hearing was desirable or necessary.

Application by Leslie G. Snyder for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Writ granted.

Ida May Adams, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and A. R. Van Cott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Application for writ of habeas corpus by petitioner, who claims that he is unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the sheriff and jailer of the county of Los Angeles. The petition shows that Leslie G. Snyder, the petitioner, is confined in the county jail of said county, charged with the commission of a felony. He admits that his detention is legal, but claims that he is unlawfully restrained of his liberty, in that he is prevented by said sheriff and jailer from privately consulting with his attorney in preparing for his defense in said action, and that he is only permitted to consult with his attorney in the presence of numerous other attorneys and clients and other persons, who, on account of their proximity, are able to overhear conversations between petitioner and his counsel, and furthermore that respondents refuse to permit petitioner to confer with his attorney, save from across a table and through a close mesh steel wire screen, through which it is impossible to clearly observe facial expressions, read or sign papers, or to do the acts necessary to be done between petitioner and his counsel in the preparation of petitioner's defense. Petitioner asks that a reasonable opportunity be afforded him to consult privately with his counsel and to prepare for his defense.

The return, after setting forth the charge upon which petitioner is held, in substance denies that petitioner has been refused permission to consult privately with his attorney or to prepare for his defense. It admits that the petitioner and all other prisoners confined in the county jail, when in consultation with their attorneys, are required to communicate with them across a table and through a wire mesh screen, between such prisoners and their attorneys, but denies that said screen is of such a character as to prevent parties conversing through the same from clearly observing one another, and alleges that such screen furnishes but slight obstruction to persons conversing through it. The return further asserts that the petitioner has personally never made any objection to the conditions under which he has been obliged to communicate with his counsel, but that the attorney of petitioner, without any demand for a fuller opportunity to communicate privately with petitioner, arbitrarily declined to communicate with him, for the sole reason that said table and said screen were between her and her client.

[1] From the evidence adduced at the hearing it appears that the table and screen were recently installed in one of the rooms of the county jail by the authorities of said county for the use of prisoners confined therein when consulting with their attorneys or visitors. The table is of sufficient length, so that eight persons can be seated on either side thereof, when the chairs are so arranged that they touch each other. There are no partitions on said table, separating the space occupied by one person from that occupied by persons on either side of him, although the evidence shows that it is the intention of the authorities to equip said tables with such partitions in the near future. The addition of such partitions will, in our opinion, greatly improve the conditions prevailing in the room at the present time. As the room is now equipped with said table and screen, there is nothing to prevent any person from seeing or hearing anything that another person sitting next to him may do or say. The screen referred to, and which separates the prisoner from the person conversing with him, does not, in our opinion, prevent a clear observation of the facial expressions of one person by the other, nor does it in any substantial manner interfere with the free conversation between the parties on either side thereof. It does, however, prevent any documents, papers, or other articles being passed through it, and, as admitted by the return, it makes it difficult to read papers through it.

While the room as now equipped with the table and screen furnishes adequate and reasonable facilities for the ordinary conversations and consultations between attorneys and their clients, it must be apparent to any one that it does not permit of that privacy that must prevail quite frequently in conferences between those accused of crime and their legal advisors. One of the constitutional rights vouchsafed to all persons under criminal charge is the right to the advice and assistance of counsel, and the opportunity to adequately prepare for their defense. This right, we submit, would be denied them if they are compelled to hold consultations with their attorneys within the hearing of others, and without any opportunity to receive, exchange, sign, examine, or read legal documents and other writings.

In a recent decision by Division 2 of this court it was held that the constitutional right of one accused of crime to the assistance of counsel carried with it the right to private consultations prior to trial for the purpose of preparing for the prisoner's defense. The court interpreted the law in the following language:

"In this state, the right of an accused to consult with his counsel is guaranteed by the Constitution, which, in section 13 of article 1, expressly declares that 'in criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to * * * appear and defend, in person and with counsel.' This clause of the Constitution unquestionably was adopted to secure to the accused person all the benefits which may flow from the employment of counsel to conduct his defense. To afford him those benefits it is essential that he should be allowed to consult with his counsel, not only during the actual trial, but prior thereto, in order to prepare for his defense. The privilege of the presence of counsel upon the trial would be a poor concession, if the right of consultation with such counsel prior to the trial were denied. It is equally essential to the enjoyment of this constitutional guaranty that the accused should have the right to a private consultation with his counsel." In re Rider, 50 Cal. App. 797, 195 Pac. 965.

It is insisted, however, by respondents, that, admitting that petitioner has the right to a private consultation with his attorney, yet no relief should be granted him in this proceeding, for the reason that no demand was ever made by him or by his attorney for a private hearing, other than that which would be offered by the room above mentioned. On this point there was a conflict in the testimony produced at the hearing. For the purpose of this proceeding we are assuming that such a demand was made. There was not only evidence to this effect, but the jailer testified that no other room or place had been provided by the authorities wherein private consultations could be held by attorneys and clients. It is true that one witness testified that he, as an attorney representing a prisoner confined in said jail, had demanded and was furnished a place in which he could and did hold a private consultation with his client; but we gather from the whole evidence before the court that this was an exceptional case, and that no such general privilege is accorded to the prisoners confined in said jail, and that no provision had been made by the authorities for any place where such a private consultation could be held. It is also true that petitioner personally made no demand for a private hearing; the only claim being that such a demand was made by his attorney. It is to be presumed that his attorney was better informed as to the necessity for such a hearing than the client himself. The attorney was intrusted with the defense of the prisoner. She spoke for her client, and her demand was not only for the interest of her client, but was the demand of the client himself. As long as the attorney was in charge of the case and responsible for the result thereof, her judgment in such matters should prevail over that of the client; otherwise, the client would need no attorney, and the attorney would be of no assistance to the client.

[2] It was suggested at the hearing that, admitting the attorney made demand for a private consultation, yet those in charge of the jail were not in duty bound to grant said demand, as the attorney gave no reason why such a hearing was desirable or necessary.

We cannot agree with this suggestion. No attorney should be compelled to disclose to any person any fact which would directly or indirectly affect the defense of his client. To require the attorney to give to the officer in charge of the jail, the reason why he desired a private consultation with his client might in some cases lead to the disclosure of information of vital importance to the client, the knowledge of which should be confined to the client and to those to whom he voluntarily communicates the same. Furthermore, to require the attorney to give to the officer in charge the reason why he desires a private interview with his client would, by inference at least, give such officer the power to determine whether such reasons were sufficient or not to grant such interview. For what purpose would it serve to give to the officer the right to demand the reason for a private interview, if he is to grant it, whether or not the reason given appealed to him to be sufficient? To adopt such a rule would be to substitute the judgment of the officer, upon questions involving the prisoner's defense, in the place of the judgment of the prisoner and his counsel.

From the return and evidence herein, it is apparent that the purpose of equipping said room with said table and screen and requiring all conversation between prisoners in said jail and their attorneys to be carried on through said screen, was to prevent the passing into said jail of narcotics, weapons, and other articles forbidden by the authorities. We fully appreciate the difficult task of the officers in their efforts to discharge their duty in this respect, and it is not the desire of this court to interfere or hamper them in this commendable work. At the same time, we all realize that official duty, grave and important as it is, must be performed in subordination to the constitutional rights of others. We are fully persuaded that some plan can be provided by the authorities which will adequately protect the county jail from the introduction therein of such articles as may be forbidden, and at the same time not intrench upon the right of those confined therein to every privilege accorded them by the laws of our state.

It is ordered that respondents, W. I. Traeger, sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and Mark Bailey, jailer of said county, be and they are hereby ordered and directed, upon request of petitioner or his counsel, and at all reasonable times, to permit petitioner to consult privately with his attorney in such place and under such circumstances as will afford reasonable opportunity for absolute privacy of consultation.

McKISSICK CATTLE CO. v. ANDERSON et al. (Civ. 2590.)

62 Cal. App. 558

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 16, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨681 — Discretionary permission to amend a complaint not in record not reviewable.

Where the original complaint is not in the record, it is impossible to determine whether the court abused its discretion in permitting an amendment thereof.

2. Pleading ⇨236(6) — Allowance of amendment to complaint not changing cause of action, but curing demurrable complaint, not abuse of discretion.

In an action to determine riparian water rights and enjoin illegal appropriation, allowance of an amendment to the complaint merely adding "during the irrigation season" following the words "each and every year," the sole purpose being to show continuous usage through that season, was not an abuse of discretion, even if the original complaint failing to plead riparian rights correctly was subject to general demurrer; the amendment not changing the cause of action or stating a new one.

3. Pleading ⇨236(7) — Refusal of proposed answer on day of trial where new matter would delay trial within court's discretion.

In an action to determine water rights, denial of a motion made on the day of trial to file an answer setting up the right to condemn and appropriate the water to a public use, under Code Civ. Proc. § 534, as added by St. 1917, p. 744, was not an abuse of discretion, since the answer would add new issues requiring plaintiff to postpone or go to trial insufficiently prepared.

4. Pleading ⇨420(2) — Counsel's admission that denial of motion to file answer would not harm defendant is waiver of objections.

In an action to determine water rights, counsel for defendant, on motion to file a new answer by admitting that a condemnation suit involving practically the same issues was then pending, and that he would not be harmed by refusal of amendment, thereby waived his right to object to the denial of his motion.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8) — Evidence held insufficient to support claim to prior appropriation of stream water to definite amount.

In the absence of any showing as to when defendants and their predecessors, the upper riparian owners, acquired title, where plaintiff's right to appropriate stream water is not statutory, mere proof that plaintiff's predecessor 25 years prior to the action built certain dams and canals appropriating certain quantities of water, the testimony as to the exact measurement of such water being mere guesses of inexperienced witnesses, does not sustain a finding that plaintiff had appropriated 2,000 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure.

6. Waters and water courses ☞130—Lower riparian owner cannot acquire prescriptive rights in water against upper owner.

A lower riparian proprietor cannot acquire either by prescription or appropriation as against an upper riparian owner the waters from a stream to which their respective lands are riparian.

7. Waters and water courses ☞152(8)—Evidence held sufficient to show riparian use of stream water.

Testimony of many witnesses long familiar with a stream tending to show continuous user by plaintiff for irrigation purposes for 25 years held sufficient to prove plaintiff's riparian use, and hence the right to the normal flow of the stream, despite proof of the construction of a county road across it; such obstruction not being due to any act of defendants.

8. Waters and water courses ☞152(8) — Facts held to negative acquiescence in diverting stream waters.

Evidence that plaintiff at all times asserted its rights to stream waters by removing obstructions and opening gates of defendant's reservoir to allow the water to return to the creek held to negative acquiescence in defendant's use of the stream.

9. Trial ☞47(2)—Exclusion of offer of evidence subject to renewal held not error.

Where defendant's attorney, at the court's suggestion to wait until he opened his defense, withdrew an offer of a complaint and judgment in a former action between the same parties, counsel failing to renew his offer or press the matter further, the court's ruling is not error.

10. Witnesses ☞379(7), 389 — Impeachment of witness by complaint in former action between same parties.

In the absence of any showing that it would shed light on the issues, a complaint in a former action between the same parties is admissible only to impeach a witness by first showing the witness himself personally responsible for the allegations of fact, that it contained statements inconsistent with the material testimony given by him in the present case, and that he denied making such statements or authorizing them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; Geo. H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the McKissick Cattle Company against August Anderson and others, to determine water rights. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed as to appropriation and affirmed as to riparian rights.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, and Grover C. Julian, of Susanville, for appellants.

N. J. Barry, of Susanville, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff is a corporation, and has for many years been engaged in the business of raising cattle in Lassen county, and owns a body of land, consisting of 1,280 acres, upon which it has for many years raised and harvested hay and pastured cattle. The climate and the lands in the immediate neighborhood of those owned by the plaintiff, and just referred to, are arid, and it is, of course, conceded that grasses suitable for making hay cannot be grown upon said lands without irrigation.

It appears from the complaint, the evidence, and the findings that the lands of the plaintiff constitute what is known as a sink, and has been formed largely through the emptying and spreading thereon of the waters of a certain mountain stream known as Red Rock creek. This creek has its source on the west side of what is known as the "Warner range of mountains." It flows in a general southeasterly direction to, over, and across certain lands known as the "Moulton meadows," and thence to, over, and across the said lands of the plaintiff. Red Rock creek is one of the characteristic mountain streams which are sometimes known as "flash" creeks, whereby it is meant that the volume of water is variable, and regulated according to the character of the winters with respect to the amount of snow falling upon the mountains feeding that and other creeks or the watersheds of the localities through and over which they flow. In other words, the waters flowing into said creek are mainly from melting snow, produced, of course by the rise of the climatic temperature incident to the spring and summer seasons.

It appears from the evidence and the findings that, when the waters from Red Rock creek reach the lands of the plaintiff, they spread out and divide into many channels, and later converge in a solid body and overflow the said lands. These lands, it may be added, are naturally hard, slick, and unproductive, and crack so as to produce large fissures therein. The spreading of the water from Red Rock creek over the sink causes silt to be deposited therein which fills the fissures, and, indeed, which has formed the soil of said sink. It appears from the evidence that many years before the plaintiff became the owner of the sink its predecessors in interest, by means of small dams in the channels and the construction of ditches leading from said creek, caused the waters thereof to extend over a large body of arid land adjacent to the sink, and so increased the area of the sink until it consisted of a body of 1,280 acres of land. Said creek, if the winter season has been propitious for that purpose, carries a large volume of water in the spring and summer months, diminishing in volume, however, as the season advances.

At a point on Red Rock creek, between the Moulton meadows and the McKissick sink, there is maintained, and had been for a number of years, a reservoir known as reservoir

No. 1. It seems that this reservoir was originally constructed by the Union Land & Live Stock Company, a corporation, which had been given a permit by the general government to construct and maintain the same for the purpose of storing water. This company, however, lost its right to the reservoir site, and the defendant Anderson thereafter acquired said right from the government of the United States to store water in said reservoir. Below said reservoir is a diversion dam (which is referred to in the evidence as reservoir No. 2), the purpose of which was to divert the water from the channel of Red Rock creek into a reservoir designated and known as reservoir No. 3. There is evidence to show that the water stored in the last-mentioned reservoir is taken from the watershed of Red Rock creek and that said water is never returned to the creek or to lands that drain into the creek, and after its storage, therefore, said water is entirely lost to the land riparian to or within said watershed, including the lands of the plaintiff, which are described in the complaint and known as the McKissick sink. It appears that the defendant Anderson has for a number of years caused reservoir No. 3 to be stored with water, and has thus prevented the waters of Red Rock creek from proceeding in their natural flow to the said lands of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, through its agents, has for many years prior to the commencement of this action caused the gates of the reservoir to be opened, and any dams which were maintained in the creek to divert the waters thereof from flowing in their natural course to be destroyed, so as to facilitate the flow of the stream to its lands. This conduct upon the part of the plaintiff was based upon its claim that the waters of said creek and the watershed thereof are riparian to the lands described in the complaint, and that no one has the right to molest in any way the usual or normal flow of the stream before it reaches the lands of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff in its complaint pleads a right by appropriation to a flow of the waters from said creek over and upon lands described in the complaint to the extent of 2,000 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure, and also sets up the right to the waters of said creek as a riparian owner.

The answer specifically denies all of the material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition thereto, among other things, alleges, in effect, that the waters which reach the lands of the plaintiff described in the complaint come not alone from Red Rock creek, but also from Buckhorn creek, Painter creek, and Cold Spring creek; that only about one-third of the water flowing upon the lands of the plaintiff comes from Red Rock creek. A supplemental or amended answer was filed, and therein it was alleged, among other things:

That there have been stored in reservoir No. 1 for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action waters diverted from said Red Rock creek, and used for the irrigation of lands within the Red Rock Creek irrigation district, and more particularly for the irrigation of the lands of the defendant August Anderson; that said waters have not reached the lands of the plaintiff; "that during all of said time, the said plaintiff had knowledge that a right adverse to its right had been claimed, and had stood by and had seen the said August Anderson develop his lands and cultivate the same, and plant the same to crops, depending for the irrigation thereof upon the waters stored in said reservoir and diverted for the use thereof, and that the said plaintiff is now estopped to question the right of said August Anderson, and of the other residents of said Red Rock Creek irrigation district, and of the Red Rock Creek irrigation district, to divert all of the water of said Red Rock creek, or to store the same and thereafter divert the same so far as they may be necessary for the irrigation of the lands within said Red Rock irrigation district."

The answer, as it was originally framed and filed, referred to no lands upon which any of the defendants claimed the right to use the water of said creek. It transpired, however, that the defendant Anderson, while the trial was in progress, became the assignee and owner by purchase of a contract between one T. F. Dunaway, the owner at the time of the making of said contract of all or a portion of Moulton meadows, and one Dana C. Dodge, whereby the former sold to the latter 440 acres of said Moulton ranch, of which 200 acres are conceded to be riparian to said Red Rock creek. Upon his application said Anderson was permitted to so amend his complaint as to set up the riparian right to said 200 acres.

The court found:

That the 1,280 acres of land described in the complaint, and comprising what is known as the McKissick sink, were riparian to Red Rock creek; that the plaintiff, as a prior appropriator, was entitled to "take and divert from the waters of said creek for the irrigation of its lands all of the waters of said creek up to 2,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, from the 1st day of March of each year until said creek ceases to flow any water, or as long as said creek will flow during the year," and that whatever rights the defendants and each of them claim to said waters are "subordinate, subservient, and subsequent to the right of the plaintiff," as such prior appropriator.

The court also found:

"That the defendant Anderson is the owner of certain lands consisting of 440 acres in section 21, township 35 north, range 16 east, which said lands are the same lands described in an agreement to sell made by one T. F. Dunaway to Dana C. Dodge, and by said Dodge assigned to said Anderson; that of said 440 acres 200 acres in the north half of said section 21 are riparian to said Red Rock creek, and that said Red Rock creek flows through and over and upon said 200 acres, and the same are susceptible to and can be irrigated from the said Red Rock creek, and that such irrigation is necessary for the raising of crops upon said 200 acres; that there never has been any use of the water of said Red Rock creek by any of the defendants which was continuous, open, uninterrupted, adverse, and under claim of right of either of them to the plaintiff, and that none of the defendants have ever acquired any adverse right or right by prescription as against plaintiff to the waters of said stream; * * * that the plaintiff never waived its right to the waters of said stream, or acquiesced in any use thereof by the defendants, or either of them, and that defendants were never misled in the building of any reservoirs or canals or their attempted use of the waters of said stream by any act or conduct or word or deed of the plaintiff, or any of the grantors of the plaintiff."

Other essential facts were found, among which were these:

That with the aid of irrigation from Red Rock creek the lands of plaintiff, described in the complaint, were capable of producing large quantities of hay and grasses; that in every year when Red Rock creek carried a heavy or large volume of water the plaintiff, by the use of said water, flooded its said lands, and as a result thereof produced large quantities of hay and pastureage; that said lands are of an "open and porous" character, and would not produce any hay whatever, or even pastureage to the extent that it could advantageously be utilized without the same being flooded during the irrigating seasons; that "in the early part of the year 1920 plaintiff had standing and growing upon said lands large quantities of hay, and grasses for pasture, and was depending upon the water of said stream for the irrigation of said crops, and that in the early part of the said year 1920 defendants willfully, wrongfully, unlawfully, and without the consent of plaintiff entered upon the channel of said stream at a point above the lands of plaintiff, * * * and without the consent of plaintiff closed a dam in the channel of said stream, and willfully, * * * and without the consent of plaintiff, obstructed the flow of all the waters of said stream," and that the defendants Anderson and Red Rock creek irrigation district threatened to continue so to maintain said dam and obstruct the flow and divert the waters away from the lands of plaintiff, "and beyond and outside the watershed of said stream," etc.

The decree follows the findings in all essential particulars, and, besides declaring the respective rights of the parties in and to the waters of Red Rock creek, awards as against the defendants the injunctive relief prayed for by the plaintiff.

This appeal is prosecuted by the defendants from said judgment upon a record made up according to the alternative method.

[1, 2] The point first made by the appellants is that the court erred by its action in allowing the plaintiff to amend its complaint. The amendment was made before the actual trial of the action began. The original complaint is not in the record, and it is therefore impossible for us to determine whether the court abused its discretion in permitting the amendment thereof. Counsel for defendants state in their brief, which statement is, of course, dehors the record, that the plaintiff, in its original complaint, did not "correctly plead riparian rights," and that the amendment was designed to correct the deficiency of the complaint in that respect. The record shows that, when the discussion as to the proposed amendment was under way before the court, Mr. Barry, attorney for plaintiff, stated, "The only purpose of offering this amended complaint was to show they used it [the water from Red Rock creek] continuously through the irrigation season;" that the amendment merely resulted in inserting after or immediately following the words "each and every year," as those words were used in the original complaint, the words "during the irrigation season." Accepting these statements as a correct representation of the extent of the amendment of the original complaint, it is clear that it cannot be said that there was an abuse of discretion in allowing the amendment. But, even if it be true that the original complaint failed to "correctly plead riparian rights," it would involve no abuse of discretion, abstractly speaking, to allow an amendment of such pleading so that it would plead such rights "correctly." Such an amendment, under such circumstances, would not have the effect of changing the cause of action or stating a new one. The statement that a certain fact is "not correctly pleaded" implies that an attempt of some character to plead it has been made, and, even if a pleading unavailingly attempts to plead a fact properly, and is for that reason subject to the objection of a general demurrer, it would not involve an abuse of discretion for the court to allow the pleader so to amend his complaint as to make it state a cause of action, if it was in any circumstances capable of being so changed or amended as to state a case for the relief demanded.

[3, 4] The next point made by the defendants is that the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant Red Rock creek irrigation district to file an answer under section 534 of the Code of Civil Procedure, added to said Code by the Legislature of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 744), whereby and wherein it set up the right to condemn and so appropriate to a public use so much of the waters flowing in Red Rock creek as were not required by the plaintiff for its actual and necessary beneficial uses. There was no abuse of discretion in disallowing the proposed answer to be filed. The motion to file the answer was made on the day on which the action was called for trial. The filing thereof would have added to the case new issues of a nature requiring either a postponement of the trial or the plaintiff to go to trial without preparation for meeting those new issues. Moreover, it appeared from the colloquy between court and counsel following the proposal to file said answer that a condemnation suit brought by the said defendant, and involving precisely the same water rights, was, at the time of the application to file the answer, pending in the superior court of Lassen county, and counsel for the defendant admitted before the court that the said defendant corporation would not be harmed by a refusal to allow the answer to be filed. In fact, counsel for the defendants in effect waived any objection to the ruling of the court declining to allow the answer to be filed.

[5] As to the decision, it is contended by the defendants that the evidence does not support either the finding that the plaintiff has a right by appropriation to the waters of Red Rock creek to the extent of 2,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, or the finding that the lands described in the complaint are riparian to said creek. We have painstakingly read and examined all the evidence presented by the record before us, and thus we have satisfied ourselves that, as to the finding of plaintiff's alleged right to the waters of Red Rock creek by appropriation, the contention of the defendants must be sustained, but that there is ample evidence to support the finding that the lands described in the complaint are riparian to Red Rock creek, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to the benefit of the normal flow of said creek to the lands described in the complaint.

It is not pretended that the right claimed by the plaintiff to the waters of Red Rock creek by appropriation is based upon the statutory provisions as to the appropriation of the waters of the public streams of the state. The contention is that, many years ago, long before the defendants or their predecessors in interest acquired from the government title to any of the lands which they now claim are riparian to said creek, or claimed the right to the use of any of the waters thereof by virtue of appropriation, and before any of the defendants or their predecessors became riparian proprietors in so far as the waters of said creek are concerned, the plaintiff appropriated from said creek, and has uninterruptedly used the same during all the years referred to since that time, the 2,000 inches of water which the court found it was entitled to by virtue of the right of appropriation. There is some evidence to the effect that about 25 years before the commencement of the present action the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff, by means of dams and small canals, did appropriate for the use of the lands described in the complaint certain quantities of the water flowing in Red Rock creek. As to the quantity of water so appropriated, the evidence is indeed very unsatisfactory. There is no pretense that any measurement, scientific or otherwise, was ever made of the water so appropriated. The witnesses, testifying as to the quantity of water so alleged to have been appropriated, merely ventured guesses as to such quantity of water. None of said witnesses pretended to be experienced in such matters and each merely gave his conclusion as to the matter from his power of general observation. But the principal obstacle in the way of the upholding of the finding as to the alleged appropriation is that there is no testimony showing when the defendants or their predecessors in interest acquired title to the lands which they claim are riparian to the waters of said creek. Obviously, if the defendants or their predecessors in interest acquired title to the lands to which they claim the waters of Red Rock creek are riparian before the plaintiff made the appropriation which it claims here, then such appropriation cannot prevail or be maintained as against the riparian rights of the defendants as upper riparian proprietors.

[6] It is so well settled that authorities need not be cited to confirm the statement that a lower riparian proprietor cannot acquire either by prescription or by appropriation as against the upper riparian owner the waters from a stream to which their respective lands are riparian. We will, however, cite these cases as supporting this proposition: Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 140, et seq., 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Pyramid Land & Stock Co. v. Scott, 51 Cal. App. 634, 197 Pac. 398.

[7] It is not necessary to present herein a résumé of the evidence which supports the finding that the lands of the plaintiff which are described in the complaint are riparian to Red Rock creek. It is sufficient to say that a large number of witnesses testified that said creek has had for many years a well-defined channel passing over and through the Moulton meadows, and thence to said lands of the plaintiff. Some of these witnesses stated that they had been familiar with the creek for upwards of 25 years, and declared that the channel thereof from the Moulton meadows to the McKissick sink was of sufficient depth and width to carry a sufficient volume of water to flood the said sink in the irrigation season, and thus cause it to produce bountiful harvests of hay and large quantities of pasturage. It is true that the testimony shows that the county built a county road across said creek at a point between Moulton meadows and the sink, and that thus the flow of the creek to the lands of plaintiff was for a time obstructed. But this was obviated by ditching around that portion of the road crossing the creek, and so causing the water to flow on in its natural course to the sink. This obstruction was not, obviously, due to any act of the defendants or any of them. It did not involve the exercise on their part of any right that they might have claimed to stop the normal flow of the creek to the sink for the purpose of diverting it to their own uses. If the plaintiff had any complaint to make against anybody for said obstruction it was against the county, and not against the defendants.

[8] The contention that the plaintiff is estopped from claiming the rights to the waters in Red Rock creek because of its alleged acquiescence in the use of said waters by the defendant Anderson and his predecessors in interest cannot be sustained. The evidence clearly shows, as we have above pointed out, that the plaintiff at all times asserted its right to said waters by removing from time to time any obstructions which were placed in the stream to prevent the waters from flowing to its lands, and by opening the gates of the reservoir so as to allow the waters therein stored to return to the creek.

As to the defendants other than the defendant Anderson, it appears that they have or claimed no interest at the time of the bringing of this action and at the time of the trial in the waters of Red Rock creek. The brief of counsel for the defendant so states, and further declares:

"The Red Rock Creek irrigation district includes the lands farmed by Anderson, and proposes to acquire the right to use the waters of Red Rock creek, and the other defendants (Eneboe and Pefley) are directors of the district. It is not contended that they have ever diverted, used, or exercised control over the water of the creek."

In fact, on the close of plaintiff's case counsel for the defendants moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiff failed to establish "any action entitling them to an injunction or damage against" said defendants. The motion was denied, not upon the ground that said defendants had been shown by the plaintiff ever to have been in any way concerned in preventing the waters of the creek from flowing to the lands of the plaintiff, but upon the ground that, since this is an action to quiet title, and said defendants were charged in the complaint with claiming some rights in the waters of the creek, and did not in their answer deny that charge, it was upon them to show in their defense, if they could, any claim that they might have to said waters which were superior to that of the plaintiff. It will thus be seen that, according to counsel for the defendants, the real controversy was between the plaintiff and the defendant Anderson, and, as to the latter, the court, as seen, found and decreed that he was a riparian owner of so much of the waters in the creek as were necessary to irrigate the 200 acres out of the 440 acres of the Moulton meadows which he acquired through the taking over of the agreement of sale of said land from one Dodge.

[9, 10] The defendants complain that the court erred in refusing to permit them to introduce in evidence the complaint filed in an action brought in the superior court of Lassen county by the plaintiff against the defendant Anderson on the 14th day of July, 1915, and also an order or judgment by said court dismissing said action. This record was offered in evidence in connection with the cross-examination of the plaintiff's principal witness, F. R. Enyart, who, for a period of 25 years, was familiar with the lands described in the complaint, and for 18 years in active management of said lands and the cattle-raising business of plaintiff on said and adjacent lands. The pertinency of the proposed proof in connection with the cross-examination of Enyart is not apparent from the record; but it is stated in the brief of defendants that "it was material both to test his accuracy and to find the scope of his information." There was no objection to this testimony by counsel for the plaintiff, but the court suggested to counsel for the defendants that it would be more regular to postpone the offer to introduce the complaint and the order referred to until they opened their defense, whereupon the witness interrupted to say, in effect, that all he knew about said action was what had been told him about it, to which statement counsel for the defendants replied that they did not want him to state what he "understood," but what he actually knew about the action. The matter was not thereafter brought up or further pressed by counsel for the defendants. It is clear that the ruling was not erroneous. The complaint in said action is not in the record here, and therefore we are afforded no enlightenment on what its averments were or whether in any view it would reflect any light on the issues involved in this action. Indeed, we know of no way in which the complaint could pertinently be received into this record except by way of impeachment, and so by first showing that the witness himself was personally responsible for its allegations of fact, that the pleading contained statements inconsistent with the material testimony given by him in the present case, and that he denied making such statements or authorizing them to be made.

In accordance with the foregoing views, so much of the judgment appealed from as awards the plaintiff, as an appropriator of the waters of Red Rock creek, "the use of all the waters of said creek up to 2,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and measured at a point where the channel of said stream enters the lands of plaintiff, from the 1st day of March of each year for so long a time as said waters will flow to the lands of plaintiff for the irrigation of the crops growing thereon," etc., is reversed, and the remaining portion of said judgment, establishing the respective rights of the plaintiff and the defendant Anderson as riparian proprietors to the waters of Red Rock creek, and granting the injunctive relief as prayed for in the complaint, in so far as such relief applies to the riparian rights of the plaintiff, is affirmed.

VANDERBUSH v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES
et al. (Civ. 3822.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 5, 1923.)

1. Evidence ⇨28—Judicial notice of law prior to taking effect held impossible.

Judicial notice cannot be taken of any law until it takes effect, because until then it has no existence.

2. Evidence ⇨32—Superior court cannot judicially notice unpleaded ordinance before finally effective.

The superior court cannot take judicial notice of an unpleaded city ordinance one day before it takes effect, even though approved by the mayor and ordered published.

3. Mandamus ⇨168(4)—Affirmative allegation of a legal ordinance, held not proved.

Where the board of public works, in answer to an application for a writ to compel issuance of a building permit, pleaded a zoning ordinance, prohibiting erection of the building contemplated, but not taking effect until one day after this case was heard, petitioner's testimony showing that he had been fully informed of the contents of the ordinance, that he had been handed a copy, etc., held insufficient to prove legality of the ordinance as pleaded in the answer, since petitioner did not admit that the ordinance was legally binding on him.

4. Mandamus ⇨165—Affirmative allegations of answer taken as true if not demurrable.

On application for a writ of mandate, affirmative allegations of the answer, if not demurrable, are to be taken as true unless they are countervailed by petitioner's proof.

5. Mandamus ⇨165—Answer pleading legality of ordinance not yet effective not taken as true because too speculative.

On application for a writ compelling issuance of a building permit, though affirmative allegations in the answer, if not demurrable, are taken as true, an answer predicting that an ordinance "now being duly published" would take effect on a future date involves too great uncertainty, since many things might still happen to prevent the measure from becoming law.

6. Mandamus ⇨187(9)—Appeal judgment limited to facts before trial court.

On appeal from a denial of a writ of mandate to compel issuance of a building permit, the appellate court pronounces judgment only upon facts before the trial court at the time its judgment was rendered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by R. H. Vanderbush against the Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles and others, to require issuance of a building permit. From a judgment for defendants, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., and Philip Sterry, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This proceeding was instituted in the superior court for the purpose of procuring the issuance of a writ of mandate. The petition, which was filed November 16, 1921, alleges that petitioner, being desirous of constructing a five-unit bungalow court upon certain property in the city of Los Angeles, had made application to defendant board of public works for a permit to make the improvement, and that the application was denied. Immediately after the filing of the petition, and on the day upon which it was filed, the court issued its alternative writ of mandate requiring defendant board to issue the permit or to show cause for its failure to do so. Defendant board did not issue the permit, but on November 28, 1921, filed its answer to the petition for the writ. The answer alleges, in connection with certain denials of averments of the petition:

That the property upon which petitioner proposed to construct the bungalow court is located in a certain designated portion of Los Angeles; "that said portion * * * is a highly improved residential district, and is improved with many expensive single family dwellings; * * *" that "on or about the 18th day of October, 1921, the council * * * of Los Angeles duly and regularly enacted and adopted an ordinance, being Ordinance No. 42666 (new series), which ordinance provides generally for the zoning of said city, and in particular has created the district wherein" petitioner's property "is located as a zone wherein none but single family dwellings may be erected, constructed, and maintained, said zone being in said ordinance designated as zone A; * * * that said ordinance was thereafter approved by the mayor of * * * Los Angeles, and that the same is now being duly published * * * as provided by the charter of * * * Los Angeles, and will become effective November 29, 1921. * * *"

Here followed certain other affirmative allegations which it is not necessary to repeat. The proceeding came on for hearing November 28, 1921, which, it will be observed, was the day before ordinance No. 42666 was to take effect, according to the allegations of the answer. The hearing was concluded on the same day, and on that day the trial court made its order or judgment discharging the alternative writ of mandate and denying the issuance of a peremptory writ. Petitioner appeals.

[1, 2] The judgment of the trial court appears to have been based upon the affirmative allegations of the answer which are set forth above. At any rate, respondents defend the judgment upon that theory. Appellant concedes that there was no evidence before the court which would have supported a finding that those allegations were true, particularly those concerning ordinance No. 42666. Respondent's insistence is, in the first place, the ordinance not having been introduced in evidence, that the trial court must have taken and did properly take judicial notice of its provisions. This position clearly is untenable. Granting, for the moment, that the superior courts may take judicial notice of the terms of city ordinances as laws, they cannot take such notice before such ordinances take effect. Nor does this statement apply peculiarly to city ordinances. It is trite to assert that the courts can take judicial notice of the existence of no law before it has an existence. When the trial court heard and decided this proceeding, Ordinance No. 42666, so called, was not an ordinance, if, indeed, it ever became one. Its provisions, therefore, cannot, under the law of judicial notice, afford any support to the judgment.

[3] Respondent makes the contention, also, that there is evidence in the record which proves the allegations of the answer concerning the "ordinance," and refers to certain testimony of appellant. That testimony was to the effect that when he got ready to commence work on his proposed improvement appellant "could not get the permit, on account of the zoning ordinance going into effect"; that when he referred to the zoning ordinance going into effect he meant "an ordinance which is referred to in the answer of respondent here, which has not yet gone into effect"; that he "became somewhat familiar * * * with the so-called Zone Ordinance that was enacted by the city of Los Angeles recently" when he "went to the city hall to apply for a permit"; that "they" then handed him "a copy of the ordinance of the zoning commission." We can perceive nothing in this testimony which in the slightest degree tended to prove any of the provisions of the so-called Ordinance No. 42666. For appellant to say that he could not obtain the desired permit on account of the going into effect of the ordinance referred to in the answer was not, surely, for him to testify that the legal effect of the ordinance was as alleged in that pleading. Neither from this statement, nor from anything else testified to by appellant, could the trial court have found that the provisions of the "ordinance" were as alleged in the answer. Moreover, the testimony of appellant is subject to the comment which we have already passed upon the matter of the contention that the trial court could have taken judicial notice of the contents of the "ordinance." Indeed upon the score of difference in degree, if not in kind, that comment may be broadened. The trial court was asked to take judicial notice of the "ordinance" one day before it became an ordinance. Appellant's knowledge of the contents of the proposed measure, if any he had, appears to have been derived from an "ordinance of the zoning commission," not of the council, which was handed him two weeks before ordinance 42666 was to take effect according to the answer, for his petition for the writ of mandate was filed on November 16, 1921. On the whole, it would be going far to assert that appellant's testimony showed anything as to the contents of any ordinance in effect as an enactment of the council of the city of Los Angeles.

[4, 5] There is a point which would lead to an affirmance of the judgment if it could be said that the new matter pleaded in the answer states a defense. In a proceeding for the writ of mandate affirmative allegations of the answer, if not demurrable, are to be taken as true unless they are countervailed by proof presented by the petitioner. McClatchy v. Matthews, 135 Cal. 274, 67 Pac. 134. Is a defense stated by the affirmative matter in the answer now before us? We think not. In the maze of uncertainties incident to this mundane existence no man may predict with success that any particular event will happen at any time in the future, unless the fact that it will occur at a certain moment is within the domain of scientific knowledge, as, for instance, that an eclipse of the sun will transpire in Southern California on September 10, 1923. The pleader in actions in the courts labors under the same disability. He may not predict the occurrence of events the happening of which is involved in uncertainty. Whether Ordinance No. 42666 so called, would take effect on November 29, 1921, or at any other time, could not be foretold. To illustrate the situation, a peculiar allegation of the answer may be examined. It is averred that the proposed measure "is now being duly published." Surely nothing can be said as to whether the publication of a proposed ordinance has been duly made until after the time of the publication has run and the facts surrounding the publication are examined under the law. In the present instance notwithstanding the allegations of the answer, it may have happened that the publication was not duly made, and that the proposed measure did not go into operation for that reason; at least not on November 29, 1921. Further, some means may have been found by which the "ordinance" was prevented from going into operation by the courts. In short, the new matter in the answer is but a prediction, and not an allegation of fact.

[6] Respondents are solicitous lest a reversal of the judgment may lead to a requisition upon respondent board to perform acts which by the ordinances of the city it is now forbidden to perform. We trust such an outcome may not follow. It is to be understood, of course, that we pronounce judgment only upon the facts before the trial court at the time its judgment was rendered. As respondents showed no excuse for the refusal to grant to appellant the permit which he sought, the judgment of the trial court cannot stand. If, however, there are at present in existence any grounds upon which it may be claimed that respondent board may not now be required to grant the permit, the trial court will doubtless discover means whereby respondents may have a bearing upon them.

Judgment reversed.

1. Municipal corporations ⚡418—Waters and water courses ⚡183(1)—City of sixth class empowered under Public Utilities Act of 1913 to purchase waterworks system and assess property therefor.

Under Public Utilities Act of 1913, a city of the sixth class could purchase a water supply system and levy an assessment on the property of property owners within the city to procure the purchase money.

Assessments to defray the cost of local improvements are not ordinarily taxes levied for the purpose of sustaining the government, but are charges impressed on individual property because that property receives a special benefit which is different from the general one which the owner enjoys in common with other citizens as such, and Public Utilities Act of 1913, authorizing a city of sixth class to purchase an established waterworks system and limiting the cost thereof to real estate to the exclusion of personal property, is not invalid as taking private property without compensation or without due process, nor did it lack uniformity in not being levied against every character of property alike.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Santa Clara Valley Land Company against Arthur Meehan, as City Marshal and ex officio Tax Collector of the City of San Bruno. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry J. McKannay, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. A. Mason, City Atty., of San Bruno, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to restrain and enjoin defendant as an officer of the city of San Bruno from selling certain property of the plaintiff, under an assessment levied for the purpose of acquiring a municipal water system.

A demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and it was adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by its complaint, and that defendant recover his costs. This is an appeal from the judgment.

The complaint recites that the city of San Bruno is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, organized and existing under the Municipal Government Act (St. 1883, p. 93 as amended) and that defendant Meehan is its city marshal and ex officio tax collector; that plaintiff is the owner of a number of parcels of land situate therein and is a taxpayer of said city; that prior to the 26th day of May, 1920, the San Bruno water system, a privately owned corporation, supplied the municipality and its inhabitants with water; that on the last-mentioned day the board of trustees of the city passed its resolution of intention to acquire the water system, and thereafter the city engineer made and presented to the trustees his report pursuant to the resolution, which report contained all the necessary data upon the subject; that proceedings were thereupon had under which an assessment district was established in conformity with the report, the area including every lot of land situated in the city, as shown upon the records, and such lots were assessed for the acquisition of the water supply; that subsequently defendant caused to be published a notice of sale of the property within the district upon which the assessment had become delinquent, and thereafter he sold the same for the amount due under the assessment. It is then charged that defendant will, unless enjoined, execute and deliver to the purchasers deeds to the property so sold in conformity with his certificates of sale.

There is no dispute concerning the regularity of the proceedings leading up to the purchase, but in seeking relief from the effect of the assessment appellant assails the validity of the improvement, contending that, as his property already enjoys the advantage of the existing privately owned water distributing system, no benefit whatever is derived by it under the sale of such system to the municipality, and that its acquisition, therefore, does not constitute an improvement justifying an assessment. It is further contended that, in so far as the Public Utilities Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 421) purports to authorize the purchase of existing waterworks and to assess the costs thereof against real property to the exclusion of personal property, it is unconstitutional and void.

[1] It is conceded that the trustees would, under the act, have the authority they have here exercised if the levy was for the original construction of such a system. The precise question here involved was presented and passed upon in the case of Kane v. Wedell, 54 Cal. App. 516, 202 Pac. 340. It is there held that the original construction of reservoirs and necessary appliances requisite to the creation of a municipal water system is such a public improvement as to come within the terms of the act in question. It is further held that there is no real distinction between the original construction of such a system by a municipality and its acquisition after its construction by private parties, in so far as the nature of the work as a public improvement is concerned, since the same effect is accomplished in either case, namely, that of providing the municipality with a publicly owned improvement which it did not possess before. It is there pointed out that the title of the act indicates that no such distinction as is here contended for was ever intended, since it purports to be "An act to provide for the acquisition, installation, construction, reconstruction, etc., of waterworks." That decision is based upon the same proceedings here assailed, and the precise objections here presented were there raised and passed upon.

[2, 3] The question of the infringement of constitutional guarantees, while involved in Kane v. Wedell, is not discussed in the opinion. Appellant claims that, in so far as the Public Utilities Act purports to limit the cost of the improvement to real estate to the exclusion of personal property, it is void upon several constitutional grounds governing taxation.

In this connection it is urged that the assessment constitutes a taking of private property without just compensation, or without due process of law, and further, that it lacks uniformity in not being levied against every character of property alike.

[4] The claim is without merit. Local improvements are, as a general rule, levied upon land alone, for the reason that it is the kind of property which is usually benefited thereby. Assessments to defray the costs thereof are not ordinarily taxes levied for the purpose of sustaining the government, but are rather charges impressed upon individual property because of the fact that the property upon which the burden is imposed receives a special benefit which is different from the general one which the owner enjoys in common with other citizens as such. A special assessment is not in the constitutional sense a tax at all. Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 24, 148 Pac. 217, L. R. A. 1918E, 197. The provisions invoked contain no restriction upon the power of the Legislature to permit and authorize the imposition of special assessments to defray the cost of a public improvement, unless by the manner of its assessment it takes property without due process of law or without compensation. Here there was no irregularity in the proceedings leading up to the acquisition of the improvement in question, so far as the pleadings show, and full opportunity was given for persons interested to object. This constitutes due process. If the exaction imposed upon an owner for the cost of an improvement is in substantial excess of the benefits accruing to him, undoubtedly, to the extent of such excess, it is a taking, under the guise of taxation, of property without compensation. Here, however, no claim is made that there is a disproportion of benefits, but only that, by reason of the existence of the privately owned system, no possible benefit could accrue to plaintiff's lands under the improvement, as such benefits already existed.

It being admitted that the city might acquire a water system if none existed, and that appellant's lands could be impressed with a proper assessment to defray the cost thereof, an extended discussion of the subject becomes unnecessary. The benefit which plaintiff's lands secured through the acquisition by the city of the waterworks, with the more certain probability of the continued existence of the same, considering the opportunity of the municipality to operate such works at actual cost, as against the less certain probability of their being continued under private ownership, is such a benefit as justifies the assessment. Moreover, the ownership and operation of this public utility by the municipality would have a tendency to make the lots more desirable as a place of residence, or more valuable in the general market, as a municipality is authorized to expend public funds for the purpose of extending and improving the same; a thing an individual or a private corporation operating in a small community might not feel justified in or be capable of doing.

No other questions are presented.

For the reasons given, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be and it is hereby, affirmed.

We concur: ST. SURE, J.; RICHARDS, J.

In re RICHARDSON.

(Civ. 3681.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1923.)

1. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2) — Judgment declaring newspaper to be of general circulation held final and binding as against proceedings to vacate.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 1908, 1911, a judgment determining that a newspaper as then published was a newspaper of general circulation was final, and matters there passed on, which appeared on the face of the judgment, are not open to inquiry in proceeding under Pol. Code, $\S$ 4462, to vacate such judgment.

2. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2) — Suit to vacate order declaring newspaper to be of general circulation filed only on showing that it had ceased to be such; "ceased."

Under Pol. Code, $\S$ 4462, suits may be filed to annul orders declaring newspapers to be of general circulation, but to be successful it must be on proof supporting an issue not determined in the original action, and it must be shown that the newspaper has "ceased" to be one of general circulation; the legislative use of "ceased" importing that a change has taken place.

3. Action $\S$ 3 — Change of conditions held fact necessary to be established where suit shows change necessary to relief.

Where a statute evinces an intention that a change from a former condition is a necessary prerequisite to the granting of the relief provided, an alteration of conditions is a fact necessary to be established before a cause of action can be said to have been made out.

4. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2) — Requirement of showing that newspaper has ceased to be of general circulation necessitates comparison of conditions.

In a proceeding to annul an order adjudging a newspaper to be of general circulation, under Pol. Code, $\S$ 4462, the requirement that it be shown that the paper has ceased to be such necessitates a comparison of present conditions with those at the time when it was judicially determined to be of such general circulation.

5. Judgment $\S$ 812(3) — Judgment in rem binding on all persons.

Judgment in rem is binding on all persons.

6. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2) — Elements involved in determination of whether newspaper is one of general circulation.

Whether a newspaper is one of general circulation involves other elements besides the number of its subscribers and the size of the community in which it is published and circulates, and, where it has been judicially determined to be one of general circulation, in a proceeding to annul such order it does not follow that contestant has sustained the burden of proof of changed conditions when he shows that it has ceased to be of general circulation because he has proved that some element involved in the judicial determination has been changed.

7. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2) — Increase of population of a city not such change as to affect newspaper's status as one of general circulation.

Where a newspaper has been judicially determined to be one of general circulation and in a proceeding to vacate such order the only fact proved or of which judicial notice could be taken which has been altered since the former proceeding was that the population had increased from 12,000 persons in 1913 to 18,000 in 1920, it could not be inferred therefrom that it had ceased to be one for dissemination of news nor of general circulation.

8. Evidence $\S$ 12 — Judicial notice taken of increase in population of cities.

Judicial notice taken that the population of Bakersfield increased from approximately 12,000 persons in 1913 to 18,000 in 1920.

9. Newspapers $\S$ 3(5) — 144 paid subscribers held to make newspaper one of general circulation.

It cannot be said that a newspaper having 144 bona fide subscribers, nearly all of which were distributed in a city of 18,000 inhabitants, might not be one of general circulation.

10. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2) — Res judicata rule relaxed to show change of condition of newspaper of general circulation.

In a proceeding under Pol. Code, $\S$ 4462, to vacate an order declaring a newspaper to be one of general circulation, the statute permits the entire subject to be reopened on condition that the ultimate facts are shown to have changed materially subsequent to the original order, and hence the application of the rule of res judicata is relaxed to the extent that proof of changed conditions authorizes the vacation of the decree first made.

11. Judgment $\S$ 948(1) — Res judicata must be pleaded.

Res judicata must be pleaded in order to invoke it.

12. Newspapers — § 3(2) — Petitioner held to have burden of avoiding effect of judgment.

In a proceeding to vacate an order declaring a newspaper to be of general circulation, where, in such proceeding, the petition showed rendition of the original judgment, no plea of res judicata need be interposed by respondent, but petitioner must avoid effect of the judgment shown by its own pleading to exist.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

In the matter of the application of W. E. Simpson and another that the Daily Report be declared a newspaper of general circulation. On application of Friend W. Richardson to vacate an order declaring it to be such a newspaper. From judgment refusing to set aside such order, applicant appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Borton, C. V. Anderson, and Kaye & Simon, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

J. W. Wiley and Irwin & Laird, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. On August 18, 1913, the superior court of Kern county, in a proceeding duly instituted and prosecuted for that purpose, entered an order adjudging the Daily Report to be a newspaper of general circulation. This is a proceeding under section 4462 of the Political Code to annul the order previously made. The ground set forth in the petition is the alleged fact that the Daily Report had ceased to be a newspaper of general circulation. After a trial the superior court denied the petition and dismissed it. From the order of dismissal the petitioners appeal.

The petition alleged and the court found the Daily Report to be a publication issued and published in the city of Bakersfield. A number of typical issues of the publication issued in September and October, 1920, were introduced as exhibits at the trial and are before this court for inspection. An inspection of these and of the paper published in 1913, also offered in evidence, shows that with regard to its contents the Daily Report now contains more items of general interest and is not otherwise less qualified to be termed a newspaper of general circulation than at the date of the original hearing and adjudication. The evidence shows also that it now has more paid subscribers than formerly. Political Code, § 4460, provides that to be a newspaper of general circulation, a publication must be "published for the dissemination of local or telegraphic news and intelligence of a general character," and that if it be "devoted to the interests, or published for the entertainment or instruction of a particular class, profession, trade, calling," etc., it is not such a newspaper. Section 4462 makes provision for the vacation of a judgment which has determined a newspaper to be one of general circulation. The sole requirement which authorizes the vacating of the judgment previously entered is that "such newspaper has ceased to be a newspaper of general circulation, as that term is defined by section four thousand four hundred and sixty."

[1-3] The judgment entered on August 18, 1913, necessarily determined the fact to be that the Daily Report, as then published, having regard for conditions in its community, was a newspaper of general circulation. This judgment became final. The matters there passed upon and which appeared upon the face of the judgment are not now open to inquiry. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908, 1911. If this were not so, since section 4462 of the Political Code allows any person to apply for the vacation of the original judgment, the paper might be required to litigate, over and over, the same issue in innumerable suits. Of course, nothing can prevent the bringing of actions at law, but when an issue is res adjudicata that particular matter will not be again considered. Additional suits may be filed in the nature of the instant one, but in order to succeed, the petitioner must do so upon proof supporting an issue not determined in the original action, and, particularly, it must be shown that the newspaper has "ceased" to be one of general circulation. The Legislature used the word "ceased," which imports that a change has taken place. In order that the original judgment may be vacated, it must be shown that the publication as now issued is not one of general circulation. The determination of that fact may necessitate proof that the relation of the paper is not the same as it was when it was adjudged to be a newspaper of general circulation. Unless the issue sought to be determined upon the petition to vacate is different from that passed upon in the original proceeding, the hearing of the former would be, in effect, a new trial. Where the language used in a statute evinces an intention that a change from a former condition is a necessary prerequisite to the granting of the relief provided, an alteration of conditions is a fact necessary to be established before a cause of action can be said to have been made out. Barbiera v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 154, 23 Pac. 1086.

[4] The requirement that it be shown that the paper has "ceased" to be one of general circulation necessitates a comparison of conditions. We cannot know that a child is larger or taller to-day than it was a year ago unless we are informed as to its size and height both then and now. We cannot say that the Daily Report has ceased to be a newspaper of general circulation unless we know its character and as compared with the character and size of the community, the extent of its circulation, not only now, but at the time when it was judicially determined that it was one of general circulation. This does not involve solely a viewing of the evidence introduced in the proceeding in 1913, as petitioner assumes to investigate the basis of the judgment then rendered. The consideration given the condition then existing is for the limited and single purpose of using it as one of the points of the comparison required to be made. Had the conditions existing in 1913 been placed before the court, the fact that the former judgment is res adjudicata would necessitate the holding in the present instance that those conditions, whatever they were, constituted the paper one of general circulation at that time. It then would have remained for the petitioner to prove such a change as would show the paper to be no longer what it was in that regard. There is nothing in the record on appeal to indicate that any substantial change has taken place.

Petitioner earnestly insists that the judgment in 1913 is not of such a character as to be regarded as finally deciding the matter there adjudicated as against those petitioners. Much stress is placed on the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw in Re Herman, 183 Cal. 153, 191 Pac. 934. In questioning the right of the Legislature to enact legislation of this character if it authorizes a judgment binding, as contended by respondent here, the learned justice cites no authorities and gives no definite reason for the doubts upon the matter entertained by him. The decision of the court in that proceeding expressly held that the question here presented was not in issue and could not properly be passed upon. However, from what is there determined, it logically follows that the decision in the instant proceeding in 1913 is binding, not only upon the parties, but upon all persons. In Re Herman the court points out that section 4462 of the Political Code provides that any person may appear and contest the petition; any person may show that the newspaper in question is not the proper medium for the publication of legal notices, etc.; and any person may appeal without showing that he is interested in an individual capacity or otherwise than as one of the public. It is logical to conclude that if "any person" had such rights and failed to exercise them he is bound by the judgment rendered, though, perchance, it may be merely through his failure to interpose a contest.

[5] It is elementary that a judgment in rem is binding upon all persons. It is said by Mr. Freeman, in his work on Judgments, that the distinguishing characteristic of judgments in rem "is that wherever their obligation is recognized and enforced as against any person, it is equally recognized and enforced as against all persons." According to Chand's Law of Res Judicata:

"A judgment is in rem whenever the process and proceedings are such as to warn all persons that the court may render judgment affecting certain property and their interests therein, and that they must, at or within a time specified, appear before the court if they wish to protect those interests from judicial condemnation. The fact that, under the mode of serving process provided by law, some claimant or even all claimants of the property do not receive actual notice of the proceeding will not prevent the judgment from operating in rem, if the mode adopted was reasonable under the circumstances, and calculated to give notice to the claimants, and the process was such as that the claimants, had it been seen by them, should have known therefrom that their interests were or might be imperiled, and that they might be heard for the preservation of such interests."

The judgment of 1913 determined the status of the Daily Report to be a newspaper of general circulation.

If this were the only question involved in the instant proceeding, the facts which were the basis of the former judgment would not alone suffice to grant the relief sought in this proceeding. The doctrine of res adjudicata would prevent their consideration for such a limited purpose. The peculiar language of this statute requires a showing of a change having taken place, and this at once necessitates proof of the condition of affairs which must appear to have ceased to be in order that the judgment may be set aside.

[6] The question as to whether or not a paper is one of general circulation involves other elements besides the number of its subscribers and the size of the community in which it is published and circulates. It does not necessarily follow that the contestant has sustained the burden of proof required of him to show that a paper has ceased to be one of general circulation because he has proved that some one of the elements involved has changed. The difference must be of such a nature as to bring about an altered relativity of conditions as contrasted with that which existed when the original judgment was entered. For example, if the only changes which had taken place were in the matter of population of the community and the number of bona fide subscribers, and if these had remained proportionally unaltered, it could not be said that the newspaper had ceased to occupy the status of being one of general circulation. This is true because the trial court in the original proceeding passed upon the ultimate fact, at the time having before it supporting facts relatively the same as upon the later hearing. Counsel for petitioner suggests that there are many elements entering into the fact as to whether or not a newspaper is one of general circulation other than existed in 1913; that in this day the radio may be used to disseminate news; mail may be distributed by flying machine, and many other discoveries, inventions, and improvements have revolutionized the newspaper business. He argues that a newspaper may cease to be one of general circulation, not by any reason of a change in itself, but as a result of this and other changed conditions in the community where it is published. It must be conceded that all of these things might have transpired, but in order to be relevant to the issue here under consideration there must be some evidence in the record to show that the community in which the Daily Report circulates has acquired the aid of the flying machine, the radio, etc., to assist in the dissemination of news.

[7, 8] As shown by the record on appeal, the only fact proven or of which this court can take judicial notice which has been altered since the former proceeding is that the population of Bakersfield has increased from approximately 12,000 inhabitants in 1913 to 18,000 in 1920. From this evidence it cannot be inferred that the paper has ceased to be one for the dissemination of local and telegraphic news and intelligence; nor from the fact of change of population alone can it be concluded that it is no longer true that the paper is not devoted to the interests or published for the entertainment or instruction of the particular class, profession, trade, calling, race, or denomination, or for any number of classes, professions, trades, or callings; nor would the circumstance of increase of inhabitants in itself show that the newspaper has ceased to have a bona fide subscription list of paying subscribers. Appellant admits that these ultimate facts are all conclusively determined by the court's order of August, 1913. Obviously, mere change in population would not affect any of them, yet change in population is the single, isolated element shown to have altered since 1913. Although other conditions have remained unchanged as far as the record shows, we are asked to say that, regardless of the contents of the publication and of the diversity of its subscribers, this one fact of additional population, notwithstanding the other elements conclusively established by the former order, is of such controlling weight as to compel a finding that the paper has ceased to be one of general circulation. This we cannot do.

[9] The Daily Recorder, published and issued in Sacramento, was held to be a newspaper of general circulation, although the court said that the "paying subscribers to said paper somewhat exceeds the number of 200." In re Green, 21 Cal. App. 138, 131 Pac. 91. The decision just cited refers with approval to Hesler v. Coldron, 29 Okl. 216, 116 Pac. 787, in which the Daily Legal News, with from 205 to 215 subscribers, was recognized as a paper of general circulation. We cannot say that a newspaper having a bona fide subscription list of 144 subscribers, nearly all of which is distributed in a city of 1,800 inhabitants, might not be one of general circulation. Until the city of Bakersfield becomes so large that the number of people living in it precludes that conclusion that the paper can be one of general circulation with a bona fide subscription list of almost 194 subscribers, a decision of the trial court adjudging that its circulation is general will not be disturbed on appeal, where other conditions appear to have remained unchanged since the first decree was entered.

[10] Appellant contends that the rule which we uphold is one of unprecedented severity. On the contrary, if the ancient doctrine of res adjudicata were applied without modification, it would not be permissible to again challenge any of the ultimate facts found by the court in the first proceeding. But the statute permits the entire subject to be reopened, upon condition, however, that the ultimate facts are shown to have materially changed subsequent to the original order having been made. Hence the application of the rule of res adjudicata is relaxed to the extent that proof of changed conditions authorizes the vacation of the decree first made.

[11, 12] It is argued that res adjudicata must be pleaded in order that it may be invoked. This is no doubt usually the rule, but as was said by the court in a similar situation in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, it was for the plaintiffs to show the right which they claimed. If their right had been legally extinguished at the commencement of the action, the defendant was entitled to prove it under a general denial. In this proceeding the petition shows, as it must, the rendition of the original judgment. No plea of res adjudicata need be interposed by respondent, but petitioner must avoid the effect of the judgment shown by its own pleading to exist.

We conclude that a cessation of the status found to exist by the judgment in the original proceeding must be shown to have taken place before the petitioner's case can be said to have become a prima facie one. The burden is not upon the respondent to show that conditions have remained unchanged. The duty rests squarely upon the petitioner to bring his case up to the standard established by the Code in the measure of proof required to set aside an order decreeing a paper to be one of general circulation, to wit, evidence of the cessation of that condition, necessarily through a change of one or more of the essential facts formerly contributing to the production of it.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MENDIVAL. (Cr. 954.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 29, 1923.)

Robbery — 24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Facts tending to prove that appellant drove two automobiles, one stolen and the other rented by appellant under an assumed name, in which he and his codefendants rode to and away from the bank which the codefendants held up and robbed, held sufficient to sustain the inference that the use of two automobiles, instead of one, was intended to mislead the authorities, and the judgment of conviction as against appellant, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1958, defining "inference."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Salvador Mendival was convicted of robbery, and he appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Theo. Gottsdanker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHENK, Justice pro tem. Appellant and his codefendants, Broulio Galindo, Jose Hernandez, and Faustino Rivera, were jointly charged with the robbery of the First National Bank of Arcadia on the 5th day of April, 1922. Appellant, Galindo, and Hernandez were convicted and sentenced. Rivera was in the hospital at the time of the trial, and so far as the record shows his case is undisposed of. Appellant alone has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The sole contention is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict in that there is no evidence, so it is claimed, tending in any way to connect the appellant with the commission of the crime. No authorities are cited in appellant's brief. It contains a short summary of the evidence, with the suggestion that in order to determine the question raised it will be necessary to consider the evidence in its entirety, and the request is made that this court read the transcript for that purpose. That has been done.

About 7:30 o'clock on the morning of the day of the robbery the defendant and his codefendant Galindo went to the auto livery station of Parsons Bros. in Los Angeles and rented a Ford car without a driver. Appellant signed the receipt and rental agreement in which it was specified that the car was to be returned before midnight of the same day. To this receipt and agreement appellant signed the name of Joe Rivas, an assumed name.

A few minutes before 1 o'clock on the afternoon of the same day a Chevrolet touring car stopped in front of the bank. Three men got out of the car and entered the bank unmasked. They were plentifully supplied with firearms. Two of the men had two revolvers each, and the third man had one. At the points of these guns the president, cashier, and two bookkeepers were ordered first to put up their hands and then to lie down on the floor. Presently a customer entered the bank. He, too, was required to join the officers and employees on the floor. While one of the trio kept watch over the victims, the other two proceeded to pack into two canvas bags about $2,800 in currency and silver, $3,720 in bonds, and $2,700 in travelers' checks. When the packing was concluded, all persons reclining upon the floor were required to enter the vault.

The trio left the bank with the loot and boarded the waiting Chevrolet car, which departed speedily on the highway toward the south. Galindo and Hernandez were positively identified by several witnesses at the trial as two of the men who entered the bank. Rivera was positively identified at the preliminary examination as the third man. While these three were in the bank, a fourth man, whom the prosecution claimed and the jury found to be the appellant, remained in the Chevrolet car, sitting under the steering wheel and keeping the motor running. No witness at or in the vicinity of the bank positively identified the fourth man as Mendival. Several saw the form of a man in the front seat of the car. A telephone man who was in an office across the street testified that the man who remained in the car wore a light hat pulled down over the side of his face. Other witnesses testified that the man who remained in the car wore a light gray cap. One witness stated that the complexion of the man in the car resembled the complexion of the appellant as he saw him at the trial.

A rancher testified that shortly after 1 o'clock on the same afternoon he was about three miles southeast of the bank; that he saw the Chevrolet car with four men in it speeding along the Azusa road at about 35 miles per hour; that he recognized the defendant Galindo as one of the occupants; that the car was proceeding in an easterly direction toward the Sawpit wash; that the car struck the wash with such force that it almost overturned; that at about the time he saw the car disappearing in the wash he heard a whistle blowing which he recognized as the police alarm whistle of the city of Monrovia, a city adjoining Arcadia on the east, and that his suspicions were aroused; that he went to Monrovia and notified the police authorities as to what he had seen; that in the company of an officer he went in the direction in which the Chevrolet car was traveling and found it in a lonely spot on Chicago Park Island in the San Gabriel river; that there was no one in the car, and that the radiator was hot; that the car was started and driven without difficulty; that the license number plates had been removed, and that there were fresh tracks of another automobile near the place where the Chevrolet car had been abandoned. Pieces of paper, such as are used in wrapping coins with the denomination of the coins stamped thereon, were found strewn on the floor in the rear of the car.

An automobile salesman testified that he was the owner of this Chevrolet car and, that it had been stolen from his garage some time during the night before the robbery.

A motorcycle officer testified that about 2 o'clock of the same day he arrested the four defendants for speeding in Monterey Park, a few miles westerly from the island in the San Gabriel river; that they were riding in the Ford car rented that morning from Parsons Bros. and were the only occupants of the car; that he gave them the usual ticket requiring them to report and permitted them to go on; that they proceeded toward Los Angeles; and that the appellant was driving the car.

The robbery was immediately reported to the office of the sheriff of Los Angeles county. Two deputy sheriffs and the constable of Azusa township, who happened to be at the sheriff's office, started in automobiles for the San Gabriel valley, wherein Arcadia is situated. As they were proceeding through Coyote Pass, about midway between San Gabriel valley and Los Angeles, they stopped this same Ford car which was speeding toward Los Angeles and placed the four defendants under arrest. The appellant was driving the car. Five revolvers were taken from the four defendants. Some of these revolvers were identified by the officers of the bank as those used in the robbery. One revolver was taken from the person of the appellant. All of the defendants were wearing caps. Two dark-colored hats and several articles of clothing were found on the floor of the car. These hats were identified as those worn by two of the defendants when they entered the bank. Two empty canvas bags resembling in appearance those used as containers for the stolen property were also found, one on the person of Galindo and the other in the rear of the car. The defendants were taken back to the bank that afternoon for the purpose of identification. The three who entered the bank were positively identified by the victims, but they could not identify the appellant because, as they stated, he did not come into the bank, and they did not obtain a sufficient view of him to be able positively to identify him.

The cashier of the bank testified that a few silver dollars were found on the floor of the Ford car when it was examined at the bank after the return of the defendants with the officers.

When questioned by officers as to what he was doing with the Ford car, appellant stated that they had rented it for the purpose of going to San Gabriel for some oranges and that they had taken the guns along to shoot rabbits.

The defendant Galindo was the only one of the defendants who testified. He denied any and all participation in the robbery. The only other defense offered was an alibi on behalf of Galindo and evidence of previous good character on behalf of appellant.

From the foregoing facts and circumstances the jury undoubtedly concluded that the stolen Chevrolet car was employed by the defendants, including appellant, as a means of thwarting any successful investigation which might follow the recovery and identification of that car. The jury must also have concluded that the use of the Ford car was a ruse also to prevent identification. The evidence justifies these conclusions. It was undisputed that the appellant rented the Ford car under a fictitious name a few hours before the robbery. It was also undisputed that he was driving that car when he and his codefendants were arrested for speeding at Monterey Park and when they were again arrested by the officers in Coyote Pass. With the appellant were the three men positively identified. Five guns were found in the party, corresponding to the number used in robbing the bank, and one of these guns was taken from the person of the appellant. Hats used in the commission of the crime, and later undoubtedly discarded for caps to avoid identification, were found in the car. Canvas bags resembling those used for carrying away the loot were also found in the car. The fact that silver dollars were also found on the floor of the car after the arrest is a very significant circumstance tending to connect the use of the Ford car with the cleverly conceived plan to avoid apprehension.

It is entirely reasonable to conclude that the appellant had knowledge of and took part in the commission of the robbery, especially in view of the fact that he had rented and taken the Ford car to the San Gabriel valley in company with Galindo, whose participation in the robbery has been adjudicated; that when arrested for speeding and later by the deputy sheriffs he had with him, not only Galindo, but also Hernandez, whose part in the crime likewise has been adjudicated, and also Rivera whose identity as a participant was established; that incriminating evidence was found in the car and that the appellant at the time of the arrest was driving the car with its guilty occupants toward Los Angeles at high speed with the obvious purpose of escape.

Appellant's participation in the crime satisfactorily appears from the facts shown in evidence and the inferences which it was the province of the jury to draw therefrom. Section 1958, Code Civ. Proc.; People v. Messersmith, 61 Cal. 246.

SLATER v. FRIEDMAN et al. (Civ. 4482.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 26, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error — 1071(6)—Failure to find particular fact requested held not reversible error.

In an action against a taxicab owner for injuries sustained, a failure to find that defendant was a common carrier or that he operated the machine for hire, held not reversible error, where the driver of the machine was ultimately found to have been acting beyond the scope of his employment.

2. Master and servant — 302(2)—Master only liable for servant's acts "in course of employment."

A master is only answerable for the acts of his servant when the servant is acting "in the course of his employment," which means "while engaged in the service of his master." If engaged on a mission of his own, the master is not liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

3. Carriers — 283(2)—Taxi owner not liable for driver's acts, after hour when driver should have ceased work.

In an action by a passenger against a taxicab owner for personal injuries, sustained while defendant's agent was driving his machine, where the driver was shown to have been employed to work from 10 a. m. to 10 p. m., and unauthorized to work after that hour, and where the accident occurred after 10 p. m., while the driver was engaged upon his own enterprise, held, defendant was not liable.

Action by Pauline Slater against S. Friedman, Robert Nuccio, and others. Dismissed as to all defendants except S. Friedman. From judgment for defendant and order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for personal injuries.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Upon plaintiff's motion the action was dismissed as against the fictitious defendants and also against the defendant Robert Nuccio. After trial, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant Friedman, and this is an appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

The evidence shows, in substance, that defendant was, on the 17th day of July, 1920, engaged in the taxicab business in the city of Los Angeles, and had in his employ one Schlau, who operated his machine for hire; that about 11:45 p. m. on the day last mentioned the taxicab was standing on the corner of Fifth and Spring streets with Schlau in charge, and a sign was attached to it indicating that the machine was for hire. The plaintiff, accompanied by her niece and a friend, engaged the services of the driver to convey the party for a consideration to the Santa Fé station. While proceeding on the journey a collision occurred, and plaintiff was seriously injured, her skull being fractured, her body and limbs bruised, and her nervous system affected. It further appeared in evidence that the hours of the driver's employment were from 10 in the morning until 10 at night, and that on the evening in question the driver had discovered that his employer has retired early and he kept the taxi out longer than his instructions warranted him in doing, for the purpose of his personal gain.

The trial court found the defendant to be the owner of the machine and that Schlau was employed by him to operate the same, but it further found that after 10 p. m. of the day of the accident the driver was not acting in the course of his employment, but was on a mission of his own, and judgment was accordingly rendered in defendant's favor. A motion for a new trial was made and denied.

[1] As ground for reversal, appellant complains of the action of the trial court in failing to find defendant to be a common carrier, and that he operated the taxi for hire, and that Schlau was at the time of the accident his agent, servant, and employee. Such findings, it is claimed, are justified by the evidence. Complaint is also made of the express findings as being contrary to the law and the evidence.

The fact as to whether or not defendant operated his taxi as a common carrier, or that he operated the machine for hire, are questions that are unimportant, if the finding of the ultimate fact that the driver was acting beyond the scope of his employment is warranted by the evidence, and as we are of the opinion that the trial court was correct in its conclusion upon this subject, failure to find upon these questions cannot constitute error requiring a reversal, as the only effect thereof would be to establish the degree of care required of defendant.

The evidence upon the subject, as above narrated, is without practical conflict. It shows that Schlau was employed by defendant Friedman to operate the taxi, and that his hours of employment were limited from 10 o'clock in the morning to the same hour in the evening; that, disregarding these express instructions, and for purposes of his own, about midnight of the day of the accident he undertook for hire for his own benefit to convey plaintiff to her destination. Under these circumstances it is the claim of plaintiff that, as the driver had actual authority to represent his principal up to the hour of 10 o'clock in the evening, he had ostensible authority to represent him after that hour, as he was acting in the capacity for which he was employed.

No subject in connection with the law applying to the operation of automobiles has given rise to more views than the question of the responsibility of an owner for the acts of his chauffeur and agents. The numerous cases upon the subject have been productive of much astute and interesting discussion in the courts, and eminent judges have differed widely in the application of the principles as applied to different cases. These cases are far from being in harmony on the subject, and it is not an easy task to reconcile them, and it would be a matter of supererogation to attempt to do so.

[2] At the outset it may be stated that a master is only liable for the acts of a servant when such servant is acting within the scope of his employment. If he is so acting, even against his master's express command, the master is nevertheless answerable for his acts, but if he is engaged on a mission of his own, without being at all on his master's business, the master cannot be held liable. In other words, it is a well-established rule that, if an act causing injury is done without the authority of the master, and not for the purpose of executing his orders or doing his work, then he is not responsible; but, if it is done in the execution of the authority given by the master and for the purpose of performing what he was directed, then he is responsible, whether the act be willful or negligent. McCarthy v. Timmins, 178 Mass. 378, 59 N. E. 1038, 86 Am. St. Rep. 490. These rules are simple and well understood; the only difficulty being in their application to the facts of a particular case.

The test to determine whether a master is liable to a stranger for the consequences of his servant's misconduct is to inquire whether the latter was doing what he was employed to do at the time he caused the injury complained of. If he was, the fact that he was not doing it in the way directed is immaterial. But if at the time he did the act which caused the injury he was not acting within the scope of his employment, the master is not liable. Danforth v. Fisher, 75 N. H. 111, 71 Atl. 535, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 93, 139 Am. St. Rep. 670. There are two principal questions for determination in all cases involving the doctrine of respondeat superior: (1) The existence of the contractual relation, and (2) whether the act or omission was one performed or occurring within the scope of that relation. As above stated, in determining whether a particular act is done in the course of employment the first inquiry that is presented is whether or not the servant was at the time engaged in serving the master. If the act is done while the servant is at liberty from service and pursuing his own ends exclusively, there can be no question of the master's freedom from all responsibility, even though the injury complained of could not have been committed without the facilities afforded to the servant by his relation to his master.

The doctrine as stated in Morier v. St. Paul, etc., R. R., 31 Minn. 351, 17 N. W. 952, 47 Am. Rep. 793, is frequently quoted in the cases upon the subject. It is there held that, in determining whether a particular act is done in the course of the servant's employment, it is proper first to inquire whether the servant was at the time engaged in serving his master. If the act is done while the servant is at liberty from the service and pursuing his own ends exclusively, the master is not responsible. If the servant was, at the time the injury was inflicted, acting for himself and as his own master pro tempore, the master is not liable. If the servant step aside from his master's business for however short a time to do an act not connected with such business, the relation of master and servant is for the time suspended.

To the same effect is Slater v. Advance Thresher Co., 97 Minn. 305, 107 N. W. 133, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 598, where the doctrine is briefly set forth to be that a master is not liable for injuries occasioned to a third party by the negligence of the servant, while the latter is engaged in some act beyond the scope of his employment, although he may be using the instrumentalities furnished by the master with which to perform his duties. The expression "in the course of his employment" means, in contemplation of law, "while engaged in the service of his master" and nothing more. Beyond the scope of his employment, therefore, a servant is as much a stranger to his master as any third person. Cunningham v. Castle, 127 App. Div. 580, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1057.

Whether the subject be viewed from the question of agency or of master and servant there can be no difference in principle, as here suggested, for while there is a distinction between an agent and a servant, this distinction in no sense impairs the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior to both classes of individuals. Evans v. Dyke Auto Co., 121 Mo. App. 266, 101 S. W. 1132.

[3] Applying these principles to the evidence in the case, the act here complained of must be held to have been done while the driver was at liberty from his service and pursuing his own ends exclusively, and defendant cannot therefore be held responsible, even though he afforded the means without which the accident might not have occurred. Glassman v. Harry, 182 Mo. App. 304, 170 S. W. 403; Stewart v. Baruch, 103 App. Div. 577, 93 N. Y. Supp. 161; Robinson v. McNeill, 18 Wash. 163, 51 Pac. 355; Christensen v. Christiansen (Tex. Civ. App.) 155 S. W. 995; Tyler v. Stephans, Adm'r, 163 Ky. 770, 174 S. W. 790; Evans v. Dyke Auto Co., supra; Gousse v. Lowe, 41 Cal. App. 715, 183 Pac. 295; Steffen v. McNaughton, 142 Wis. 49, 124 N. W. 1016, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 382, 19 Ann. Cas. 1227; Davis on Motor Vehicles, § 216; 26 Cyc. 1537; Mauchle v. Panama-Pacific I. E., 37 Cal. App. 715, 174 Pac. 400.

In conclusion, it might be said that if there was any evidence in the record which showed in any manner that the driver had authority to operate the machine after his working hours for the benefit of defendant, or any circumstance from which such authority might be inferred, the case would present a different aspect, but there is none. Nor is there any evidence upon which a claim could be made that plaintiff was relying upon the fact that the defendant owned the taxi, for there is nothing in the record to indicate that she had any knowledge upon this subject, nor is there any evidence from which knowledge of the actual ownership of the vehicle could be inferred. In other words, there is no evidence upon which any question of estoppel might be raised other than the mere employment discussed.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

STEPHANY v. HUNT BROS. CO. (Civ. 4511.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. June 23, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨842(11)—Finding of court held one of fact and conclusive.

In an action for the breach of a contract under which plaintiff had been employed by defendant to sell canned fruits in European countries on commission, where plaintiff was shown to have made a trip to various European countries and while there promoted business for defendant and another company for whom he was also selling, a finding of the court that, in view of the dual purpose of his trip, he was entitled to recover upon defendant's breach only one-half of the expenses incurred held one of fact and conclusive.

2. Principal and agent ⇨41—Value of services held insufficiently established to warrant recovery of damages for loss thereof.

In an action to recover for the breach by defendant of a contract under which plaintiff was to sell canned fruits in various European countries for defendant, evidence of the value of plaintiff's services during the time he lost while making a trip to Europe in the promotion of defendant's business held insufficient to warrant a recovery of damages therefor.

3. Damages ⇨40(1)—Reasonable certainty of realization and reasonable certain basis of ascertainment necessary to warrant damages for loss of prospective profits.

In order to sustain a recovery of prospective profits, there must be a reasonably certain basis for their ascertainment, and it must be shown that they were reasonably certain to have been realized but for the wrongful act complained of, though they were not rendered irrecoverable merely because they cannot be directly and absolutely proved with mathematical certainty.

4. Principal and agent ⇨41—Evidence held insufficient to warrant damages for loss of prospective profits.

Proof of prospective profits which would have accrued to an agent selling canned fruit in European countries under a contract for a commission held insufficiently definite to warrant an award of damages for loss of such profits after a breach of contract by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Hilmar Stephany against the Hunt Bros. Company. From judgment for plaintiff in insufficient amount, and from the denial of his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Jay Monroe Latimer, of San Francisco (J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract. Recovery was had by plaintiff in the sum of $1,675.15, but, deeming this sum to be inadequate, he moved for a new trial. The motion was automatically denied, and this is an appeal by him from the judgment and order.

The record shows that the contract sued upon was entered into by the parties on September 15, 1915. By its terms plaintiff was constituted the exclusive sales agent for defendant's products, consisting of numerous varieties of canned fruits, in the countries of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Switzerland. The contract was to exist for a period of five years from its date. Plaintiff's sole compensation for his services was to be computed upon a commission basis; it being agreed that he was to receive 6 per cent. on the amount of consummated sales, out of which he was to pay his expenses and any subagents he might employ. To properly carry out his part of the contract plaintiff concluded to visit the countries mentioned therein. Accordingly, at his own expense he made a trip to Europe, which consumed some five months or more, upon which occasion he appointed subagents to solicit business, and did in fact procure certain orders. The bulk of these orders, however, went only as far as New York owing to the refusal of the War Trade Bureau in Washington to issue permits for shipment abroad, and they are not here involved. Confronted with this situation, plaintiff returned to this state, it being impossible for him to do business of any kind in either neutral or belligerent countries. Shortly prior to the time that the contract in question was entered into, plaintiff had procured a similar agreement with the Haiku Fruit & Packing Company to handle its goods in the same territory and for the same period covered by his contract with defendant. The product of the Haiku Fruit Company consisted of canned pineapple, a commodity defendant company did not handle. In the latter part of the year 1918 and upon the signing of the armistice, the embargo with European countries was lifted, and plaintiff thereupon offered to complete performance of his contract with defendant company. He was notified that it had abrogated the same, and that, so far as it was concerned, the matter was at an end. Plaintiff thereupon brought this action for damages sustained by him in consequence of the breach of the contract on the part of defendant.

By the prayer of the complaint, plaintiff seeks to recover the expenses incurred by him in the sum of $3,342.25; he also asks for $10,000 as compensation for loss of time, labor, and skill employed by him in making his trip to Europe, and for the further sum of $100,000 by reason of the wrongful abrogation of the contract.

The trial court found in effect that, while plaintiff had observed and performed all the provisions of the contract required of him to be performed, and had in so doing expended time and money upon the faith that defendant would carry out its obligations, the company failed to do so, but on the contrary breached its agreement. It further found that the trip to Europe taken by plaintiff was a necessary act to properly carry out the agreement, and that the expense incident thereto amounted to the sum of $1,676.16. Upon the items of claimed damages for loss of time and prospective profits, however, it was found that the evidence was insufficient to form any basis for compensation upon the subjects, as it failed to establish any method by which such damage might be ascertained with any reasonable probability or certainty, and relief was accordingly denied upon these items.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the denial of his motion for a new trial, claiming that under the evidence he has been inadequately compensated for his loss growing out of the breach of the contract by defendant.

Under the terms of the contract, as above pointed out, plaintiff was not entitled to compensation for expenditures incurred by him in the performance of his obligations as payment for his services was provided for upon a strictly commission basis, and the amount thereof was to cover any and all outlay on his part. It is conceded, however, that in the event of a breach of contract, where loss of profits cannot be estimated with sufficient certainty, recovery may be allowed for actual expenditures of money and for loss of time in connection with the contract.

[1] Plaintiff contended at the trial that he actually expended in connection therewith the sum of $3,342.25. It appears from the record that this sum was a mere approximation on his part of his expenditures. He insists, however, that he should have been allowed the full amount so approximated by him. It developed on his cross-examination that he had a similar contract with the Haiku Company for the sale of that company's product, and that upon the occasion of his European trip he divided his efforts in his endeavor to sell the products of both companies. In rendering judgment upon this element of damage the judge of the court below no doubt concluded that defendant company could only be charged one-half of the approximated expenditures, for the sum allowed is practically one-half of that amount, it being some $5 in excess thereof. Respondent makes no objection to the excess, and appellant is in no position to do so, as he is not injured thereby. The finding of the court upon this subject being one of fact, and there being evidence to support it, is determinative and conclusive here.

[2] Upon the element of damages concerning the value of plaintiff's services for his loss of time, there is no evidence in the record upon which a judgment for damages could be predicated. Defendant himself, when asked to put a value on them, stated that on account of their peculiar nature he was unable to do so. It appears in evidence that he had for a number of years represented other companies dealing in similar products, and that he maintained a store in Berlin, where he kept such goods on hand, and that he was known as a dealer in California products. While this experience may have added to his value as a sales agent, it in no manner afforded the court an opportunity of determining with reasonable or any degree of certainty the damages suffered by plaintiff in this connection. Without some evidence upon the subject a determination thereon would have been purely conjectural and speculative. If defendant himself could not place a value upon his services, the trial court was in no position to do so, in the absence of any other evidence showing their value, and there was none. We are of the opinion, therefore, that as to this element of damage the ruling of the trial court was also correct.

[3, 4] The remaining element of damages, referring to the loss of prospective profits by reason of the breach, presents appellant's main contention.

Upon this subject plaintiff offered in evidence proof of the fact that he had procured between September, 1915, and February, 1916, orders for 2,491 cases of defendant's goods in Norway and Sweden alone, but delivery was not had on account of war conditions. He also produced a witness who was an importer and exporter of products similar to those dealt in by defendant company, who testified that in the Scandinavian countries the opportunity for the sale of such goods was practically unlimited. He further testified that he had made sales therein during a period of time covered by plaintiff's contract to the amount of between $75,000 and $100,000, and that the average value per case was $8, which would mean on a $75,000 basis over 9,000 cases. He also testified that he could have sold from 100,000 to 200,000 more cases if his firm could have procured the goods. Statistics of the United States relating to exports of canned products to the countries covered by the contract were introduced for the purpose of showing the volume of business which existed between the United States and the countries covered by the contract, and how the demand for the same had increased since plaintiff had procured the orders in 1915. By a system of multiplication based thereon plaintiff endeavored to show the probable volume of business he would have secured but for defendant's breach.

With this evidence as a basis we are asked if plaintiff's witness could have sold from 100,000 to 200,000 cases if he had the goods, what amount could plaintiff, with his long experience and wide acquaintance in the trade, have sold? We are constrained to answer that we do not know. The conservatism pervading the law is against allowing damages purely speculative, fanciful, or imaginary. In order to entitle one to recover prospective profits he must show that the profits claimed were reasonably certain to have been realized but for the wrongful act complained of. It is not an insuperable objection to their recovery that they cannot be directly and absolutely proved with mathematical cer-tainity. In the nature of things, where performance has been prevented, the proof of profits cannot be absolute, and one who breaches his contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages. Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 244, 48 Pac. 62; Cederberg v. Robinson, 100 Cal. 98, 34 Pac. 625. That plaintiff ought to recover there is no question, as the evidence fully supports the finding that defendant deliberately breached its contract. In order to do so, however, it was incumbent on him to prove his case.

In Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 17 Pac. 427, the court, in dealing with this subject, said:

"It seems not infrequently to be lost sight of in the trial courts, that, in actions upon contracts, the amount of damages caused by an alleged breach is to be proved as a fact."

It is there pointed out that actions based upon contract differ from those of tort, where the amount of recovery is left upon general principles to the "sound discretion" or "dispassionate judgment" of the jury.

There can be no recovery of prospective profits unless there is a reasonably certain basis for their ascertainment. Here the trial court found there was none, and we think rightfully so, for the evidence presented affords no means by which the court could by any degree of reasonable probability determine what amount would be a fair approximation of the amount of profit plaintiff might have earned but for the breach.

Counsel for appellant have cited us to several cases in this and other jurisdictions in support of his contention that the evidence offered presents a basis for the computation of his claimed damages. We do not deem a discussion of those cases necessary, as in all of them there was some definite basis upon which damages could be predicated. The last expression of opinion on the subject in this state is found in Friedman v. McKay Leather Co., 179 Cal. 566, 178 Pac. 139, where it is held that speculative damages are not recoverable, and that, where the compensation of the agent is a commission, based on sales made by him, damages on the basis of suppositive sales are not recoverable. The evidence affording no definite basis upon which a judgment could be predicated that would not be conjectural and speculative, the trial court properly denied the relief sought under the items of damages based upon services and prospective profits. 2 Corpus Juris, p. 791, § 455; 1 Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) § 172.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

PRICE et ux. v. CENTRAL SAV. BANK OF OAKLAND. (Civ. 4545.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 18, 1923.)

Quieting title ¶7(4)—Judgment debtor discharged in bankruptcy, entitled to removal of cloud preventing sale of homestead.

Where a judgment debtor filed a declaration of homestead, went through bankruptcy, and later, in the action in which the judgment was rendered, secured a perpetual stay of execution, he may nevertheless remove the judgment cloud on his title without paying the judgment where the pleadings admit that the creditor's threats to enforce his judgment have rendered sale or mortgage of the homestead impossible, since the judgment became a mere moral obligation and plaintiff's rights being statutory are insufficiently protected by the stay of execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Suit by W. C. Price and wife against the Central Savings Bank of Oakland. Judgment on the pleadings for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for appellant.

P. L. Benjamin, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant to remove a cloud on the title to their real estate. The defendant answered; thereafter the plaintiffs gave notice of a motion for judgment on the pleadings; thereupon the defendant gave notice of a motion for judgment on the pleadings; and both motions came on for hearing at the same time. The trial court granted the motion of the plaintiffs, and from the judgment so entered the defendant has appealed.

On July 20, 1917, the appellant commenced an action against W. C. Price and took out a writ of attachment and levied the same on the real estate standing of record in the name of W. C. Price. On May, 20, 1918, W. C. Price duly executed and recorded a declaration of homestead on said real estate. Judgment in that action was entered on July 9, 1918, for the sum of $37,875.03 plus $35.85 costs, and the judgment has never been paid, nor has W. C. Price, or Helen V. Price, ever offered to pay the judgment or any part or portion thereof. On July 3, 1918, W. C. Price was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on September 14, 1918, he was discharged in bankruptcy. On October 19, 1921, W. C. Price appeared in the first action and on motion obtained an order perpetually staying the issuing of any execution upon the said judgment. On August 8, 1921, the plaintiffs filed this action and after reciting many of the foregoing facts they also alleged:

"That the defendant asserts and claims that the said judgment so as aforesaid rendered and entered in its favor against the said W. C. Price is still in full force and effect, notwithstanding the said discharge in bankruptcy, and that the said judgment is a valid and existing lien upon and against the said homestead premises, notwithstanding their homestead character as aforesaid, and that it is entitled to have a writ of execution issued on said judgment and to have the said homestead premises sold under the said writ of execution."

And they further allege that—

"The said docketing of the judgment and the said assertions and claim by defendant of a lien upon said homestead premises as aforesaid have created and caused doubts as to the validity of the said homestead right of plaintiffs in and to the said homestead premises, and as to the exemption of said homestead premises from sale under any writ of execution that may be issued upon the said judgment, and have thereby clouded and rendered doubtful and questionable the validity of said homestead and the rights of plaintiffs. * * *

Thereupon they prayed that it be decreed that this defendant "has no claim or lien or right of any kind in, to, upon, or against the said homestead premises, * * *" and that it be enjoined from asserting the contrary.

In its answer the defendant admitted all of the allegations of the complaint, and alleged in appropriate form the nonpayment of the judgment and no tender of payment or offer to do equity in any way whatever. It will be noted that the defendant's judgment against the plaintiffs was apparently a just judgment; that the plaintiffs have not paid it nor offered to pay it; but, on the other hand, they have taken advantage of the bankruptcy laws and the homestead statutes for the purpose of avoiding the payment of said judgment. In taking that course the laws of the land fully authorize their acts. In so far as the record discloses, every single statutory provision in favor of the plaintiffs has been fully and completely respected and upheld by the courts. Regarding the acts of the plaintiffs, the defendant perchance may claim that such acts were immoral, but as was said in Ontario State Bank v. Gerry, 91 Cal. 94, 98, 27 Pac. 531, 532:

"There is no question here about the morality of the transaction. It is simply a matter of statutory provision."

Challenging the judgment rendered by the trial court, the appellant contends that the judgment should not have been in favor of the plaintiffs (1) because even though the judgment was discharged in bankruptcy and the attachment lien was dissolved by the lapse of time, the moral obligation to pay the debt remained and respondents should have been required to do equity and discharge the same as a condition precedent to the grant of equitable relief, and (2) because the respondents had already applied for, and actually obtained, in the principal action a decree perpetually staying execution so that they had already obtained adequate relief at law and the court of equity had no jurisdiction to make its decree. As to the first reason assigned, it is sufficient to state that the discharge in bankruptcy operated to relieve the plaintiff W. C. Price from the legal obligation to pay the judgment, and as to the second contention it may be said that the relief granted by the motion in the trial court was not in all respects the relief sought in the instant case. As to both contentions it cannot be stated as a broad proposition that equity will not grant relief to a homesteader under the facts involved in this case. This proposition will be made more apparent as we proceed.

The appellant also contends that the respondents did not require equitable relief (1) because the decree perpetually staying execution fully protected the homestead interest and afforded adequate relief at law; and (2) because respondents did not require a decree to facilitate the sale of the premises for a sale would terminate the homestead and thereby render protection unnecessary; and (3) because, if the homestead is voluntarily sold, the statute fully protects the proceeds of sale, thus rendering a decree of a court of equity wholly unnecessary. Each of the last propositions is nearly correct, but is slightly inaccurate. It will be observed that the answer admitted all the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint, and that in their complaint the plaintiffs had alleged "That the defendant asserts and claims that the said judgment so as aforesaid rendered and entered in its favor against the said W. C. Price is still in full force and effect, * * *" and that the acts and claims of the defendant "have created and caused doubts as to the validity of the said homestead right of plaintiffs in and to the said homestead premises * * *" and have rendered it impossible for plaintiffs to sell or mortgage the said homestead premises, and will continue to cloud the title of plaintiffs to said homestead premises and the homestead right of plaintiffs. * * *" Comparing one with the other, it must be conceded that the order staying execution was not addressed to the matters contained in the quotations which we have just made from the pleadings. To say that the respondents did not require a decree to facilitate a sale is to ignore a fact admitted by the pleadings. Conceding that if a sale is made the statute protects the proceeds leads us nowhere. There can be no proceeds of a sale if, as alleged in the complaint, no sale can be had so long as the record title stands as it stood before the decree in the instant case.

The contention of the appellant that the respondents are not entitled to a decree until they do equity is a fundamental rule. But we do not believe that the rule is to be applied in a case brought by a homesteader in which it is an admitted fact that, although he has complied with every statute, nevertheless one of his former creditors is making such contentions that the homestead can neither be sold nor mortgaged. The right to mortgage and the right to sell a homestead are two valuable property rights which the homesteader is entitled to have fully protected by the decrees of the courts. Without first paying the moral obligation, or offering to do so, the homesteader or his grantee has applied to the courts and has been given relief at law, or in equity, when necessary, fully protecting the homestead and the incidental rights flowing therefrom. Thus in the case of Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal. 226, 234, 22 Pac. 1145, 10 Am. St. Rep. 108, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the trial court issuing an injunction against the sheriff restraining him from selling the homestead property. To the same effect was Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 134, 24 Pac. 853. In the case of Security Loan, etc., Co. v. Kauffman, 108 Cal. 214, 41 Pac. 467, the court affirmed a judgment in favor of the homesteader's wife, refusing to foreclose a mortgage on the homestead which she had not executed on her part. Lange v. Geiser, 138 Cal. 682, 72 Pac. 343, is closely parallel to the instant case; but it will be conceded that the answer of this appellant slightly distinguishes the case at bar from the Lange Case. In the case of Magneson v. Pacific Mfg. Co., 26 Cal. App. 52, 146 Pac. 69, the court affirmed the judgment of the trial court rendered in favor of the wife of the homesteader in an action brought by her to quiet title. The latter case cites other cases from California where equity interfered to protect fully and completely the homestead right. So, in this case, we think that in view of the allegations of the pleadings, the trial court did not err in entertaining the application of the respondents for the relief which they sought.

The judgment is affirmed.

McKESSON v. HEPP. (Civ. 4428.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 21, 1923.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 253(1)—Not erroneous because in excess of amount prayed for.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 580, which, in absence of answer, precludes the granting of relief in excess of the amount demanded, but provides that in any other case the court may grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue, a judgment in other than a default case in excess of the amount demanded is not because of that fact erroneous.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1122(2), 1140(1)—Appellate court held without authority to make findings, and excessive judgment accordingly reversed.

On appeal, where findings below have been waived, the appellate court is without authority to make findings, and a judgment which is clearly excessive must accordingly be reversed, unless the excess is remitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by R. F. McKesson against Israel Hepp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed on condition.

O. D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellant.

J. M. Thomas, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $467.46 for goods sold and delivered, with interest thereon from October 21, 1921. The complaint was filed November 25, 1921. The answer denied the indebtedness and set up a counterclaim in the sum of $164.09. The case went to trial, and plaintiff recovered judgment on June 23, 1922, for the sum of $474.66, with interest from the 16th day of July, 1921, amounting to the sum of $7.20.

Upon both principal and interest, it will be noticed, the judgment is in excess of the amount prayed for.

Findings were waived.

The evidence upon the trial—which is before us—shows without conflict that defendant was entitled to a credit in the sum of $44.09 under one of the items of his counterclaim. Defendant sought to have the matter corrected upon motion for a new trial. His motion was denied. He is here asking for a modification of the judgment. There is no contention with reference to this state of the record. At the hearing of the motion for a new trial plaintiff contended, and does here, that inasmuch as findings were waived the defendant is in no position to take advantage of the situation and is without remedy.

[1] The judgment, in so far as it awards plaintiff an amount in excess of that which he prayed for, is not for that reason objectionable. Section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint, but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue."

The relief provided for by this section is confined in case of default to that demanded in the complaint, as was the rule under a prayer for special relief in equity; while in other cases it is extended to granting relief similar to that granted under a prayer for general relief in chancery courts. Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 33 Pac. 908. The section is but a concise statement of the rule observed upon the subject of relief in courts of equity. Mock v. Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 58 Pac. 826. A court may, therefore, under the section grant additional relief under the original complaint, without an amendment thereof for that purpose alone, when the relief is not inconsistent with the pleadings and the issues tried. Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 79 Pac. 527; Securities Loan Co. v. Boston, etc., Fruit Co., 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 941, 59 Pac. 296; Murphy v. Stelling, 8 Cal. App. 702, 97 Pac. 672. Here there is evidence to show that plaintiff was entitled to the additional amounts allowed him. This being so, there is no merit in appellant's contention that the relief granted should have been confined to the amount stated in the prayer of the complaint.

[2] The evidence, however, shows, and without conflict, that defendant was entitled under one of his items of counterclaim to a credit of $44.09 for freight paid by him. The judgment, therefore, to this extent, with the interest allowed thereon, is excessive. We are without authority to make findings upon the subject, and the judgment must accordingly be reversed unless the excess is remitted.

If respondent shall within 30 days file in this court a stipulation to the effect that the judgment may be modified by reducing the amount $49.10, with the interest allowed thereon, the judgment thus modified is affirmed; otherwise it is reversed. The appellant shall recover costs on this appeal in either event.

TOLOSANO v. WILL. (Civ. 4342.)

1. Appeal and error — Finding on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

Appellate court is without power to review questions of fact determined by the trial court on conflicting evidence.

2. Brokers — License of real estate broker by state department held sufficiently established.

In a broker's action for commission, a duplicate license issued in lieu of the lost original held sufficient to show plaintiff was duly licensed; it being unnecessary to establish such fact by evidence of the original license.

3. Brokers — Realty broker's principal place of business named in license need not be his only place to avoid cancellation under statute.

Though a realty broker's license recited that a certain place was the licensee's "principal place of business," and also declared that the license was "void except at this place of business," held, that the licensee was not required to maintain the office at the place named in the license as his exclusive place of business in order to avoid the automatic cancellation of his license pursuant to St. 1919, p. 1252, § 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1294.

4. Brokers — Introduction of duplicate license by realty broker prima facie proof he has been duly licensed.

A real estate broker suing to recover a commission, who produces a duplicate license certified from the state, prima facie establishes his status as a duly licensed broker; the burden being on defendant, if he desires, to show a cancellation of that license.

5. Brokers — Realty broker's contract held sufficiently definite as to property involved to sustain recovery of commission.

In an action by a realty broker to recover a commission where the contract between the parties sued upon was written on a "listing card" which described the property as 40 acres "located twelve miles west of F., also thirty-six acres of said land are planted to Thompson grapes, four years old and four acres of alfalfa," and which also contained a description of the improvements, farming tools, and implements thereon, held sufficiently definite as to the property involved to sustain a judgment for plaintiff, particularly in view of testimony by defendant that he owned 40 acres in that locality and did not own any other 40 acres.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by M. A. Tolosano against A. M. Will. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.
Savage, Lopez & Lovejoy, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $2,000. The plaintiff is a real estate broker and brought the action to recover 5 per cent. commission under a contract between himself and defendant for the sale of certain real property near Fresno owned by defendant. Plaintiff alleged the making of the contract in writing and the production of a purchaser by him ready, able, and willing to purchase under the terms of the said contract, and the refusal of the defendant to consummate the transaction.

[1] There is some conflict in the testimony as to the signing of the contract between the parties, also a suggestion of change in its terms, etc., but the trial court, after hearing all the testimony, concluded in its findings that the contract was signed by the defendant; that plaintiff did not change or cause any alterations to be made in the same; that plaintiff produced a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the terms and conditions agreed upon between plaintiff and defendant; that plaintiff duly performed all the terms and conditions of the contract between himself and defendant upon his part to be performed, but that the defendant refused to complete the sale of said property. We shall not go back of these findings and discuss the conflicting evidence found in the record upon these questions of fact, as we are without power to review questions of fact settled by the trial court upon conflicting evidence.

[2] The only substantial attack made by the appellant upon the findings is with reference to the finding that at all times mentioned the plaintiff was duly licensed by the real estate department of the state of California as a real estate broker under the provisions of the laws of the state of California licensing real estate brokers. Upon this matter the evidence is without conflict. It is alleged and found that the contract between the parties was entered into on April 9, 1921, and that the purchaser was produced on May 4, 1921. The plaintiff offered in evidence a license from the state of California to engage in the real estate business as an individual broker, which reads as follows:

"M. A. Tolosano, whose principal place of business is at No. 319-20 Griffith-McKenzie Bldg., in the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, having paid to the Real Estate Commissioner of the State of California the sum of seven and 50/100 dollars and having complied with all conditions as required by law, license is hereby granted him to act in the capacity of real estate broker, as provided by law, for the period from April 1, 1921 to January 1, 1922.

"Void except at this place of business.

"Witness my hand and official seal this twenty-third day of May, 1921 [Seal of Real Estate Commissioner.]

"Edwin T. Keiser, Real Estate Commissioner of the State of California.

"Reason issued: Duplicate lost in transit.

"No charge for this license."

Indorsed across said license: "1921, Duplicate License."

Appellant contends that this duplicate license, issued in May, 1921, attempted to relate back to April 1, 1921, and that the real estate commissioner has no power to make a license retroactive. We think that question is not presented by the record. The license, on its face, shows that it was issued as a duplicate because the original had been lost in transit. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that he was a duly licensed real estate broker by the evidence of the original license itself. If the license had been lost or destroyed, its efficiency would not have been impaired thereby and proof could have been made by the certificate of the real estate commissioner that the same had been duly issued. This duplicate license in evidence is, for all purposes, such a certificate.

[3] It is contended that the plaintiff was not doing business at the place specified in the license and, therefore, under the act relating to real estate brokers (Stats. 1919, p. 1252, as amended by Stats. 1921, p. 1294), section 11 thereof, the license was automatically canceled. No question of law in relation to this matter is presented by the record, because the facts in evidence do not bear out appellant's contention. The duplicate license recites that plaintiff's principal place of business is 319 Griffith-McKenzie Building. Plaintiff testified that on April 9th, the time of the execution of the contract, he had his own license; that at the time he and Mr. Stevenson were working as a partnership, he had a partnership license, but that he had sent it back because it "wasn't good form" and got his license. He continued:

"I sent the license in the first part of April, before I leave 1025 J street; was to move to 1909 Fresno. I send my license in, I send my old license back, and send them a check to send me the new license."

This testimony does not indicate that the Griffith-McKenzie Building was not the principal place of business of the plaintiff. The statement that he "was to move to 1909 Fresno" is not a statement that he actually did move here, but even though we were to concede that the statement is susceptible of such a construction, nevertheless plaintiff is not required to maintain an office in the Griffith-McKenzie Building as his exclusive place of business.

[4] We think that when the plaintiff produced the duplicate license certificate from the state of California, he made prima facie proof of his status as a duly licensed broker, and if defendant wished to show any facts which effected a cancellation of the same, it was his duty to take up that burden.

[5] The only other point requiring discussion is the contention of appellant that the property involved here is not sufficiently described in the contract between the parties to make the same a valid and enforceable obligation. The contract between the parties was written upon what is known as a "listing card." It was offered in evidence. Upon that card, among other matters, the property is described as 40 acres, located 12 miles west of Fresno; also that 36 acres of said land are planted to Thompson grapes, four years old, and 4 acres of alfalfa; that there is situated upon the property a house of three rooms, a barn, a tankhouse, a windmill, and an electric plant. The number of sweat boxes, picking boxes, horses, farming tools, and implements upon the premises were also stated.

Plaintiff testified that he asked for a description of the land by metes and bounds, but that defendant was unable to furnish the same, but told plaintiff to go to the assessor's office and get the description. Plaintiff secured the description from the assessor's office and filed it with the card as a part of the contract. At the trial defendant objected to this particular description being admitted in evidence as a part of the contract and is contending on appeal that it should have been excluded and that without it the description in the contract is insufficient to make it enforceable.

It would seem that when defendant told plaintiff to secure this description from the assessor's office for the contract, he made him his agent to do so and to make it a part of the contract between the parties. However that may be, it is unnecessary to so hold for a decision of the legal problem involved, for we think the contract was sufficient without the description obtained from the office of the assessor. The defendant testified that he did not own any other 40 acres adjoining this property and that the property described in the complaint was the only property he owned in the locality. He also testified that he resided 12 miles west of Fresno on Belmont avenue on the property described in the complaint, and that he was the owner of said property, which was the same property set out in the listing contract.

The case of California Packing Corp. v. Grove, 51 Cal. App. 253, 196 Pac. 891, is peculiarly apt in this connection. In that case the description of the real property in the contract was "The following orchards and lands leased or owned by the seller in the county of —, state of California, to wit: Located $\frac{3}{4}$ miles southeast of Visalia." The contract then stated the number of acres planted and the varieties of fruit upon the same. The appellate court said, quoting from Mulford v. LeFranc, 26 Cal. 108:

"But if the meaning of the language of the instrument can be considered doubtful, 'another rule of construction is, that when the words of a grant are ambiguous, the court will call in the aid of the acts done under it as a clue to the intention of the parties.'"

In said case of California Packing Corp. v. Grove, supra, the following pertinent language appears:

"Independently of any construction based upon the acts of the parties, the language used in the description is sufficiently definite. In considering this point the court is required to keep in mind two leading principles. First, in a conveyance of real property, the law exacts only such description as, when aided by evidence applying the description to the property, will serve to identify it; and, secondly, it requires no such completeness of description in executory contracts. Upon the second point we cite Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. 386, where the court says: 'But the rule as to particularity of description required in executory contracts to convey is extremely liberal in favor of their sufficiency. The rule is, that where the description, so far as it goes, is consistent, but does not appear to be complete, it may be completed by extrinsic parol evidence, provided a new description is not introduced into the body of the contract, and the complaint must contain the averments of such extrinsic matter as may be necessary to render the description complete. * * * But parol evidence cannot be heard to furnish a description. The only purpose for which such evidence can be heard is to apply the description given to the subject-matter. Thus if the description were my farm in Los Angeles county, an allegation in the complaint that I owned but one farm in said county and where it was situated, would apply the description to the proper subject-matter and render it certain. But if the description were a farm in Los Angeles county, it could not be rendered certain by the allegation of such extrinsic matter.' Again, in another case, the court says: 'This, it is to be remembered, is a contract for the sale of land and not a deed of grant of the land, and much greater liberality is allowed in construing the descriptions contained in such contracts. The certainty required in deeds is not essential where even by parol evidence the property, in contemplation of the parties, to be conveyed can be definitely ascertained. * * * And even in the case of deeds, the ancient strictness of the rule is not adhered to.' Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 Pac. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207.

"But in this case now under review, the description of the land and its identity are only incidental to the main purposes of the contract. The contract does not involve the title or right of possession of the land. And it seems that in such case, even a less stringent rule applies than in the case of executory contracts to convey land. As said by this court, quoting from an earlier case: 'Much greater liberality is allowed in construing and curing defective descriptions in broker's contracts than in a deed of grant of land, for, so far as the statute of frauds is concerned, the terms of the employment are the essential part, and such contracts will not be declared void merely because of a defect, uncertainty, or ambiguity in the description of the property to be sold or exchanged when such defect can be cured by the allegation or proof of extrinsic facts or circumstances.' Goodrich v. Turney, 30 Cal. App. Dec. 683, 186 Pac. 806."

The cases of Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 377, 97 Pac. 885, and Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 10, 79 Pac. 527, are also in point upon the subject under discussion.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. Names — 10—Husband signing sale contract of own property with wife's initial held bound.

Where defendant A. K. executed a contract to sell raisins, signing M. K., the M. being the initial of his wife's first name, and in an action by the buyer to reform the contract and recover damages for defendant's breach it was shown without dispute that the land and the raisins belonged to defendant, the question of his agency for his wife became immaterial; defendant being liable on his contract, irrespective of the manner in which it was signed.

2. Names — 10—Person may transact business, execute contracts, sue and be sued by another name than his own, without abandoning latter.

One may adopt and transact business, execute contracts, issue negotiable paper, and sue and be sued by any name, style, or signature wholly different from his own name, without thereby abandoning the latter, and, having so signed a lawful agreement, is bound thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by the California Packing Corporation against M. Kandarian, sometimes known as A. Kandarian. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.
Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno (F. W. Docker, of Fresno, of counsel), for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action to reform a contract and to recover damages for breach thereof as reformed. The plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant, reforming the contract, and giving it judgment against defendant for damages in the sum of $1,000 and costs of suit. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

The contract is one for the sale to plaintiff by defendant of 25 tons of Muscat raisins at 9 cents per pound, said raisins grown by defendant on land owned by him during the year 1919, and to be delivered before December 1, 1919. The contract omitted to describe the land from which the raisins were to come, and it is in this particular that plaintiff sought reformation, alleging that the description was omitted through mutual mistake.

The contract was made upon a printed form known among packers as a "dried fruit contract." It was dated and filled out by W. D. Weaver, a buyer for plaintiff, and signed by him on behalf of plaintiff. Defendant admitted that he knew Weaver and had theretofore had business transactions with him relating to the sale of raisins. He also admitted that he had met and conversed with Weaver about the time it is alleged the contract was made, but he denied that he had ever seen the contract in question, or that the signature "M." Kandarian, subscribed thereto, was his. He said that the signature resembled his "a little, very little, not all." Defendant's real name is "A." Kandarian, and his wife's "Mary" or "M." Kandarian. She cannot write. Witness Weaver told of the meeting between himself and the defendant at the time the contract was made. He testified in part as follows:

"He (Kandarian) asked me what I was doing. I said still buying raisins, and he says, 'I will sell you 25 ton.' He asked me the price, and I told him 9 cents, and he says, 'I will sell you 25 ton,' so I says 'All right,' and I just pulled out my contract book and started in making the contract, A. Kandarian, and he says, 'No; make it M. Kandarian.' So I proceed to write it accordingly."

Weaver testified positively that the defendant signed the contract "M." Kandarian" in his presence. Judge Woolley was witness for plaintiff. Reference is made to his appearance at the trial, and his testimony is summed up as follows by counsel for defendant in his brief:

"J. E. Woolley, one of the superior court judges of Fresno county, formerly in the employ of Short & Sutherland, attorneys for plaintiff, was called as a witness. He testified on behalf of plaintiff that when the action was first brought, he called Mr. Kandarian to his office, and that he (Kandarian) admitted that he had signed his wife's name to the contract, and also that he had sold all of his own raisins at the time Mr. Weaver, the agent of the plaintiff, came to his place."

Counsel for defendant urges in his brief three grounds for reversal of the judgment, as follows:

"First, that the contract pleaded is not the contract proved.

"Second, that the evidence does not sustain the judgment reforming contract.

"Third, that the defendant was acting as agent for the principal at the time he signed the contract."

Upon the oral argument before this court counsel for defendant abandoned and waived the first two grounds above named, and rests his appeal solely upon the third ground. He argues in support thereof that—

"It was evidently intended that the defendant M. Kandarian, the wife of A. Kandarian, would sell to the plaintiff corporation 25 tons of raisins upon her approval of the contract."

[1, 2] The undisputed evidence shows that the land belonged to defendant, and that the crop was his. No showing was made that defendant's wife had any interest in either crop or land. Because of the situation disclosed by the evidence, we think the question of agency is immaterial. The trial court found that the defendant "executed said agreement in writing and signed his name as M. Kandarian." There is ample evidence to support such a finding. Defendant chose to sign his name as "M." Kandarian. There is nothing in the law which inhibited his doing so, and, having so signed an agreement in all respects lawful, he is bound thereby. Without abandoning his real name, a person may adopt any name, style, or signature wholly different from his own name by which he may transact business, execute contracts, issue negotiable paper, and sue and be sued. Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 86, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983; Badger Lumber Co. v. Collinson, 97 Kan. 791, 156 Pac. 724.

The judgment is affirmed.

Joseph G. De Forest, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order confirming the sale of certain real property in the above-entitled estate.

The facts are substantially without conflict. It appears therefrom that the First Federal Trust Company, executor of the will of Jeremiah Lynch, advertised a sale of certain real property under the provisions of section 1549 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The notice stated that the executor would sell at private sale on or after Monday, the 9th day of October, 1922, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, to the highest bidder therefor, upon the terms and conditions mentioned. One of the terms provided that all bids or offers should be in writing. In response to this notice four bids were received by the executor, and subsequently, at the time stated in the notice, the representatives of such bidders were present in the office of the executor when the bids were opened. The executor announced that the highest bid received was $131,550, and then asked if there was any one who wished to raise the amount.

Thereupon one of the bidders made an oral offer in a higher sum. Other bids followed, the appellant herein raising his own offer twice, until finally one Louis Levin made a bid of $136,000, which was the highest one received, and, upon being reduced to writing, it was accepted by the executor, and 10 per cent. of the purchase price was thereupon paid. Appellant's original bid made in response to the notice of sale was the highest sealed one received, it being $131,550. No objection, however, was made by him to the action of the executor in calling for or receiving higher bids. On the contrary, as heretofore stated, when such bids were asked for, he voluntarily and without objection entered into the competitive bidding. Thereafter the executor filed a return in the superior court of the sale to Louis Levin at the price of $136,000. At the hearing, and for the first time, appellant objected to the confirmation of the sale on the ground that it was not legally made or fairly conducted, for the reason that the executor, instead of accepting the highest written bid offered, proceeded to open the bidding to all present in the manner of a sale at public auction.

In his objections to the confirmation of the sale appellant prayed that the court order and direct the executor to confirm his bid and offer, or in its discretion order a new sale to be made. The court overruled the objection, and confirmed the sale to Mr. Levin at $136,000. The appraised value of the property in June, 1922, was $130,000. Appellant here seeks a reversal of the order of confirmation, claiming that an agreement of sale was created between him and the executor upon the return of his sealed bid, and that the sale to Levin was void for the reason that it was accepted pursuant to a sale at public auction rather than at private sale as advertised.

It is argued in support of this contention that, by reason of the change in the statutory provisions of the Code relating to sales and conveyances of property of deceased persons, there is now no provision which declares that a sale by an executor is invalid until confirmed; that as the law now stands an executor may sell property of the estate upon his own initiative whenever he thinks that such sale is necessary to pay the debts and legacies, or when it is for the advantage, benefit, or best interests of the estate and those interested therein, without an order of court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1536); and that a sale when made is binding upon the estate unless there exists some statutory ground for refusing it as laid down in the Code (In re Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451; Bennalack v. Richards, 125 Cal. 427, 58 Pac. 65; Estate of Robinson, 142 Cal. 152, 75 Pac. 777). These cases have to do with the validity of executed sales between executors and purchasers, and they declare under what circumstances they must be confirmed. We fail, however, to see in what manner appellant is aided in his contention by the doctrine announced therein. The vice of appellant's argument is in assuming that the acts here presented constitute a sale. The notice merely amounts to an indication to sell; and the mere submission of a bid in response thereto cannot be construed as an acceptance of an offer. That the executor did not accept the appellant's bid (offer) is evidenced by his act in calling for higher bids and his acceptance of the Levin offer. The act of the executor in advertising for bids did not, therefore, constitute an offer. It was but a mere preliminary act, amounting to no more than a mere solicitation of bids, leading up to a sale. The bid of appellant was, of course, an offer, but until accepted no rights were created thereby between the parties. There is nothing in the advertisement to the effect that the sale would be without reserve; and, even in the case of sales by auction, in the absence of such condition it has been uniformly held that the mere advertising for bids does not in itself constitute an offer, but is rather a mere invitation for an offer, and that the property advertised may be withdrawn at any time before acceptance. 1 Williston on Sales, § 30 et seq.; Civ. Code, § 1794. Had the notice contained the announcement that the sale would be without reserve, there might be some merit in appellant's contention. Civ. Code, § 1796.

We do not wish to be understood, therefore, as holding that it is not possible for one seeking tenders to be bound by a notice expressed in positive terms that he will accept the highest bid. The case, however, does not present this situation. If the effect of a notice of public auction sale does not constitute an offer, there is every reason for holding that one of private sale does not. There is no distinction in principle. Then, again, the notice stated that the executor would sell at private sale on or after the time mentioned therein, which indicates that other bids would be considered if presented subsequently. This is in conformity with the duty of the executor to obtain the best possible price for the property intrusted to his care, and is in keeping with the requirements of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1549) providing that such sales must not be made before the day noticed, but must be made within six months thereafter. The further objection is made that the sale to Mr. Levin was made upon an oral bid, which was void under the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 1549. There is no merit in this contention. From the evidence it appears that, upon acceptance of the highest bid, it was immediately reduced to writing, and the necessary deposit made.

There was nothing in connection with the sale that was unfair, and the price obtained was the highest offered, and there is no evidence to show that it was disproportionate to the value of the property; nor was there any legal reason presented against its confirmation. There was, therefore, nothing left for the court to do but to confirm it. Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 Pac. 171. Respondent claims in support of the order that whatever rights appellant may have had he waived when he entered into the competitive bidding, and that his act in so doing constituted a relinquishment of his bid, and he is therefore estopped to object to the confirmation of the sale. Considering the conclusion we have reached, it is unnecessary to discuss or decide this question.

Concluding, as we do, that the notice of sale amounted to nothing more than a solicitation for bids, the response thereto by appellant created in him no rights, his offer not having been accepted. This being so, the judgment should be, and is hereby, affirmed.

KENNARD v. BINNEY et al. (Civ. 4183.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 101(2)—Complaint in absence of specific demurrer held sufficient to sustain default judgment foreclosing mortgage.

A complaint, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, alleging contrary to the terms of the mortgage which was made a part thereof that the mortgage conveyed certain shares of water stock, held sufficient, in the absence of a specific demurrer to sustain a default judgment.

2. Judgment $\S$ 128—Default judgment in foreclosure proceedings held not in excess of relief demanded.

Where the complaint, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, asked only for a sale of the "lands and premises," held that a default judgment decreeing a sale of the land described and various shares of irrigation water stocks, held not invalid as being in excess of the relief demanded; it being presumed in support of the judgment that the water stocks involved were issued in compliance with Civ. Code, § 324, and were therefore appurtenant to the land.

3. Judgment $\S$ 101(2)—Confusion in use of names in a complaint held not to render invalid a default judgment.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage on realty and water stock, some confusion in the use of the names of the water companies, whose shares of stock were involved, held not such irregularities as would invalidate the default judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Flora H. Kennard against George A. Binney and wife and the Glendora Co-operative Fumigating Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and first-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Clark, Law & Clay, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles S. Davis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendants George A. Binney and Jennie I. Binney, his wife. These defendants interposed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and, upon their failure to answer, judgment by default was rendered against them. The transcript on appeal contains no copy of defendants' demurrer, but it is conceded by each party to the action that it was a general demurrer. The complaint contained the following allegations:

"That on the 22d day of March, 1912, this plaintiff and her husband, E. O. Kennard, by grant deed, for a consideration of $25,000, sold and delivered to George A. Binney and Jennie I. Binney, his wife, the herein mortgaged premises and certain water and water rights, which water and water rights were afterwards represented by and converted into thirty shares of the Glendora Consolidated Mutual Irrigating Company stocks of a value of $3,000, and two shares of Cienega Springs stock, with a value of $200, and at the same time and place the said purchasers gave back a purchase-money mortgage to said Flora H. and E. O. Kennard, covering the same premises in question and the said thirty shares of Glendora Consolidated Mutual Water Company stocks and the two shares of Cienega Springs stock."

A copy of the mortgage was annexed to the complaint as an exhibit, and the mortgaged property was described therein as follows:

"The south 10 acres of the east one-half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 30, township 1 north, range 9 west, S. B. M., including all buildings and improvements thereon or that may be erected thereon; together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances, water and water rights, pipes, flumes, and ditches thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof."

The court in the decree of foreclosure found the amount due on the note and adjudged the same to be a valid lien upon the ten acres of land above described, and upon "thirty shares of Glendora Consolidated Mutual Irrigation Company water stocks, and two shares of Cienega Springs Company water stocks."

Defendants appeal from the judgment, and advance two reasons why the same should be reversed: First, that there is no allegation in the complaint warranting the court ordering the sale of said water stock; and, secondly, that the prayer of the complaint falls to ask for the sale of the water stock.

[1] Appellants' first contention is that the complaint, having set out the mortgage in full any allegation therein contrary to the terms of the mortgage to the effect that the shares of water stock were covered by the mortgage is surplusage, that the same must be so regarded by the court, and that such an allegation cannot support a judgment based thereon.

In Linz v. McIver & Becker, 29 Cal. App. 470, 156 Pac. 1000, the court said:

"The general allegations of the complaint were sufficient * * * to charge the defendant [Becker] as an individual maker of the promissory note sued upon. The complaint, however, contains a copy of the note, which shows that defendant Becker signed his name thereto as a member of the firm of McIver & Becker and not as an individual maker thereof. The only question involved upon this appeal is whether the variance between the general allegation of the complaint and the face of the note is fatal to the plaintiff's judgment. The rule in this state is that a variance between the direct allegations of a complaint and a copy of an instrument set forth therein, or an exhibit attached thereto, can be successfully attacked only by special demurrer, and cannot be taken advantage of by general demurrer. Mendocino County v. Morris, 32 Cal. 145. In the case of Blasingame v. Home Ins. Co., 75 Cal. 633, 17 Pac. 925, the appellant therein relied for a reversal of the judgment upon a variance between a direct allegation of the complaint as to the identity of a person to whom a policy of insurance was payable, and an apparently contrary statement in the copy of the policy set forth in the complaint. The court there held that the complaint was sufficient to support the judgment when tested by a general demurrer."

To the same effect is S. F. Sulphur Co. v. Aetna Indem. Co., 11 Cal. App. 695-698, 106 Pac. 111. From these authorities, and there seems to be none holding a contrary rule, it is apparent that the complaint is sufficient to support the judgment.

[2] The further objection is made to the judgment that, being a judgment on default, it grants relief in excess of the prayer of the complaint, in that the prayer of the complaint only asks for a sale of the "lands and premises," while the judgment decrees a sale of the land described in the mortgage, being the ten-acre tract hereinbefore described, and "thirty shares of Glendora Consolidated Mutual Irrigation Company water stocks, and two shares of the Cienega Springs Company water stocks." Appellants argue that, as the prayer of the complaint asks only for the sale of the "lands and premises," and there is no allegation in the complaint that the water stock is appurtenant to the land, that it will be assumed that the water stock referred to is that of a private corporation which is personal property and not appurtenant to the land, unless issued as required by section 324 of the Civil Code. With this contention of appellants we cannot agree. Upon the facts stated in the complaint, the stock was appurtenant to the land. Every presumption must be in favor of the regularity of the proceedings upon which the judgment is based and of the validity of the judgment, and, where any error is claimed, it is the duty of the appellant to produce the record clearly showing such error. U. S. Film Co. v. U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co., 44 Cal. App. 227-229, 186 Pac. 364. In the present case the record contains no copy of the shares of stock of the water companies involved herein, and there is nothing to indicate from the record before us whether they were issued in the ordinary manner prescribed for the issuance of shares of stock by corporations, in which event they would be personal property, or whether they were issued in compliance with the provisions of section 324 of the Civil Code, whereby they would become appurtenant to the land. Under such a condition of the record it is our duty, in support of the judgment, to presume that they were issued in the manner which made them appurtenant to the land. Woodstone M. & T. Co. v. Dunsmore, etc., Co., 47 Cal. App. 72-78, 190 Pac. 213. If the water stock was appurtenant to the land, then it was a part and parcel thereof, and would pass by a conveyance thereof, whether mentioned in the conveyance or not. This being true, it would be unnecessary to refer to them specifically in the prayer of the complaint, after having asked that the "land and premises" be sold. The water stock would be as much a part of the "land and premises" as the buildings thereon or any other appurtenances.

[3] There appears to be some confusion in the use of the names of the water companies whose shares of stock are involved in this action. In some instances the Glendora Consolidated Mutual Irrigation Company is referred to as the Glendora Consolidated Mutual Irrigating Company and in others as the Glendora Consolidated Mutual Water Company, and the Cienega Springs stock is referred to as the Cienega Springs Company water stocks, Cienega Springs water stocks, and the Cienega Springs Water Company stocks, but in our opinion these irregularities do not invalidate the judgment.

We find no errors in the record sufficient to justify a reversal of the case, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MURPHY. (Cr. 695.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1923.)

1. Criminal law — 1023(3)—Order denying permission to withdraw plea of guilty reviewable on appeal from judgment.

On appeal from a judgment rendered after a plea of guilty in a prosecution for attempt to commit robbery, the court's order denying defendant's motion for permission to withdraw his plea of guilty is properly reviewable.

2. Robbery — 24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for attempt to rob.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction for attempt to rob.

3. Criminal law — 274, 1149—Abuse of discretion in refusing to permit withdrawal of plea of guilty held unestablished; permitting withdrawal discretionary.

The granting of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty is within the trial court's discretion, and not reviewable in the absence of a showing of abused discretion, and where defendant was represented by counsel both in the justice court and in the superior court, where at the time of his arraignment he received a copy of the information and entered a plea of guilty, it cannot be said there was an abuse of discretion in denying permission to withdraw the plea of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Willie Murphy appeals from a denial of his motion to withdraw a plea of guilty of attempt to commit robbery. Affirmed.

George J. Raymond, T. A. Farrell, and Theodore W. Chester, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JONES, Justice pro tem. The appellant and one Hatler were jointly charged with an attempt to commit robbery on H. C. Cann. Upon his arraignment in the superior court the appellant pleaded guilty and asked for probation, but before his motion for probation was passed upon, he moved the court for permission to withdraw his plea, the motion being based upon the ground that the plea of guilty had been made through inadvertence, ignorance, and without due deliberation. In his affidavit filed in support of the motion, the appellant claims that he was not aware of the fact that he was charged with an attempt to rob Cann, and that he had not had any intention of robbing Cann. This motion was denied, as was also the motion for probation, and the court rendered judgment, from which an appeal has been taken.

[1] In support of his appeal appellant presents but one ground—that the court erred in not permitting the withdrawal of his plea, and properly maintains that the order denying his motion may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment. People v. Dabner, 153 Cal. 398, 95 Pac. 880.

[2] On the hearing of the motion in the superior court, all the testimony produced at the preliminary examination of the two codefendants was made a part of the record, and an examination of that testimony shows that the appellant admits that, on November 25, 1922, in the evening, he and Hatler, in an automobile went out on the H street road just out of Sacramento, with the intention of holding up travelers on the highway, and that he, (Murphy) carried a revolver and had a handkerchief tied around his neck in such manner that it could be used as a mask. Two attempts to stop passing machines were made; but, their efforts not proving successful, he and his confederate, according to his statement, abandoned their plans to rob, and started back to the city.

In the meantime, two deputy sheriffs, in response to telephone calls, drove along the road, and, going beyond the machine of appellant for a short distance, turned back and followed the appellant, and they observed that the license plates on appellant's automobile were covered. After proceeding a short distance, the latter machine came to a stop, and appellant got out and walked toward the deputies, who had brought their machine to a standstill. In a statement made after his arrest, appellant stated that he went back to "see why they were following us so close," and that, as he approached the deputies, his hand was on his gun in his coat pocket, but that he did not intend to rob them, and did not take his gun out of his pocket or try to. The deputies, however, each testified, at the preliminary examination, that the appellant came up to their machine and pulled a gun partly out of his pocket, at which time one of the deputies pointed a gun at him and compelled him to throw up his hands. He and his companion were then put under arrest and later were jointly charged in the justice court with the crime of attempting to rob the deputy, Cann.

At the preliminary examination, held on February 21, 1923, the appellant was represented by counsel, and, though waiving the reading of the complaint, was present when it was read to his codefendant. Upon the conclusion of the preliminary examination the two defendants were held to answer to the superior court, and when appearing there, on February 27th, for arraignment, the appellant was again represented by the same attorney who had appeared for him in the justice court, and who, in the superior court, apparently waived the reading of the information. At this time a copy of the information was handed to the appellant and on being asked for his plea he said, "Guilty." The motion for probation was then made, and the court, after stating that there "was very little chance for a highway robber to get probation" from it, referred the matter to the probation officer for investigation and report.

That the evidence produced at the preliminary examination would be sufficient, if presented to a jury, to sustain a verdict of guilty, cannot be doubted. People v. Moran, 18 Cal. App. 209, 122 Pac. 969.

[3] The granting of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and before its action will be reversed there must clearly appear to have been an abuse of such discretion. People v. Dabner, supra; People v. Bostic, 167 Cal. 754, 141 Pac. 380; People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 206 Pac. 63, 20 A. L. R. 1441.

No showing was made by appellant that any advantage of him was taken in any of the proceedings leading up to his arraignment in the superior court. He was represented by an attorney in both the justice and superior courts; he was present when the complaint was read to his codefendant in the justice court, and upon his arraignment in the superior court he received a copy of the information (which, he avers, he handed to his attorney without reading), and, when asked for his plea to the charge, he responded that he was guilty. In view of these facts, the trial court was not compelled to accept, as true, the averment of the appellant that he was not aware of the charge of the attempt to rob Cann, and a review of the entire record fails to substantiate his claim that there was an abuse of discretion in not granting his motion. It would therefore follow that the action of the trial court must be upheld.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 71(4)—Order authorizing sale of defendants' property held appealable as final order.

An order for the sale of defendants' property by a receiver under foreclosure proceedings is in effect final as against defendants, since it will deprive them of their property, and hence is appealable.

2. Prohibition $\S$ 3(3)—Writ denied, when appeal from a final order is possible in lieu thereof; "final order."

Order authorizing sale of defendants' property in foreclosure proceedings being a "final Proc. §§ 1102, 1103, and section 963, defining prohibition, excluding it where there is other adequate relief at law, and enumerating cases covered by appeal, respectively.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Order.]

Application for a writ of prohibition by Thomas B. Leeper and others against the Superior Court for Sacramento County and others to restrain a sale under deed of trust and mortgage. Denied.

Thomas B. Leeper and Charles H. Crocker, both of Sacramento, for petitioners.

Devlin & Devlin and T. A. Farrell, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prohibit and restrain the defendants from causing to be sold and selling the certain properties described in the petition. An alternative writ or order to show cause was issued, and on the return day thereof the defendants filed both a demurrer and an answer to the petition.

It appears from the petition that on the 13th day of June, 1917, Herbert Shear, George Bonnefoy, and F. R. M. Bloomer were, as copartners, the owners and in the possession of a wood and coal business in the city of Sacramento, known as the Pioneer Wood & Coal Company, and also a lime quarry, which was carried on under the name of the "El Dorado Lime Quarry," said quarry being situated near the town of Shingle Springs, in El Dorado county; that on the said 13th day of June, 1917, said parties and one G. A. Starkweather entered into a written agreement whereby the former transferred to the latter all their right, title, and interest in and to all the properties mentioned, upon the understanding and agreement that said Starkweather should and would, for the term of one year from the date of said agreement, conduct and manage said properties and businesses for the benefit of said copartners. The said agreement contains many details as to the manner of the management of said properties, and provides that at the end of the term of the same that Starkweather may, at his option, either form two separate and distinct corporations, the one involving or consisting of the wood and coal business and the properties thereof, and the other the quarry properties and business, or return the assets of said business remaining in his hands, after the payment of all debts and liabilities existing against either, to the above-named owners thereof or their assigns. It was further provided that Starkweather was to have sole and exclusive control of the properties and the businesses connected therewith for the term during which the agreement was to exist, and that he "shall have absolute discretion to make contracts, borrow money, buy and sell property, pay off indebtedness, and to do any other act and thing that he may deem necessary for the conduct of said business," etc.

It is made to appear by the petition that, after the making of the above-mentioned agreement, Starkweather organized a corporation under the name of "El Dorado Lime & Minerals Company," to which subsequently he caused to be transferred the quarry properties and business; that thereafter and on the 1st day of May, 1918, said corporation executed in favor of and delivered to the California National Bank, at Sacramento, a trust deed to secure a loan in the sum of $100,000, said deed of trust covering the properties of the lime and quarry business; that on the 15th day of April, 1921, the El Dorado Mines & Minerals Company executed and delivered to said National Bank a mortgage in the sum of $40,000 upon the property of said corporation; that on the 3d day of May, 1921, the California National Bank brought an action in the superior court of the county of Sacramento against the petitioners and others "to foreclose said trust deed and the said mortgage." In said action the complaint alleged that the situation with respect to the properties above referred to and the businesses thereof was such as to call for the appointment of a receiver to take charge, pendente lite, of said properties and businesses, and upon an ex parte hearing of the application for the appointment of such receiver said superior court made an order appointing one J. H. Bell a receiver to take charge of the properties of both the lime business and the wood and coal business. Subsequently, and after several legal attacks were made by the petitioners in the superior court against the order allowing and appointing a receiver, the said superior court, upon an application being made therefor, made an order authorizing and appointing the said receiver to sell the property and the businesses of the wood and coal company, and fixed in said order a day certain for hearing the report of the receiver as to such sale and for the confirmation or rejection thereof. It is against the last-mentioned order, in so far as it authorizes the sale of the said properties, that the attack herein is aimed; it being the contention, as is to be implied from the nature of this proceeding, that in making said order the superior court transcended its lawful jurisdiction.

[1, 2] No appeal was taken from the order appointing the receiver, nor from the order directing the sale of the properties. The petition herein was filed on the 29th day of May, 1923. The writ of prohibition "arrests the proceedings of any tribunal, corporation,

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 5, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 30, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨781(2)—Questions involved in appeal held not to have become moot by reason of respondent's acts since perfection of appeal.

The fact that, since the perfection of an appeal in an action to foreclose a mortgage, respondent had filed a claim, based on the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, and on which judgment was rendered in respondent's favor, and from which judgment the appeal was taken, with the special administrator of the estate of deceased defendant, and that the claim was allowed by such administrator, held not to show that the question involved in the appeal had become moot, where the special administrator was not a party to the appeal.

2. Husband and wife ⇨247—Law in force when community property was acquired determines rights of parties therein with respect to disposition or incumbrance of property.

Law in force at the date community property was acquired determines the rights of the parties therein, and any amendment thereto such as Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, § 2, requiring both husband and wife to join in the execution of an instrument by which property is leased, conveyed, or incumbered, must be confined to community property acquired after the passage of such amendment.

3. Trial ⇨389—Stipulation held to have waived findings of fact.

Stipulation by counsel held to have waived findings of fact.

4. Appeal and error ⇨925(1)—Presumed that trial court rendered opinion in usual manner.

Where a recital in the judgment showed the trial court rendered an opinion but the record does not disclose the form in which it was rendered, it will be presumed it was rendered in the usual manner, which would be either by filing a written opinion or by an entry thereof in the minutes of the clerk.

5. Judgment ⇨12, 273(5)—Entry of judgment for plaintiff after defendant's death held proper.

Where the trial court, before defendant's death, rendered its opinion ordering judgment for plaintiff, it had the right, under Code Civ. Proc. § 669, after defendant's death to order the findings filed nunc pro tunc as of the date of the opinion and to enter judgment upon such findings after defendant's death, but, where the case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, no findings were required, so that under those conditions the court could render judgments after defendant's death.

6. Judgment ⇨220—Recital in judgment that order was made substituting special administrator for deceased defendant held sufficient to sustain judgment, in absence of contrary proof.

A recital in a judgment, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 670, that an order had been made board, or person, whether exercising functions judicial or ministerial, when such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal, corporation, board, or person." Code Civ. Proc. § 1102. "It may be issued by any court, except police or justices' courts, to an inferior tribunal or to a corporation, board, or person, in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law." Code Civ. Proc. § 1103. If the petitioners have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal, the writ will not issue. An appeal lies from an order appointing a receiver. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. In California, etc., Ass'n v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 711, 97 Pac. 769, an application was made for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court and its receiver from selling certain property of the petitioner therein. The appellate court said:

"An order for such sale would be so far independent of suit itself as to make the order therefore substantially a final decree for the purpose of an appeal. Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 134 Cal. 123, 66 Pac. 198. An appeal lying from such an order, there can be no need of a writ of prohibition, and it will not lie."

In Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Calif. etc., Co., 159 Cal. 484, 491, 114 Pac. 838, 840, after reviewing the decisions upon the subject, the court said:

"From these decisions the following rules are clearly deducible. Where the order requires the payment of money by the party complaining (Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 134 Cal. 121, 66 Pac. 198; Anglo-California Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 756, 96 Pac. 803), or the doing of an act by or against him, the order is in effect final as against such party and may be appealed from by him."

For the further history of the case and the decisions relevant thereto, see 164 Cal. 58, 127 Pac. 502, and 171 Cal. 227, 152 Pac. 564. See, also, Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 86, 89, 159 Pac. 147, and Luckenbach v. Krempel, 188 Cal. 175, 204 Pac. 591, 592.

The order for the sale of defendants' property is certainly an order for "the doing of an act * * * against" them, because, if carried into execution, it will deprive them of the property ordered sold, and the order "is in effect final as against such party and may be appealed from." The writ of prohibition prayed for in this case, therefore, will not lie, because an appeal affords a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

The demurrer to the petition is sustained, the writ discharged, the restraining order vacated, and the petition denied.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., and Syllas S. Meyer, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1] Respondent suggested, at the oral argument of this appeal, that, since the perfection of this appeal, certain proceedings had been taken which would render a decision on this appeal the decision of a moot question of law, and therefore that the appeal should be dismissed. In support of his suggestion respondent has filed an affidavit herein to the effect that since the perfection of said appeal respondent has caused to be filed a claim based upon the mortgages sought to be foreclosed in this action, and upon which judgment was rendered in respondent's favor, and from which judgment this appeal was taken, with the special administrator of the estate of James G. Hale, deceased, with the powers of a general administrator, and that said claim was allowed by said special administrator. Said administrator is not a party to this appeal, and we are of the opinion that, conceding all the facts set forth in said affidavit to be true, still they do not show that the question involved in this appeal has become a moot question.

This action was instituted to foreclose two mortgages, executed by James G. Hale to plaintiff. One of said mortgages was dated January 15, 1918, and recorded on the same day, and the other was dated and recorded on January 22, 1918. At the time of the execution of said mortgages the said James G. Hale and appellant, Bessie Hale, were husband and wife, and the real property described in said mortgages was their community property; the same having been acquired prior to the adoption of section 172a of the Civil Code on April 27, 1917. The appellant, Bessie Hale, did not join in the execution of either of said mortgages. The action was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts. After the submission of said action upon said agreed statement, and before judgment was rendered, James G. Hale, one of the defendants in said action, died, and James C. Rives, special administrator of the estate of James G. Hale, deceased, was substituted as defendant in place of said James G. Hale, deceased. Thereupon judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor, in which judgment said mortgages were declared to be valid and a lien upon the whole of the mortgaged premises, and the same were ordered sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the amount found due plaintiff. The defendant Bessie Hale appeals.

[2] Appellant first contends that the mortgages were void, or were at least invalid as against her and her interest in the mortgaged property, for the reason that said property was community property, and she did not join in the execution of said mortgages as required by section 172a of the Civil Code, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, § 2. Said section is as follows:

"The husband has the management and control of the community real property but the wife must join with him in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed, or incumbered. * * *

This section was in effect at the date of the execution of each of said mortgages, but the real property described in said mortgages had been acquired by appellant and her husband prior to the adoption of said section 172a. Before the adoption of said section the husband had the absolute right of disposition of the community property, other than testamentary, as he had of his separate property, provided he could not make a gift of it or convey it without a valuable consideration, without the written consent of the wife. There is no contention that the mortgages in question were not given for a valuable consideration. The only question for decision, therefore, is whether the law in effect at the date the property was acquired, or that in effect at the date of the execution of the mortgage, controls as to the rights of the parties to convey or mortgage the community property. The question was squarely before the Supreme Court in the case of Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, and it was there held that the law in effect at the date the community property was acquired determines the rights of the parties therein, and any amendment thereto must be confined to community property acquired after the passage of such amendment.

[3] It is next contended by appellant that the court had no authority to render judgment in said action after the death of the defendant James G. Hale, for the reason that no decision had been made by the trial court prior to the death of said defendant. Section 669 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"If a party die after a verdict or decision upon any issue of fact, and before judgment, the court may nevertheless render judgment thereon."

In the case of Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328, the defendant Hobart died after the trial of the action, and after the court had filed a written opinion, announcing its conclusion and directing counsel to prepare findings and judgment, but before any findings of fact or conclusions of law had been filed or any judgment rendered by the court. The court thereafter ordered findings and a judgment thereon to be entered against Hobart, nunc pro tunc, as of the date of its written opinion. The Supreme Court approved the action of the trial court in ordering findings filed nunc pro tunc, but set aside the judgment which had been rendered nunc pro tunc as of the date prior to the death of Hobart, and directed the court to enter judgment against Hobart as of the date of the judgment against the codefendants of Hobart, which was after the death of Hobart. In this case the court said:

"In the present case, therefore, it was proper for the court to direct that its findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon should be filed as of a date anterior to the death of Hobart. By so doing the decision became in all respects as effective as if actually made before his death, and by the provisions of section 669 the judgment thereon could be entered after his death."

As we have already seen, this action had been submitted upon an agreed statement of facts prior to the death of Hale. In this statement of facts was the following stipulation:

"It is stipulated that judgment may be entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, James G. Hale, for the aggregate amount of principal sums of said two promissory notes, to wit, the aggregate sum of $1,083.04, together with interest thereon according to the terms and conditions of said promissory notes respectively, aggregating the sum of $261.40, computed to the 1st day of July, 1921, and in addition thereto reasonable attorney's fees in the sum of $100, if the court finds plaintiff is entitled thereto; and furthermore, if the court finds that the two writings denominated mortgages are valid mortgages and create a valid and subsisting lien upon the real property therein described, whether restricted to the interest of James G. Hale therein or covering the community interests of said James G. Hale and Bessie Hale, then, that the usual decree of foreclosure of said mortgages may be duly rendered and made herein in accordance with the prayer of plaintiff's complaint."

Under such an agreed statement of facts findings were waived. City of Los Angeles

v. L. A. Farming & Milling Co., 152 Cal. 645, 93 Pac. 869, 1135.

[4, 5] The judgment contained the following recital:

"The court orders that judgment be entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, as prayed for in plaintiff's complaint on file herein. It being made further to appear to the court that the defendant James G. Hale having left this life subsequent to the order of this court ordering judgment in favor of the plaintiff as aforesaid."

From this recital in the judgment it would appear that the court had, prior to the death of Hale, rendered its opinion and directed judgment in plaintiff's favor. The record does not disclose the form in which this opinion was rendered, but from the recital in the judgment we must presume that it was rendered in the usual manner, which would be either by filing a written opinion in the action, or by an entry thereof in the minutes of the clerk. After the rendering of this opinion the court, under the authority of Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., supra, had the right, after the death of Hale, to have ordered findings filed, nunc pro tunc, as of the date said opinion was filed, and upon such findings to have entered judgment after the death of Hale. The case, however, having been submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, no findings were required. The court, therefore, in our opinion, was authorized under these conditions to render the judgment after the death of the defendant Hale.

[6] The third ground advanced by appellant as a reason why the judgment should be set aside is that the judgment roll does not contain any order substituting James C. Rives, as special administrator, as a defendant in the place of James G. Hale, deceased, as required by section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The judgment recites that such an order was made. This recital was sufficient to sustain the judgment without some proof to the contrary, and no such proof is found in the record.

"The mere absence from the roll of a paper—for example, the return of the officer showing a service of the summons—cannot invalidate the judgment when the judgment itself recites the fact that the defendant was duly served with process." Whitney v. Daggett, 108 Cal. 232-235, 41 Pac. 471.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SHERWOOD v. TURNER et al. (Civ. 2690.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 3, 1923.)

1. Exchange of property ⇨8(4)—Testimony as to what mortgagor did with money advanced by mortgagee after execution of contract for exchange of land subject to mortgage held immaterial, in action against vendee for difference between agreed and actual amount of mortgage.

In an action on a land exchange contract for the difference between the agreed and actual amount of a mortgage assumed by defendant, objection to a question asked plaintiff on cross-examination as to what he did with money advanced to him by mortgagee after the contract was executed, was properly sustained, where plaintiff made no claim that he used it for the benefit of defendants or any one but himself; the only material question being whether he had the right to receive it.

2. Exchange of property ⇨8(1)—Instruction to award difference between specified amounts held not erroneous, in view of undisputed evidence.

In an action on a land exchange contract for the difference between the agreed and actual amount of a crop mortgage assumed by defendants, where the amount due on the mortgage when the property was conveyed was shown by undisputed evidence, an instruction to award plaintiff the difference between such amount and the agreed amount of the mortgage, if defendants were credited therewith, was not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by E. E. Sherwood against Charles Turner and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Braswell, of Lindsay, for appellants.
Guy Knupp, of Porterville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants appeal from the judgment herein in favor of plaintiff. Several causes of action are stated in the complaint, but appellants attack but one of them on this appeal.

Relative to such cause of action, the complaint alleges that the parties entered into a contract for the exchange of certain lands owned by them respectively; that at the time of the execution of the contract—

“the crops of fruit growing upon the real property agreed to be conveyed to the defendants by the plaintiff and his said wife was subject to a crop mortgage in favor of the Producers' Fruit Company of California, and it was expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties to said contract, and provided in said contract, that said real property should be taken subject to a crop mortgage in favor of said Producers' Fruit Company of California in the sum of $20,000, and in computing and determining the payments to be made under said contract, and at the time said payments were actually made and the instruments of conveyance executed by the plaintiff and his said wife to the defendants, said crop mortgage was computed and estimated at $20,000, and said defendants received credit on the purchase price of the real property conveyed to them by the plaintiff and his said wife in the sum of $20,000, and did not amount to any sum in excess of $19,644.57, and that by reason of the discrepancy between the agreed amount of said crop mortgage * * * and the actual amount thereof * * * there is due, owing, and unpaid from said defendants to said plaintiff the sum of $355.43.”

The answer expressly admits the execution of the contract, the existence of the alleged crop mortgage, and that—“it was expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties to said contract, and provided in said contract, that the said real property, should be taken subject to a crop mortgage and in favor of said Producers' Fruit Company of California in the sum of $20,000; deny that in computing and determining payments to be made under said contract, said crop mortgage was computed and estimated at $20,000; deny that it was computed and estimated to be any greater sum than $14,000; deny that said defendants received credit on the purchase price of said real property conveyed to them by the plaintiff and his said wife in the sum of $20,000.”

The answer further alleges that the lands were conveyed to defendants subject to a crop mortgage of $14,000 only. The case was tried before a jury. Both parties introduced evidence tending to support their respective contentions, and the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint.

[1] It is contended that the court erred in sustaining objection to a question propounded to plaintiff on cross-examination. The answer alleges and respondent seems to concede that the crop mortgage referred to was given for the principal sum of $10,000, with a provision for future advances to the amount of $10,000 additional. At the time the contract to exchange properties was executed future advances had been made to the amount of $7,502.27. Thereafter and prior to the exchange of deeds the mortgages advanced to the plaintiff the additional sum of $2,142.30. Referring to the last-stated sum counsel for defendants asked the plaintiff: “What did you do with the money you drew from the Producers' Fruit Company?” The court sustained plaintiff's objection to the question, saying: “He claimed it as his own, so what he did with it is immaterial.” The ruling was clearly right. Plaintiff made no claim that he had used the money for the benefit of defendant, or for any one but himself. The only material question was whether plaintiff had the right to receive the money. It was immaterial what use he made of it.

[2] Appellant urges that the court erred in giving the following instruction:

"It is provided in the contract of April 19, 1921, that the real property to be conveyed by the plaintiff and his wife to the defendants shall be taken by the defendants subject to a crop mortgage in favor of the Producers' Fruit Company in the sum of $20,000. It is admitted by the defendants that the amount due on the crop mortgage at the time the real property was conveyed was the sum of $19,644.57. If you find from the evidence that the defendants were credited with the sum of $20,000 on the purchase price of said real property because of the said crop mortgage, then you shall award plaintiff, on his third cause of action, the difference between the credit so received, namely, $20,000, and the amount actually due on said mortgage, $19,644.57, or the sum of $355.43."

The instruction correctly states the issues raised by the pleadings and the amount due upon the crop mortgage at the time the property was conveyed to defendants, as shown by undisputed evidence. No erroneous statement of law therein is pointed out, and it seems to present the case fairly to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY
et al. (Civ. 4426.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 7, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 5, 1923.)

1. Certiorari ⚡64(2) — On writ of certiorari to review order of lower court, reviewing court may examine evidence as relates to jurisdiction.

On application for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the lower court, the reviewing court may examine the evidence on which the order is based, in so far as the evidence applies to or affects the question of jurisdiction.

2. Receivers ⚡72—Appointed subsequent to sheriff's possession under replevin writ may not question sheriff's possession by contempt proceedings, but only by suit.

Where a sheriff in replevin has taken possession of property, a receiver appointed over all the property of the replevin defendant, who is subsequent in time as to his right or claim, may not attack the sheriff's possession, nor can the court do so by contempt proceedings in the receivership case, but can only authorize the receiver to sue for the possession.

3. Receivers ⚡71—Appointment of receiver does not operate ipso facto as a possession of property, without any actual possession or attempt to possess being made.

Where a sheriff in replevin has taken possession of property, a mere showing that a receiver appointed over all the property of the replevin defendant was in fact appointed before the sheriff took possession would not entitle him to possession, where he did not take possession until after the sheriff had acted.

Application by W. N. Miller and another for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Ralph H. Clock, a Judge thereof. Order annulled.

Joseph C. Burke and Robert B. Camarillo, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review an order of the superior court whereby the petitioners were adjudged guilty of contempt, and were ordered to return to a receiver certain property taken by them (so the court held) from his possession. The proceeding in the superior court against the petitioners was initiated by the filing of affidavits charging that petitioners by certain acts willfully interfered with Willard L. Goodwin in the discharge of his duties with respect to property in his charge and possession as receiver of said property in certain actions then pending in said superior court.

In three certain actions, wherein the Hogan Drilling Company, a corporation, was defendant, Goodwin was, on the 28th day of May, 1923, appointed receiver of property of the defendant, and was directed to take possession of certain real property and of all personal property located thereon. Goodwin qualified as such receiver on the 29th day of May. Thereafter, on the 4th day of June, affidavits of Goodwin, of H. B. Pierce, and of L. D. Collings were filed charging the facts of the alleged contempt. Based upon those affidavits and the records and files of the said three actions, the court made its order citing respondents to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt for the commission of the acts complained of, and to further show cause why they should not be enjoined and restrained from in any manner interfering with the receiver concerning the property in controversy.

The affidavit of Goodwin, after setting forth his appointment and that he qualified as receiver on the 28th day of May, states that on that day he, as such receiver, took possession of said property, including five boilers, together with other connections, equipment, and accessories adjacent thereto; that thereafter, on May 30, he caused to be posted upon the premises certified copies of the order of his appointment, together with a notice that this property was then in the hands of the receiver; that on the 1st day of June Goodwin caused to be served upon the sheriff by leaving with one of his deputies certified copies of the order appointing receiver in said actions, and demanded that the sheriff and his deputies refrain from interfering with the possession of the receiver in and to said property or any part thereof; that on the 1st day of June, 1923, the receiver caused to be placed on said premises certain guards and caretakers for him as such receiver; that on the 2d day of June, disregarding the order of the court appointing Goodwin as such receiver, Juan Murrietta, the deputy sheriff to whom said notices had been delivered, signed an order directing the removal of one of the boilers (which for convenience, and in accordance with the evidence, we will call boiler No. 3) on the said premises; that on the 3d day of June said boiler No. 3 was removed from said premises by S. L. Pugh, W. N. Miller, H. D. Smith, and Robert Gill, together with the aid and assistance of certain workmen. The affidavits of Pierce and Collings give further details of fact, which need not be particularly stated at this time. Among other things, they show that on the real property described there are three uncompleted oil wells, together with derricks and other equipment, including a battery of five boilers, among which is included said boiler No. 3. These allegations, in substance, were by the court found to be true, except that the receiver did not qualify until May 29th. It further appears that on the 26th day of May, 1923, the Pugh-Miller Drilling Company, a corporation, commenced in said superior court an action in replevin against the Hogan Drilling Company to recover possession of said boiler No. 3; that summons was issued, and the necessary affidavit, together with an indorsement in writing thereon, requiring the sheriff to take possession of said boiler, was executed and delivered to the sheriff, together with a good and sufficient undertaking then and there approved by the sheriff; that thereafter, on the 4th day of June, the sheriff in said action of replevin made his return, certifying that on the 28th day of May, he executed said order by taking possession of said personal property, to wit, the said boiler, and by serving on the defendant Hogan Drilling Company, by leaving with G. F. Stamps, as vice president thereof, a copy of the affidavit and order and undertaking. The sheriff further certified that, the defendant having failed to except to the surety in the undertaking, and having omitted to require a return of the property, and no other persons than the defendant having made claim thereto, the sheriff, did, on the 4th day of June, deliver the said property so taken to the plaintiff.

W. N. Miller, S. L. Pugh, and the Pugh-Miller Drilling Company were not parties to any of the actions in which the receiver was appointed. In its order, the superior court found, among other things, that Goodwin qualified as receiver on the 29th day of May, and on that day, as receiver, took actual possession of said premises and the personal property thereon, and posted notices, etc.,

"and as well called the same to the attention of Deputy Sheriff H. D. Smith and Deputy Sheriff Fleming, the sheriff's keepers stationed thereon in charge of said property under and by virtue of certain writs of attachment hereinafter referred to; that at the time said receiver went upon said property, together with his attorney, Lewis D. Collings, said receiver and his attorney inquired of the keepers for said sheriff under and by virtue of what authority they held said property, or any part thereof, and the said keepers at that time informed the said receiver and his said attorney that they were holding said property, or a part of said property, under and by virtue of certain writs of attachment which had issued out of the superior court in an action against the Hogan Drilling Company, the defendant herein, which attachments had issued and were levied prior to the appointment of the receiver herein. That upon the 1st day of June, 1923, Willard L. Goodwin, receiver, caused to be served upon William I. Traeger, sheriff of Los Angeles county, by leaving with Juan Murrietta, deputy sheriff in charge of the civil department of the sheriff's office, certified copies of the order appointing the receiver in the above-entitled actions, and demanded at said time and place that said sheriff and his deputies refrain from interfering with the possession of said receiver in the property hereinbefore described, or any part thereof; that at said time and place said William I. Traeger, sheriff, by his duly authorized deputy, Juan Murrietta, advised the receiver, through his attorney, Lewis D. Collings, that the sheriff of Los Angeles county was holding said property hereinbefore described under and by virtue of writs of attachment, and not otherwise; * * * that at the time the said receiver went on the property on the 29th day of May, 1923, and took actual possession and control of all the properties described herein, there was on said property five boilers inclosed in brick and masonry and attached to the realty, together with all necessary piping connections, pop valves, blow-off valves, water columns, and smokestacks; that thereafter, on the 30th day of May, 1923, when the receiver went on said property, he found certain persons thereon attempting to remove one of said boilers, together with the pop valves, blow-off valve, water column, and smokestack, which persons were agents and representatives of the respondents S. L. Pugh and W. N. Miller herein, and thereupon said receiver informed said persons of his authority, and thereupon said persons desisted from removing said boiler and appliances and left said premises; that thereafter, on the 1st day of June, 1923, the said receiver placed on said premises guards and caretakers, operatives of Charles A. Jones National Detective Agency to guard and protect said property for and on behalf of said receiver; that prior to this time, and on the 26th day of May, 1923, the respondents S. L. Pugh and W. N. Miller had commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles, California, an action for claim and delivery against the Hogan Drilling Company for one boiler, and thereafter on said day they filed an affidavit and bond and demand with the sheriff that said sheriff remove said boiler; that thereafter, and on the 2d day of June, 1923, disregarding the order of this court appointing said receiver, dated May 28, 1923, the said Juan Murrietta, as deputy sheriff, signed an order from the said sheriff's office of Los Angeles county ordering one of the boilers on the premises released from said attachment and turned over to the respondents S. L. Pugh and W. N. Miller; that thereafter, and on the 3d day of June, 1923, in violation of the orders of this court, Robert Gill, S. L. Pugh, and W. N. Miller went on said premises, assisted by laborers and workmen, and unlawfully removed from said premises one of the boilers, together with two pop valves, one blow-off valve, one water column, and one smokestack; that in removing said property they tore down and dug out brick, concrete, and other masonry surrounding said boiler, and disconnected water and steam piping and other connections therewith, from which facts the court concludes:

"That at the time of the appointment of the receiver herein certain of the personal property was in the possession of the sheriff by writ of attachment above referred to, and not otherwise; that upon the 28th day of May, 1923, the receiver by virtue of his appointment took possession of the property referred to in his appointment, and thereafter, on the 29th day of May, 1922, he took actual and physical possession of said property, and at said time notified said sheriff of his appointment and posted said property so that any one interested therein might know that said property was in the possession of the court by virtue of this receivership; that thereafter on the 1st day of June, 1923, the sheriff received actual notice of said appointment and the possession claimed by said receiver; thereafter, and before said boiler was taken from said premises, respondents S. L. Pugh and W. N. Miller likewise received actual notice of said appointment and possession claimed by said receiver; that thereafter, on the 3d day of June, 1923, Juan Murrietta, Robert Gill, S. L. Pugh, and W. N. Miller, unlawfully and in violation of the order of this court, removed from said property the boiler and equipment above referred to, which act was done with the knowledge of William I. Traeger, sheriff of Los Angeles county, by reason of the fact that said act was done by his authorized deputies. * * *

On behalf of petitioners, it is contended that the undisputed evidence at the hearing in the court below proves that the sheriff had actual possession of boiler No. 3, and was holding the same for the Pugh-Miller Company, plaintiff in the replevin case, before the receiver had taken his oath of office, and therefore prior to the time when there could have been any taking of possession by the receiver; that the condition of the replevin action at that time, and of the matters related thereto, was such that the plaintiff in replevin was entitled to have possession of boiler No. 3 on the 3d day of June, unless prior to that time the defendant in replevin executed the bond necessary to obtain a return of such property. Petitioners therefore claim that, as against the receiver, the plaintiff in replevin stood in the position of an adverse third party in possession of the property in question, and that as such adverse third party the Pugh-Miller Drilling Company, plaintiff in replevin, cannot be required to surrender its rights on the mere demand of the receiver or the mere order of the court which appointed the receiver, but that in such case the receiver must enforce his demand by a separate action, if it is to be enforced at all. Counsel for respondents, on the other hand, contend that the said affidavits in the contempt proceeding alleged facts sufficient to give jurisdiction therein, and that the facts thus alleged are confirmed by the findings contained in the order of the court made after a hearing in that proceeding. From these premises they argue that the jurisdiction of the superior court is conclusively established, and that, since the writ of review is confined to matters of jurisdiction, we are now precluded from examining or considering that part of the record of the lower court which consists of the evidence received on the hearing of the order to show cause.

[1] Nevertheless a transcript of that evidence has been produced, and it was stipulated that, if we deem it necessary and appropriate to consider such evidence as a part of the return to the writ, this transcript contains the said required evidence. Assuming that both the affidavits and the order are sufficient in their contents to sustain the jurisdiction of the court in that proceeding, nevertheless, on writ of certiorari, the reviewing court may examine the evidence upon which the order was based, in so far as such evidence applies to or affects the question of jurisdiction; for it might be that the jurisdictional facts as recited in the order of the court did not exist, and it might be that the evidence positively and without conflict therein proved that such facts did not exist. Under such circumstances, it must be that the entire record, including the evidence, may be considered. Strain v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 216, 223, 142 Pac. 62, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 702.

[2] The facts as they actually occurred, so far as they are necessary to the determination of the question of jurisdiction, are shown by the evidence, which as to those facts is without conflict. In connection with the testimony of Deputy Sheriff Murrietta, the sheriff's returns on the writs of attachment were read in evidence. In Cooper v. Hogan Drilling Company, the return shows that on April 23d, he attached—

"the following described personal property in the possession of the defendant: Derricks, boilers, rotary equipment, drilling outfits, machinery, and all other personal property belonging to the defendant, located on Lambert wells No. 1, 2, and 4, located at Signal Hill, * * * and attached the same by taking into my possession and putting a keeper in charge."

There were other attachments, but we need not refer to them, since it appears that, if the sheriff was holding under attachment the boiler which was delivered on the claim and delivery demand, he at least held it under the Cooper attachment. This being so, it becomes necessary to consider the effect of the acts of the sheriff when, on the 28th day of May, he honored the demand of the plaintiff in replevin by placing a man in charge of said boiler No. 3 as a keeper for the purposes of that action. If it be the law that the sheriff cannot hold in possession under attachment property of the defendant in one action, and at the same time take possession of that property on behalf of a third party demanding the same as plaintiff in an action of replevin, yet we think it would not follow that the plaintiff in replevin acquired no rights under the process as actually executed in his behalf in that case. Where a sheriff, acting in good faith, has satisfied himself that he is wrongfully holding under attachment personal property that is not the property of the defendant in attachment, it appears to be within his power (subject to his liability to the attaching plaintiff if the release proves to have been wrongful), to release such property from the attachment. Concurrently with such release, the sheriff would likewise have authority to seize the same property under the order in claim and delivery.

But the prior right of the plaintiff in replevin, as against a subsequently acquired right of possession, does not depend upon the release of the attachments. The sheriff must "serve all process and notices in the manner prescribed by law." Pol. Code, § 4157, subd. 9. When he has done so, as in the present case, he has a double possession cast upon him by law, which gives him a position analogous to that of a stakeholder between adverse claimants. Service of process and orders by the coroner is not provided for by the statute, except when the sheriff is a party to the action or proceeding, and by an elisor (so far as the question arises here) only when both sheriff and coroner are parties. Pol. Code, §§ 4172, 4173; Buckeye Refining Co. v. Kelly, 163 Cal. 14, 124 Pac. 536, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 840.

In the present instance, then, it is clear that the sheriff, in the claim and delivery proceeding in the replevin action, had taken possession of boiler No. 3 before there was any receiver. The receiver, being subsequent in time as to his right or claim, is not in position to attack the validity of that possession; nor can the court do so by contempt proceedings in the receivership cases. If, at the time when the receiver qualified and attempted to take possession of the property in question, this boiler had passed to the actual possession of the Pugh-Miller Drilling Company, the plaintiff in replevin, clearly it would have been beyond the power of the court by its mere order to compel such party in possession to surrender the property to the receiver. Its only power would have been power to authorize its receiver to sue for possession of that property. Stuparich Mfg. Co. v. Superior Court, 123 Cal. 290, 55 Pac. 985; Tapscott v. Lyon, 103 Cal. 297, 305, 37 Pac. 225; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 387, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 87 Cal. 267, 270, 25 Pac. 433, 10 L. R. A. 650.

For the purposes of the present case, we are of the opinion that, upon the actual facts, the possession of the sheriff in the claim and delivery proceeding on and after May 28th was the same in effect as if the plaintiff in replevin had been in actual possession. By virtue of the pendency of the claim and delivery proceeding, and by virtue of the statute authorizing the same, the plaintiff in replevin was in possession through the sheriff as its agent, subject only to the right of the defendant Hogan Drilling Company (within the time prescribed by section 514, Code of Civil Procedure) to obtain redelivery of the property by requiring the same upon giving to the sheriff the necessary redelivery undertaking. And it may be assumed that the receiver, upon his appointment and qualification, became subrogated to the same right of the defendant Hogan Drilling Company to obtain such redelivery by giving said undertaking.

[3] Respondents claim that when Goodwin qualified as receiver, and attempted to take possession of the property in question, his right to possession related back to the time of the order appointing the receiver; that therefore the court, in the proceeding here under review, had authority to enforce that right of possession by direct order, even as against a claimant not a party to the receivership cases, if such claimant obtained possession after the time of appointment of the receiver, though prior to the time when the receiver qualified as such and took, or attempted to take, possession of the property. This contention cannot be sustained. In Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 120 Cal. 614, 619, 52 Pac. 1006, this question was discussed and determined. It was there contended that the mere order of the court appointing the receiver constituted ipso facto a possession of the property independent of any actual possession by the receiver, or of any attempt by him to take possession. But the court held that in a case where the receiver was not appointed to conserve liens upon, or other pre-existing rights in the property for which the receivership was instituted, the rule contended for did not exist. On the contrary, it was held that the proceeding was analogous to a writ of attachment, and would be effective, only after possession taken by the receiver, as the writ of attachment would be only after levy. Moreover, in the case here, it was not shown by any evidence that the order of May 28, appointing the receiver, was prior in time to the execution, by the sheriff, of the claim and delivery order on the same day.

We are of the opinion that, in making the order in question, the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction.

The order is annulled.

DE ANGELES v. COTTA et al. (Civ. 2630.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨ 927(4) — Where evidence of facts sought to be proved excluded, appellate court must assume such facts would have been established by the excluded evidence.

Where the court has required plaintiff to state what he expected to prove, and based on such statement sustained objections to practically all evidence offered, so that the record on appeal precludes the appellate court from determining the case on the merits, it must be assumed that plaintiff, if permitted, would have been able to prove all the facts embraced in his statement.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨ 76(1) — Covenant not to sublet or assign held joint and several.

Where a lease was executed to four lessees reciting that they covenanted not to sublet or assign, such covenant was joint and several, and consequently breached by assignment by two to their cotenants, who in turn assigned to strangers.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨ 104 — Unauthorized assigning of lease held to warrant forfeiture.

Where two of four lessees, who had covenanted not to underlet or assign the lease without written consent of lessor, assigned their interest to the other two lessees, who in turn assigned all interest to third parties, without consent, held, the covenant not to assign being both joint and several, lessor was entitled to recover possession, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1442, requiring condition of forfeiture be strictly interpreted against the party to be benefited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by G. De Angeles against Joe D. Cotta and others. From a judgment for those defendants not defaulting, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. B. Scott, of Modesto, for appellant.

H. K. Landram, of Merced, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action of unlawful detainer, brought to recover possession of certain lands on the alleged ground that the defendants had broken their covenant not to assign the lease under which they held.

Defendants Luiz C. Amaro, Luiz Deniz, and George Silva failed to answer, and default judgment was entered against them. The other defendants were given judgment, and plaintiff has appealed.

The complaint alleges:

That "defendants Joe D. Cotta, Luiz Deniz, Frank Deniz, and Luiz C. Amaro, without the consent of first party in writing, * * * or without his consent in any other manner given, and without his knowledge, did assign all their right, title, and interest in and to said lease and the premises therein described to George S. Silva and Frank M. Tosta, defendants above named, on or about the 3d day of January, 1921; that plaintiff had no knowledge of said assignment until a few days prior to the time of filing this complaint; that pursuant to said assignment the said George S. Silva and Frank M. Tosta went into the actual possession of said premises, and ever since said 3d day of January, 1921, have been and now are in possession of said premises."

The complaint contains other allegations appropriate to an action of unlawful detainer, and a copy of the lease is attached thereto. By the terms of the instrument, which is dated June 19, 1918, plaintiff leased the lands to defendants Joe D. Cotta, Frank Deniz, Luiz Deniz, and Luiz C. Amaro for a term of five years, with the option of an extension of five years additional. Among other terms the lease provided:

"If default shall be made in any of the covenants herein contained, that it shall be lawful for the said party of the first part to re-enter the said premises, and remove all persons therefrom. And the said parties of the second part do hereby covenant, promise, and agree * * * not to let or underlet the whole or any part of the said premises nor assign this lease, voluntarily or involuntarily, without the written consent of the said party of the first part."

The answers of the defendants deny that "Joe D. Cotta, Luiz Deniz, Frank Deniz, and Luiz C. Amaro did assign all or any" of their right, title, or interest in or to the lease or the premises therein described. The court found in accordance with such denials, and further that:

"Joe D. Cotta, Luiz Deniz, Frank Deniz, and Luiz C. Amaro did not at any time jointly assign or transfer their interest in and to said lease and the premises therein described to George S. Silva and Frank M. Tosta, or either of them."

The finding that the lessees did not "jointly assign" the lease suggests the only controversy on this appeal. The trial court said, in effect, that if the lessees all made individual assignments of their respective interests under the lease, without any understanding among them that they should do so, such acts would not work a forfeiture of the lease, "even though, in spirit, it is absolutely broken; that won't do, it has got to be in the letter absolutely."

[1] The plaintiff endeavored to prove the facts upon which he relied, but the court required him first to state what he expected to prove, and, based upon such statement, objections were sustained to practically all of the evidence offered. In consequence of such procedure, the record on appeal does not enable this court to dispose of the case on its merits, but it must be assumed that plaintiff would have been able to prove all the facts embraced in his statement. In obedience to the requirement of the court, counsel for plaintiff proposed to prove that, about three years prior to the trial, Luiz Amara assigned his interest in the lease to Joe D. Cotta, and Luiz Deniz assigned his interest therein to Frank Deniz, the assignees going into possession; that on the 3d of January, 1921, Joe D. Cotta assigned his interest to George S. Silva, and on the 3d day of February, 1921, Frank Deniz assigned his interest to Frank M. Tosta, and that Tosta and Silva went into possession under the assignments; "that the said Cotta and said Frank Deniz, at the time of the transfer of their interest in said lease to said Silva and said Tosta, arranged and conspired with said Silva and said Tosta to arrange the payment of the rent, the management of the dairy, in such a way that the said De Angeles, the plaintiff herein, would not know that any assignment had been made by said Cotta and said Frank Deniz to said Silva and said Tosta; that the dairy on said ranch was conducted by said Silva and said Tosta as partners."

[2, 3] The trial court based its interpretation of the law upon the case of Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 590, 42 Pac. 976, where it was held that a covenant by two lessees not to assign the lease was not broken by the assignment by one of them of his undivided half interest therein to his assignee in insolvency. The court said that the lessees were tenants in common of the land, and that—

"neither could, therefore, dispose of the interest of the other; nor could either prevent the other from disposing of his interest. * * * When, therefore, under these circumstances, it was covenanted merely that the 'lessees' should not assign 'the lease'—the lease, as an entirety—the meaning of the parties is presumed to be that the lease should not be assigned in the only way in which it could have been assigned, namely, by the joint act of the lessees. * * * The covenant does not provide that the lease should be forfeited upon the assignment by one of the tenants in common of his interest."

Respondent attaches too great importance to the word "joint" as used in the foregoing quotation. The language used cannot be understood to mean that the two lessees could assign their lease only by joining in the execution of a single instrument of transfer, or by executing separate instruments pursuant to an understanding between them that they would do so, because, manifestly, the lease could be assigned by the execution of independent transfers by the lessees, each even being in ignorance of the act of the other. In Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 Pac. 995, it was held that an assignment by one of two lessees to the other is not a breach of the covenant against assignment. No case has been cited or discovered, however, holding that separate assignments by the lessees of the respective interests of all of them do not constitute a breach of a covenant not to assign. In other jurisdictions it has been held that an assignment by one lessee to another is such a breach. Tober v. Collins, 130 Ill. App. 333; Saxeney v. Panis, 239 Mass. 207, 131 N. E. 331; Miller v. Pond, 214 Mich. 186, 183 N. W. 24, 17 A. L. R. 179, and note; Loveless v. Fitzgerald, 42 Can. Sup. Ct. 254, 16 Ann. Cas. 316, 2 B. R. C. 809, and notes. In Tober v. Collins it is said:

"To the extent of the interest transferred it is obvious that the lease is assigned. To hold otherwise would often defeat the purpose of covenants against assignments without consent. By the assignment of individual interests at different times to different persons, an entirely different tenant, or set of tenants, could be readily substituted for the original tenant or tenants without the consent of the lessor, thus thrusting upon him undesirable or objectionable tenants, notwithstanding he has, by the covenants of the lease, guarded against such contingency."

"Every one has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and cannot have another person thrust upon him without his consent. In the familiar phrase of Lord Denman, 'You have the right to the benefit you anticipate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract.'" Arkansas Valley Smelting Co. v. Belden Mining Co., 127 U. S. 379, 387, 8 Sup. Ct. 1308, 1309, 32 L. Ed. 246, 248.

Owners of property are justly solicitous as to the character of its occupants and restrictions upon the right of a lessee to substitute another tenant without the lessor's consent are reasonable covenants which ought to be rationally construed.

"A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created." Civ. Code, § 1442.

This does not mean that courts must resort to scholastic subtleties to save tenants from the consequences of their deliberate breach of their covenants.

"It has been said * * * that covenants against assignment or underletting are not favorably regarded by the courts and are liberally construed in favor of the lessees. But this means only that the scope of the term 'assignment' will not be enlarged by the courts, and that the covenant will not be considered as violated by any technical transfer that is not fairly and substantially an assignment." White v. Huber Drug Co., 190 Mich. 212, 157 N. W. 60.

 "This does not mean that the courts may make for the parties a different contract from what they have agreed upon or resort to a strained and unnatural construction to defeat or nullify their clearly expressed purpose or intention." Troughton v. Eakle (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 161, 165.

Two of the lessees acquired the interests of the others, and then, by separate assignments, conveyed the entire leasehold to persons who were strangers to the original lease. After Joe D. Cotta and Frank Deniz had acquired the entire interest in the lease, they continued to be bound by the covenant not to assign as fully as the four lessees were in the beginning. The covenant not to assign was joint and several.

"Where all the parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, whether past or present, their promise is presumed to be joint and several." Civ. Code, § 1659.

"In the absence of evidence showing a contrary intention, the presumption stated in said section 1659 must control." Gummer v. Mairs, 140 Cal. 535, 537, 74 Pac. 26, 27; Los Angeles County v. Luscher (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 899.

When all the lessees, in violation of their joint and several promise, had thrust upon the lessor new tenants without his consent, it is not perceived on what principle of justice he can be compelled to accept them as tenants. The covenant against assignment was deliberately broken in the most literal and substantial manner. The assignees, of course, were chargeable with notice of the stipulation against assignment. Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, § 152.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. GRAHAM. (Cr. 966.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 3, 1923.)

1. Criminal law §747—Conflicts in evidence settled by jury.

Whatever discrepancies or conflicts existed in the testimony of witnesses were for the jury's determination, in passing on the weight of the evidence and credibility of witnesses.

2. Homicide §244(1)—Evidence held sufficient to negative plea of self-defense.

Evidence showing malicious intent of defendant and the tendency of deceased to withdraw after the first chance meeting held to negative the plea of self-defense, though both defendant and deceased at the second and fatal meeting used violence.

3. Homicide §112(4)—Deceased, attempting assault with weapon while on highway, held not so to interfere with defendant's use of highway as to justify his arming himself.

The act of deceased, when unexpectedly met by his enemy and requested "to fight the thing out," in getting a weapon from his buggy to defend himself, thus causing defendant to flee, did not justify defendant's arming himself and returning, on the ground that his right to use the public highway had been interfered with, the happening of the controversy there being a mere coincidence.

4. Homicide §112(5)—Self-defense plea not available to one creating necessity to defend self.

Self-defense is not available to one who sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his own fraud, contrivance, or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for killing.

5. Homicide §120—Self-defense plea in pursuit and killing depends on good faith and sole object of winning safety and preserving life.

To justify pursuit and killing, such pursuit must not be in revenge, nor after the necessity for defense has ceased, but must be prosecuted in good faith, to the sole end of winning his safety and securing his life.

6. Criminal law §834(3)—Requested instruction justifying defendant in arming against "fresh assaults" was properly qualified to "unprovoked fresh assaults."

A requested instruction that, if defendant, after being assaulted by deceased, had reasonable cause to fear "fresh assaults," he had a right to arm himself, was properly qualified to "unprovoked fresh assaults"; the question of provocation being vital to the case.

7. Criminal law §1178—Requested instructions, erroneously refused, must be supported by authority and argument on appeal.

Errors in rulings on requested instructions, specified in briefs, but without citations of authority or arguments to sustain them, will not be noticed.

8. Criminal law §829(5, 9, 18)—Requested instructions, covered by those given, are properly refused.

Where the court fully and correctly instructed the jury on the law of self-defense, burden of proof, and the doctrine of reasonable doubt, requested instructions on these issues were properly refused.

9. Criminal law §829(2), 834(2)—Defendant entitled to have substance of proper requested instructions given, not own phraseology.

When the substance of a refused instruction is given, defendant is not entitled to a repetition of the same matter, or the adoption by the court of his own phraseology.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Paul Graham was convicted of murder in the second degree, his motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Perkins, of Visalia, Karl A. Mache-tanz, of Exeter, Patterson D. Nowell, of Tulare, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHENK, Justice pro tem. Appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The deceased, E. W. Mort, died from a gunshot wound inflicted by the defendant on the 21st day of August, 1922. There is no dispute as to this fact, but it is contended that the killing was necessary to the self-defense of the defendant under the circumstances shown in evidence. The deceased lived near the town of Earlimart, in Tulare county. Ill feeling had existed between him and the defendant for some time. In August, 1921, the deceased had occasion to approach a hay-baling outfit operating about two miles from Alpaugh for the purpose of inquiring if the hay then in process of baling was for sale. The defendant was working on the baler, and when he noticed the presence of the deceased he berated him for having accused him at some prior time of stealing hogs. A physical encounter ensued, in which the deceased was thrown to the ground and severely beaten by the defendant. Defendant was undoubtedly a more powerful man than the deceased, and as an indication of his disposition it was in evidence that when he had thrown the deceased to the ground he struck and kicked him, and when told by a fellow workman that "he had whipped him enough" and to let him up the defendant replied: "You fellows go back out of this; this is my fight." The existing enmity affords a background in viewing the actions of the parties a year later.

Defendant was in the town of Earlimart on the afternoon of the day of the killing, and was heard to say that he was waiting for a man to come to town in a few minutes; that he was looking for him, did not want to miss him, and that then "he guessed he would get him." About 16 witnesses who observed the affray testified at the trial. One witness for the prosecution testified that about a quarter of 6 he saw the deceased drive up in his automobile and stop in front of Vaughan's store, which was a combination general store and post office; that the deceased alighted from his car, walked around the front end of the car to the sidewalk, and started for the store door, where he met the defendant face to face; that defendant then said to the deceased, "Come down in the street and we'll settle this;" that Mort said, "All right," turned around, and reached into his car for a club or billy; that when the defendant saw that the deceased had a weapon in his hand he ran down the street and turned the corner; that Mort followed him for a short distance, then turned back to a place near the front of the store, and put the club in his hip pocket; that he saw the defendant approach his own car, yelling and making motions with his hands; that he saw him take a 30-30 rifle from his car and go toward the Vaughan store; that the deceased had entered the store, and was about two-thirds of the way back, talking to the clerk; that the defendant proceeded to a position in front of the store, where he called the deceased many opprobrious names and told him to come outside and he would fix him; that deceased remained in the store until the defendant repeated his command, and then went outside; that a bystander importuned the defendant to desist, saying, "Put that gun up, you are too good a man to do anything like this;" whereat the defendant said to the bystander, "You get out of the way or I will poke you, too," and cursed him; that defendant then addressed Mort, saying, "You ——— liar, you know I never stole those hogs;" that Mort replied, "You know you stole those hogs;" that the defendant then said, "If you say I stole those hogs, you are a ——— liar," and repeated the epithet with variations, at the same time pointing the rifle directly at the deceased, with less than a foot intervening between the muzzle of the rifle and Mort's body; that Mort seized the muzzle of the gun with his left hand, shoved it to one side, reached into his right hip pocket for his billy, and struck the defendant three or four blows; that the defendant received most of the blows on his left arm, which was up-raised for protection, but received one blow on the head; that the defendant then jerked the gun away from the deceased's grasp, staggered back a few steps to catch his balance, and fired; that the deceased whirled around, fell to the ground, and said, "He got me, boys, he got me;" to which the defendant replied, "You are ——— right, I got you," turned around, and walked away.

The bullet pierced the chest of the deceased, shattering the fifth rib, and carrying a portion of the rib into the lung cavity. He died about an hour later. It was in evidence that defendant put the rifle in his car, went to a near-by gas filling station, and engaged in conversation with a man to whom he said "I just shot him down there." When asked why he had done so, he replied, "He hit me over the head with a club; I have got self-defense."

Another witness testified that he saw the defendant take the rifle from his car, that he was about 10 feet from the defendant when he saw this, and that as the defendant reached into his car for the gun he said, "I'll get him;" that shortly thereafter he heard the shot. A clerk in Vaughan's store testified that it was the custom of the deceased to stop at the store in the evening to get his mail and the groceries he had ordered in the morning, and that he came to the store for that purpose about a quarter of 6 on the evening of the tragedy.

Another witness testified that, when the defendant took the gun from his car, he saw him make motions as if he were loading it; that the defendant walked toward the front of Vaughan's store and called out, "Come out now, you ———, I will fight you;" that the defendant pointed the rifle directly toward Mort's stomach; that Mort grabbed the rifle barrel, pushed it aside, and began beating the defendant with a billy; that the defendant jerked the gun loose from Mort's grasp and fell backward on his buttock; that when Mort lost his grasp on the gun he appeared to be frightened, ran backward toward him (the witness), and seemed to be looking for something to get behind for protection; that the deceased was between 10 and 15 feet from the end of the rifle when it was fired.

[1] There were slight discrepancies in the testimony of the several witnesses, but it may be said that they were no more pronounced than is usual in the description of the same exciting scene by different eye-witnesses. There was, however, a direct conflict in the evidence as to whether the defendant or the deceased spoke first after the deceased came out of Vaughan's store. Some witnesses stated that the defendant spoke first, calling the deceased vulgar names; others testified that the deceased spoke first, accusing the defendant of stealing hogs. Whatever discrepancies or conflicts existed were for the determination of the jury in passing upon the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. People v. Musumeci, 51 Cal. App. 454, 197 Pac. 129.

[2] From the evidence adduced the jury was justified in finding that on the day of the homicide the defendant arrived in the town before the deceased, and with malice and revenge in his heart was waiting for him to appear; that so far as the deceased was concerned the meeting of the two in Earlmart on that day was a chance meeting; that after the first quarrel the deceased abandoned further controversy, and went into the store attending to his own business; that thereafter the defendant obtained his rifle with the intent to employ deadly means, if the occasion were presented; that the deceased engaged in further controversy only after a challenge to fight had been twice repeated by the defendant in a belligerent and boisterous manner; that before the shot was fired the deceased, being without firearms, realized his unequal and perilous situation, and endeavored to seek protection by retreat; and that at the fatal moment the deceased was in no position to inflict upon the defendant death or great bodily harm. From these facts it was proper to conclude that the defendant was the aggressor, and that the taking of life under the circumstances was not necessary to the self-defense of the defendant. No other conclusions are reasonably deducible from the evidence.

[3] It is contended that "the right of the defendant to walk the streets had been violated," and that, "acting under the sting of his humiliation, his first thought was probably to vindicate that right, and to arm himself for that purpose." The case of People v. Batchelder, 27 Cal. 70, 85 Am. Dec. 231, is strongly relied upon as a precedent in justification of defendant's conduct. In that case it appeared that the Farallone Egg Company was engaged in gathering and marketing the eggs deposited by wild birds on one of the Farallone Islands in the Pacific Ocean. The defendant endeavored to land on the island, ostensibly for the same purpose. He was met with armed resistance on the part of guards stationed by the company at the landing; he departed, but returned shortly thereafter, with companions fully armed, and sought a landing. He was first fired upon by the company's guards, and in the return fire by the defendant, or by one of his companions, the deceased was killed, and the homicide was held to be justifiable. It appeared that the island was a part of the public domain. It was declared that the defendant had the right, in common with the deceased and all others, to go upon the island to accomplish his lawful purpose, just as one would have the right to roam the mountains in the public domain for the purpose of hunting and fishing, and to do so unmolested and unhindered by others having an equal, but no greater, right. The equal right of all to go upon public property was involved in that case, and it was held in effect that, when the defendant had been fired upon, he could, under the circumstances shown, meet that force with like force in order to protect his life.

[4] In this case there was no showing to justify the conclusion that the deceased was interfering in any way with the use by the defendant of the public highway. The fact that the controversy took place on a public street was merely a coincidence. The situation of the parties would have been the same if the affair had taken place on the gas station grounds or on other private property. The case of People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 457, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403, is also relied upon as embodying the rules in justification of defendant's course of action. That case contains a general discussion of the law of self-defense, both as to what the defendant may do to warrant the taking of life and as to what he may not do in a contest with an adversary. It is declared that the acts which a defendant may do, and justify under the plea of self-defense, depend primarily upon his own conduct, and secondarily upon the conduct of the deceased. The first rule laid down in that case may well apply to the facts presented to the jury in this case. That rule was embodied in one of the instructions of the court in this case and is stated as follows:

"Self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant, who was sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus through his own fraud, contrivance, or fault to create a real or apparent necessity for killing."

[5] The right of pursuit after the first quarrel, as contended for by the defendant, was not available to him under the facts shown. That right is subject to the limitation also stated in the Hecker Case in the following language:

"But the pursuit must not be in revenge, nor after the necessity for the defense has ceased, but must be prosecuted in good faith, to the sole end of winning his safety and securing his life."

[6] The following instruction was offered by the defendant and refused by the court:

"You are instructed that if, from the testimony, you find that E. W. Mort had made threats against the defendant, and these threats were communicated to the defendant, thereby placing him under constant fear of bodily harm, as a result of these threats he considered his life in danger when he met the said Mort, and if you further find from the evidence that the defendant was in lawful pursuit of business or pleasure in the town of Earlimart on the 21st day of August, 1922, and while in such pursuit he was accosted by said Mort who was armed with a deadly weapon, and driven from his ground, then under the law the defendant had a right to immediately arm himself for the purpose of self-protection against any fresh assaults with a deadly weapon from said E. W. Mort."

The refusal to give this instruction is assigned as error. Counsel states that this instruction goes to "the very heart of the defendant's case." The term "fresh assaults," employed in the instruction, would include a provoked as well as an unprovoked fresh assault. The question of provocation was involved in this case, and without some qualification the instruction fell short of stating the full right and duty of the defendant under the circumstances. This qualification was incorporated in an instruction also requested by the defendant and given as follows:

"The defendant claims that he shot in his own self-defense and to repel an unprovoked assault, which the deceased was making upon him. The right of self-defense, that is, the right of one attacked or assaulted by another, to repel such an assault and fully protect himself, is founded on the laws of nature. This right is expressly recognized by the laws of our own state."

The court further instructed the jury as follows:

"One who has received information of threats against his life or person made by another, is justified in acting more quickly and taking harsher measures for his own protection in the event of assault either actual or threatened, than would be a person who had not received such threats; and if in this case you believe from the evidence that the deceased made threats against the defendant, and that the defendant because of such threats made previously to the transaction complained of, and communicated to the defendant, had reasonable cause to fear greater peril in the event of an altercation with the deceased than he would have otherwise, you are to take such facts and circumstances into your consideration in determining whether the defendant acted in a manner in which a reasonable man would act in protecting his own life or bodily safety."

The instructions thus given sufficiently covered the subject.

[7] It is next contended that the court erred in refusing six different instructions tendered by the defendant, also relating to the law of self-defense, and two instructions on the question of reasonable doubt. No argument or citation of authority is presented in support of these contentions, and no further notice need be taken of them. Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 Pac. 278, and cases cited.

[8] The refusal to give the following instruction is assigned as error:

"You are instructed that no mere words of accusation and insult, however profane or severe, justify an assault under the law. Therefore Mort was not justified by any words spoken by Graham to him or regarding him in assaulting Graham."

The court instructed the jury on this subject as follows:

"Mere words of insult or of reproach, however grievous, will not justify an assault, a blow, or a threatening demonstration with a deadly weapon."

The refusal to give the following instructions, relating, as counsel states, to the law of reasonable doubt as applied particularly to the plea of self-defense, is assigned as error:

"You are instructed that, when a person charged with murder sets up self-defense as a defense to the charge, the law does not require that he prove self-defense beyond all reasonable doubt, and to a moral certainty; but, if it appears from all the testimony that there is a doubt that the defendant acted in self-defense, then I instruct you that such doubt should be construed in favor of the defendant and that, you should by your verdict acquit the defendant."

"You are instructed that the defendant has interposed the plea of self-defense as a defense to the charge of murder in the information filed against him, and if after a consideration of all the testimony in the case there is a reasonable doubt in your minds whether the defendant was justified in acting in self-defense under the immediate circumstances surrounding the shooting, then I charge you that under your oaths you are bound to give the defendant the benefit of such doubt, and by your verdict acquit him."

"You are instructed that the burden is on the prosecution to establish the guilt of the defendant by proof beyond every reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty. This rule applies to the whole and every material part of the case, and unless every fact essential to conviction, whether it is as to the act of killing, or the reason for or manner of its commission, shall be proved beyond every reasonable doubt, you must acquit the defendant. If, after considering the whole case and all the evidence, any one of your number shall entertain a reasonable doubt whether the homicide is excusable or justifiable, or whether the defendant acted in lawful self-defense, then it is the duty of such juror so entertaining such reasonable doubt to vote to acquit the defendant."

Counsel states that these instructions are founded upon the principles announced in People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549, and People v. Roe (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 560. Those cases affirm the rule that the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the commission of a homicide, does not mean that the defendant must prove such circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence, but that he is only required to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged. It is not suggested that the court transgressed this rule in the instructions given. On the contrary, it was expressly recognized and applied in the following instruction which was given:

"When, upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant has been proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justified or excusable. It is not necessary that the defendant prove circumstances of justification, mitigation, or excuse by a preponderance of the evidence, it is only necessary that from the whole case, from all the evidence submitted, either by the prosecution or the defense, that there exists in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant was justified or excusable in the killing, and if after consideration of all the evidence in the case such reasonable doubt exists in the minds of the jury then they should acquit the defendant."

An examination of the record discloses that the court very fully and correctly instructed the jury on the law of self-defense, burden of proof, and on the doctrine of reasonable doubt in substance and effect as outlined in the refused instructions, as well as on all other questions of law involved in the case.

[9] When the substance of the refused instruction was given, the defendant was not entitled to a repetition of the same matter, or to the adoption by the court of his own phraseology. People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464; 86 Pac. 1100; People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 146 Pac. 522, 8 Cal. Jur., sec. 366.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and, no error appearing, the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re WATKINSON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9937.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1923.)

1. Taxation ⌘895(7)—State inheritance tax law construed as language imports—to prohibit deduction of federal tax paid in valuing estate subject to tax.

Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10, providing that, "in determining the market value of the property transferred, no deduction shall be made for any inheritance tax or estate tax paid to the government of the United States," means what its language apparently imports—prohibition of any deduction of the federal tax in valuing an estate subject to the state tax.

2. Constitutional law ⌘283—State inheritance tax law held not to violate due process clause; "property tax."

The provision in Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10, against deduction of federal taxes paid in valuing the estate subject to the state tax, does not violate the due process clause in Const. U. S. Amend. 14, since the inheritance tax is not a "property tax," but a tax on the statutory privilege of testamentary transfer or succession, subject to limitations on by the state as it deems proper in the way of burdens on its exercise, and the devisee or legatee of an estate affected does not become entitled to his portion of the estate until it has already been burdened with its inheritance tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Property Tax.]

3. Taxation ⌘859(1)—Inheritance tax law as to deduction of federal tax in valuing estate held not to violate Constitution as to taxing property in proportion to value.

Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10, against deduction of federal taxes paid in valuing an estate subject to the state tax, does not violate Const. art. 13, § 1, requiring property to be taxed in proportion to its value, since the inheritance tax is not a property tax, but a tax on the statutory privilege of testamentary transfer or succession, subject to limitation by the state as it deems proper in the way of burdens on its exercise.

4. Eminent domain ⌘2(11)—Inheritance tax law, providing for deduction of federal tax paid in valuing estate, held not to take property for public use without compensation; "taking of property."

The provision in Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10 against deduction of federal taxes paid in valuing the estate subject to the state tax, does not violate Const. art. 1, § 14, forbidding taking of property for public use without just compensation, since the inheritance tax is not a property tax, but a tax on the statutory privilege of testamentary transfer or succession, subject to limitation by the state as it deems proper in the way of burdens on its exercise.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Taking.]

5. Statutes 71—Inheritance tax law provision held not to violate Constitution as to uniformity of operation of general laws.

The provision in Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10, against deduction of federal taxes paid in valuing the estate subject to the state tax, is not void as violative of Const. art. 1, § 11, providing that all laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation.

6. Statutes 82—Inheritance tax law held not void as local or special law changing law of descent or succession.

The provision in Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10, against deduction of federal taxes paid in valuing the estate subject to the state tax, is not void as violative of Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 30, forbidding local or special laws changing the law of descent or succession.

7. Taxation 5—Inheritance tax law provision for deducting federal tax paid in valuing estate held not to violate Constitution as to exempting United States property.

The provision in Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 2, subd. 10, against deduction of federal taxes paid in valuing the estate subject to the state tax, does not burden the portion of the estate already appropriated by the federal government in the form of its inheritance tax, nor does it lessen the amount thereof, and it increases the burden solely on those whose interest has already been charged with the federal tax by forbidding deduction on account thereof, and therefore it does not constitute an attempt to subject United States property to taxation, and does not violate Const. art. 13, § 1, exempting such property from state taxation.

8. Taxation 859(2)—Inheritance tax act held not discriminatory and void in forbidding the deduction of federal tax paid in determining value of property transferred.

Inheritance Tax Act, § 2, subd. 10, providing that, in determining the market value of the property transferred, no deduction shall be made for an inheritance tax or estate tax paid federal government, operates uniformly, since it applies to all residuary legatees, and any disparity between net amounts received by different legatees by reason thereof must be deemed to be chargeable to the testator, rather than to the law, which he is deemed to know, and therefore, when, in making his will, he names one as a specific legatee and another as a residuary legatee, he must be deemed to have intended that the latter should be charged with the federal tax paid, and hence the act is not discriminatory and void as requiring residuary legatees to pay a larger tax than other legatees in the same degree of relationship.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Henrietta Pierce Watkinson, deceased. From an order of the superior court confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser in accordance with the contention of Ray L. Riley, State Controller, Lucy Ward Stebbins and Frank J. Hurley, executrix and executor, appeal. Affirmed.

Edward C. Harrison, Maurice E. Harrison, and Harrison & Harrison, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, Joseph G. De Forest, Wm. M. Madden, Lloyd M. Robbins, Luther Elkins, and Carey Van Fleet, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ, for appellants.

Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, H. C. Lucas, of San Francisco (A. C. Stanton, of Sacramento, and A. W. Brouillet, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing was granted in this matter in order that the appellants and the several amici curiæ might give the court the benefit of oral argument upon the points urged in their respective petitions for rehearing. Upon such argument and submission of the cause the court adheres to its former conclusions as expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Richards pro tem., which opinion, with the insertion of certain more recently cited authorities, reads as follows:

"This appeal is from an order of the superior court confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser with relation to the state inheritance tax to be fixed and paid from said estate. Under the provisions of the United States Revenue Act of 1918, the executors of the estate were required to pay, and did pay, to the federal government, as and for the federal inheritance tax upon said estate, the sum of $128,730.08. The state inheritance tax appraiser in thereafter making his appraisal and report upon said estate refused and failed to deduct any part of this payment in arriving at the value of the estate subject to the state inheritance tax. The report thereon, as to the state tax due, was consequently $26,205.75 greater in amount than such tax would have aggregated had such deduction been made. The court, over the objection of the executors, confirmed said report as to this particular portion thereof, and from its order so made and entered this appeal has been taken.

[1] "The statutory authority upon which the inheritance tax appraiser relied in making his report to the effect above stated is to be found in subdivision 10 of section 2 of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 883), which provides as follows: 'In determining the market value of the property transferred, no deduction shall be made for any inheritance tax or estate tax paid to the government of the United States.' With respect to the interpretation to be placed upon this apparently plain and simple direction of the statute touching the subject with which it deals, the appellant herein, and also the various amici curiæ who have presented briefs and arguments herein, make two main contentions. First, that the foregoing provision of the statute, when read in the light of legislative intent and purpose in the enactment of the inheritance tax act of 1917, read as a whole, is not to be given the meaning and effect which its language apparently imports. Second, that, if it is to be given such meaning and intent, it is for various reasons unconstitutional and void. As lending support to the first of these contentions, both the appellant and several amici curiæ strongly rely upon certain language used by this court in the matter of the Estate of Kennedy, 157 Cal. 517, 108 Pac. 280, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428, in dealing with deductions to be made prior to the inheritance tax appraisal under the provisions of the inheritance tax act in force at the time of the death of the decedent, the language of this court thus relied on reading as follows: "The provisions of our tax act clearly show that the tax imposed thereby is one solely upon the devisee, legatee, or heir, and one upon him only as to such property as he actually takes on distribution as devisee, legatee, or heir. It would appear to be a most absurd and inequitable provision that imposed a tax on one for the privilege of succeeding as heir, devisee, or legatee to certain property of the decedent, where the very property to which he is so held to succeed is lawfully diverted by the probate court to other purposes and never can be distributed to him."

"The foregoing language of this court was repeated and approved in Estate of Miller, 184 Cal. 674, 195 Pac. 413, 16 A. L. R. 694. It is to be noted, however, that the expression of this court as above set forth was used with reference to the terms and interpretation of the inheritance tax laws of this state as they stood prior to the changes therein worked by the passage of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917, and particularly of the provision of this later act first hereinabove set forth, and which appears upon its face to have been intended to change the policy of the state with respect to the deduction to be made on account of the federal inheritance taxes imposed or paid prior to the action of the state inheritance tax appraiser and of the court thereon.

"In determining the scope and effect of the inheritance tax laws of this state as finally embodied in the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917, the most recent utterances of this court in interpreting and applying the same are, we think, conclusive upon the first branch of this discussion. In the Matter of the Estate of Charlotte Bowditch, 208 Pac. 282, 23 A. L. R. 735, this court, in defining the theory upon which the state proceeded in the imposition of inheritance taxes, said: 'Of prime importance in all cases concerning the determination of the jurisdiction to impose an inheritance tax is the fundamental proposition that a tax of that character is a tax upon the right or privilege of succeeding to property. "The so-called right of inheritance, and also the right of testamentary disposition, are not inherent rights of the individual, nor are they safeguarded or secured in futuro by any provision of our Constitution. They are both subject to legislative control, and are creatures of legislative will. Consequently the Legislature has the power to take away both rights, and to make the state the successor to all property upon the death of the owner. The right and power to impose a succession tax rests on this principle." Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 Pac. 826. In other words, the tax is imposed and is sustainable upon the theory that a state which confers the privilege of succeeding to property may attach thereto the condition that a portion of the property shall be contributed to that state. In re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 284, 49 Pac. 181.'

"This declared theory and policy of the state of California with respect to this form of taxation removes from this case the necessity for much of the discussion of the questions involved herein, arising out of the conflicting views of the courts of other jurisdictions, due in part to the fact that in certain of these states there exists no express statutory direction that no deduction shall be made on account of the prior imposition of the federal tax, and due also in some measure to differences in the form and scope of the various statutes under review in these decisions. A very fair and full review and analysis of the laws of several of the leading states and of the most important state and federal cases construing their provisions upon this subject is to be found in the recent case of In re Fish's Estate, 219 Mich. 369, 189 N. W. 177. If, as this court holds in the Estate of Bowditch, supra, 'a state which confers the privilege of succeeding to property may attach thereto the condition that a portion of the property shall be contributed to that state,' it follows necessarily that the state has full power to declare by statute what burdens or incumbrances, which by law or by the act of the decedent had become affixed to the interest of any particular heir, devisee, or legatee, shall or shall not be excluded from the computations of the inheritance tax appraiser in reporting the amount of the inheritance tax to be imposed by the state thereon; and it also follows necessarily from the views above expressed by this court in Estate of Bowditch, supra, and from the last above deduction, that the amendment to the prior inheritance tax measures effected by the statute of 1917, and requiring that no deduction should be made on account of the federal inheritance taxes in determining the market value of the property to be charged with the state inheritance tax, is not inconsistent, with the other or formerly existing provisions of said statute, nor in any wise doubtful as to the interpretation to be given to its plain and simple terms. We find no merit, therefore, in the first contention urged by the appellant and by amici curiæ herein.

[2-6] "The second contention urged by appellant and his associates in the discussion of this appeal is that the provision of the act of 1917 first above quoted herein, if given this interpretation, is for various reasons unconstitutional and void. These reasons, briefly summarized, are that said provision is in violation of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and is also violative of section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution of California, providing that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, and of section 11 of article 1 of the same Constitution, providing that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and of subdivision 30 of section 25 of article 4 of the said Constitution, providing that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws changing the law of descent or succession, and of section 14 of article 1 of said Constitution, providing that property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and, finally, that said provision is void as an attempt to tax property of the United States exempt from state taxation under section 1 of article 13 of the state Constitution. The fundamental answer to the most of these constitutional objections is to be found in the proposition above set forth, that an inheritance tax is not a property tax, but is essentially a tax upon the statutory privilege of testamentary transfer or succession, and that the state in extending the privilege may place such limitations upon it as it deems proper in the way of burdens upon its exercise. This court said as much in the Matter of the Estate of Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 284, 49 Pac. 181, 182, in the following words: "The right of inheritance, including the designation of heirs and the proportions which the several heirs shall receive, as well as the right of testamentary disposition, are entirely matters of statutory enactment, and within the control of the Legislature. As it is only by virtue of the statute that the heir is entitled to receive any of his ancestor's estate, or that the ancestor can divert his estate from the heir, the same authority which confers this privilege may attach to it the condition that a portion of the estate so received shall be contributed to the state, and the portion thus to be contributed is peculiarly with the legislative discretion."

"In this view of the provision of the statute under consideration it cannot be held violative of the terms of the federal Constitution, since the devisee or legatee of the estate affected by this provision does not become entitled to his portion of the property of the said estate until it has already been burdened with its inheritance tax, and hence by no part of said scheme of taxation can he be held to have been deprived of property without due process of law. U. S. v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 16 Sup. Ct. 1073, 41 L. Ed. 287; Matter of Penfold, 216 N. Y. 163, 110 N. E. 497, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 783; Booth's Ex'r v. Commonwealth, 130 Ky. 88, 113 S. W. 61; Maxwell v. Edwards, 89 N. J. Law, 446, 99 Atl. 138; Bankers' Trust Co. v. Blodgett, 96 Conn. 361, 114 Atl. 104. As to the several sections of the state Constitution referred to in the foregoing objections, it must be held that these taxes upon the privilege of testamentary transmission and succession, since they are not property taxes, cannot be held subject to the limitations placed by the Constitution upon property taxation. In 26 R. C. L. p. 167, this proposition is quite clearly set forth as follows: "An inheritance tax in any of its customary forms is not a tax on the property of the decedent with respect to which it is levied, but is an excise imposed on the privilege of transmitting or receiving property upon the death of the owner, and consequently is not subject to any of the constitutional limitations upon taxes on property found in the state Constitution"—citing cases. See, also, In re Frick's Estate, 277 Pa. 242, 121 Atl. 35, 39; In re Sanford's Estate, 188 Iowa, 833, 175 N. W. 506; In re Kirkpatrick's Estate, 275 Pa. 271, 119 Atl. 269; New York Trust Co. v. Eisner, 256 U. S. 348, 41 Sup. Ct. 506, 65 L. Ed. 963, 16 A. L. R. 660; Chanler v. Kelsey, 205 U. S. 479, 27 Sup. Ct. 550, 51 L. Ed. 882.

[7] "As to the appellants' final contention that the provision of the statute under review constitutes an attempt to subject United States property to taxation, and is therefore violative of section 1 of article 13 of the state Constitution, exempting such property from state taxation, we find it to be without merit. The provision in question does not attempt to lay any burden upon that portion of the estate of the decedent which the federal government has already appropriated in the form of its inheritance tax, nor does it in any degree lessen said amount, its increase of the burden being laid solely upon those whose interest in the estate has already been charged with such federal tax, by forbidding any deduction on account of such tax. U. S. v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 16 Sup. Ct. 1073, 41 L. Ed. 287. The appellants cite no authorities in support of said contention and we are satisfied none exist."

[8] In their petitions and briefs upon rehearing and upon oral argument thereon, appellants and amici curiae earnestly insisted that the act in question was discriminatory, and therefore void, in that it required residuary legatees to pay a larger inheritance tax in proportion to the value of the estate to which they succeeded than was required of other legatees, even though they be all of the same degree of relationship to the testator. The answer to this contention is two-fold, the first being that the act does have a uniform operation, since it applies alike to all residuary legatees, and the second being that any disparity between the net amounts received by different legatees by reason of the operation of the act must be deemed to be chargeable to the testator rather than to the law. The testator is deemed to know the law, and therefore, when in making his will he names one as a specific legatee and another as a residuary legatee, he must be deemed to have intended thereby that the latter should be charged with the amounts required to be paid for the federal tax.

The order is affirmed.

MANDES v. MENDES.

(Civ. 4575.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 9, 1923.)

Homestead $\Leftrightarrow$ 142(1) — Not continuing after death of husband and remarriage and death of wife.

Where, after filing of homestead declaration on community property, the husband died and the wife remarried and died, held that, under Civ. Code, § 1265 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1474), vesting homesteads selected from community property absolutely in the surviving spouse, the homestead became the absolute property of the wife, and on her death passed free from its homestead character to her heirs at law, and the court did not err in setting it apart under Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, as a homestead to the surviving stepfather and children, as against the objection of the guardian of the children that the homestead should have been set aside to them exclusively.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Maria Mendes, also known as Maria Carolino Sequeria, deceased. From an order of the superior court granting the petition of A. R. Mendes, as surviving husband and administrator, to set aside a homestead, Felip Mandes, guardian of the minor children, appeals. Affirmed.

Fry & Wood, of Oakland, for appellant.

Louis Gonsalves, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the guardian of the persons and estates of Albert B. Sequeria and Louis B. Sequeria, minor children of the above-named decedent, from an order of the probate court setting aside a homestead in certain real property in the city of Oakland, Cal., for the use and benefit of the surviving husband of deceased and said minors. This order was made pursuant to the provisions of section 1465, Code of Civil Procedure.

By stipulation the decree setting apart the homestead comprises the record upon appeal. It recites the filing of a petition by the guardian of said minors to have the property involved here set aside to them as a homestead and a petition by A. R. Mendes, surviving husband of deceased and administrator of her estate, to have the same property set apart to him and to said minors, jointly as a homestead. In said decree the court finds the facts to be: That the real property sought to be set aside as a homestead was formerly the community property of M. B. Sequeria, who, up to the time of his death on the 17th day of March, 1917, was the husband of Maria Mendes, since deceased, and the father of the said minors; that at the time of the death of M. B. Sequeria said real property was impressed with a homestead theretofore duly declared, acknowledged, and recorded while said property was community property as aforesaid; that after the death of said M. B. Sequeria his widow intermarried with said A. R. Mendes, and she died on the 20th day of October, 1918, being still the wife of said Mendes; that, after the death of said M. B. Sequeria, Maria Mendes did not convey, incur, nor homestead the said real property in any manner; that the estate of said M. B. Sequeria is now and ever since shortly after his death has been in course of probate, but no proceedings looking to the setting apart of said property as a homestead in the matter of his estate have been instituted, except a petition filed by said guardian to have said property set apart to said minors, which petition was denied. The decree then recites the facts of minority of the wards, appointment of the guardian, filing of inventory, and appraisal in the matter of the estate of Maria Mendes, deceased.

Upon these facts the court decreed that the property be set apart until the 1st day of January, 1923, to A. R. Mendes, Albert B. Sequeria, and Louis B. Sequeria, jointly; thereafter, until said Albert B. Sequeria shall attain the age of 21 years, to said Albert E. Sequeria and Louis B. Sequeria jointly, and thereafter to said Louis B. Sequeria until he shall have attained the age of 21 years.

Appellant contends that the court erred in not setting the property aside to the minors exclusively. The only question involved in the appeal is as to whether or not the fee-simple title to community property, impressed with a homestead during the existence of the community, vests in the surviving spouse free from all rights of heirs at law of the deceased spouse. Section 1265 of the Civil Code provides:

"If the selection [of a homestead] was made by a married person from the community property * * * the land so selected, on the death of either of the spouses, vests in the survivor. * * *

Section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture * * * was selected from the community property * * * it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor. * * *

Under these sections it seems clear that upon the death of M. B. Sequeria the title to the homestead community property vested in his surviving wife, and upon her death vested in her heirs at law, subject to debts and expenses of administration, etc., and subject to the right of the court to set it apart as a homestead under section 1465, Code of Civil Procedure, which right has been exercised in the decree from which this appeal is taken. If authority is required to interpret the clear provisions of the Code upon the question involved here, it is to be found in the recent case of Estate of Wrenn (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 909. That case is directly in point, and decides that, where property is impressed with a homestead during the existence of the community, the title becomes vested absolutely in the surviving spouse, merely retaining some characteristics of a homestead in being exempt from execution, etc.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MANDES v. MENDES.

(Civ. 4576.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 9, 1923.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of M. B. Sequeria, also known as Manuel Bas Sequeria, deceased. Petition of Felip Mandes, as guardian of two minor heirs, to set apart a homestead, opposed by A. R. Mendes, individually and as administrator of the estate of Maria Mendes, deceased. From an order denying the petition, the guardian appeals. Affirmed.

Fry & Wood, of Oakland, for appellant.
Louis Gonsalves, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the guardian of the persons and the estates of Albert B. Sequeria and Louis B. Sequeria, minors, from an order denying his petition to have certain real property set apart to said minors as and for a homestead. By stipulation of the parties the matter is submitted to us upon the record before this court in the Matter of the Estate of Maria Mendes, also Known as Maria Carolino Sequeria, Deceased (No. 4575 of the records of this court) 217 Pac. 1077. The decision of this court in the last-mentioned appeal is controlling here. The same property is involved in both matters, and it was decided in the Matter of the Estate of Maria Mendes, supra, in an opinion filed this day, that the title to the property in controversy, which had been homesteaded during the period of marriage between Manuel Bas Sequeria and Maria Carolino Sequeria (Maria Mendes), vested in the survivor, Maria Carolino Sequeria (Maria Mendes), upon the death of her husband. It follows that the court had no power in this proceeding to set apart said property to the minor children of Manuel Bas Sequeria.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Under Civ. Code, § 3051, one repairing an automobile at the request of a purchaser in legal possession under a conditional sales contract has a lien for the value of his services.

3. Livery stable and garage keepers ⚡8(3)—Conditional purchaser's agreement to transfer interest in automobile to repairmen until bill was paid insufficient to retain lien as against seller's assignee.

A written agreement by the conditional purchaser of an automobile, to transfer his interest to repairmen until their bill was paid, in consideration of his being allowed to take the car, held insufficient to retain the lien as against the seller's assignee, in view of Civ. Code, § 2913.

4. Bailment ⚡18(2)—Lien acquired by work done, whether by claimant or agent.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3051, 3052, a lien on personalty is acquired by work done, whether by claimant or his agents.

5. Livery stable and garage keepers ⚡8(4)—Rights of innocent purchaser from vendee at lien sale not affected by lien claimant's mistaken demand for amount of prior lien lost by surrender of property.

The rights of an innocent purchaser from vendee at a lien sale, of an automobile in lien claimants' possession, held not prejudiced by the latter's mistaken demand on the record owner's assignee for the amount of a prior lien, which had been lost by surrendering possession of the car in the absence of any tender of the actual amount due.

6. Records ⚡9½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Innocent purchasers from vendee at lien sale held entitled to possession as against assignee of conditional seller to lienor.

Innocent purchasers of an automobile from vendee at a lien sale for the value of repairs held entitled to possession as against the assignee of one by whom it was conditionally sold to lienor, notwithstanding their failure to secure and file with the motor vehicle department an assignment of the certificate of registration, as required by Motor Vehicle Act, § 8, as amended by St. 1917, p. 388, § 7, and St. 1919, p. 199, § 7; they being equitable owners, on whom actual possession had been conferred by the lien claimants, who were rightfully in possession before the sale, and vested with a power of sale and absolute transfer under Civ. Code, §§ 3051, 3052.

7. Replevin ⇨8(3)—May be maintained by one having qualified property if he has right to possession.

Replevin may be maintained by one having a qualified property in the goods, if he has the right to possession.

8. Partnerships ⇨64—Partners' right to recover automobile not affected by not filing certificate as to names when suit or answer filed, where filed before trial.

That the certificate as to names and residences required by Civ. Code, § 2466, was not filed by partners suing for possession of an automobile when the action or answer was filed, does not affect their right to recover, where they regularly filed the certificate before trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Louis Goodman and others against the Anglo-California Trust Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellants.

F. A. Denicke and H. S. Young, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This action was brought to recover a Hudson automobile or its value from the defendants. From a judgment against them, the plaintiffs appeal.

[1-3] Plaintiffs alleged ownership and right of possession in themselves, and that the defendants were wrongfully detaining the automobile; that the actual value of the same was $1,000. The answer denied the allegations of the complaint. The findings are really conclusions of law. They recite that the plaintiffs were not at any time the owners, nor entitled to the possession of the automobile, and that the defendant bank, at all times mentioned in the complaint, was the owner of the property and entitled to the possession of the same, and that the automobile was not wrongfully detained by the defendants. It becomes necessary for us to go back to the evidence and to state the undisputed facts. Some time about October, 1920, James S. Brian was in possession of the automobile in dispute by virtue of a certain conditional sales contract which had been assigned by the original vendor to the defendant bank. Messrs. Green and Gohl were in the business of repairing automobiles in the city and county of San Francisco. Brian brought the automobile to their place of business to have it repaired. They repaired the same, and the charges for their services were $110. Section 3051 of the Civil Code would create a lien under these circumstances, as Brian was the legal possessor of the property and the repairs were made at his request. Davenport v. Grundy Motor Sales Co., 28 Cal. App. 409, 410, 152 Pac. 932. However, Green and Gohl permitted Brian to take the automobile out of their possession after he had signed an agreement transferring all his right, title, and interest in the same to them for their protection until the repair bill should be paid. We shall pass the question as to the sufficiency of this writing to retain the lien by evidencing an agreement of the parties that it should continue in effect, because, even though this writing be held sufficient to evidence such an intention upon the part of the parties thereto, nevertheless, it would not have that effect as to the bank, the real defendant here. Section 2913, Civ. Code; Thourot v. Delahaya Import Co., 69 Misc. Rep. 351, 125 N. Y. Supp. 827; Rehm v. Viall, 185 Ill. App. 425; McFarland v. Wheeler, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 467. We may disregard, therefore, that writing.

Brian took the car away and damaged it and returned it to Green and Gohl for further repairs. It appears in evidence that on this second occasion Brian "threw the counterbalance through the car." Green and Gohl, thereupon, sent the case out to be welded and had bearings put in and paid the bills for such work, amounting to $55. These bills were admitted in evidence and appear uncontradicted. The car never left the possession of Green and Gohl after they paid these bills for welding, etc., until after it was sold under the lien. Green and Gohl purchased the automobile at the lien sale for $175, and later sold it to the present plaintiffs.

[4] We shall pause here to consider the effect of the payment by Green and Gohl of the bills for welding, etc. Respondents contend that no lien could arise in favor of Green and Gohl for work done upon the car which was not done directly by them. In that contention, we think, respondents are in error. In the case of Quist v. Sandman, 154 Cal. 748, 754, 755, 99 Pac. 204, it was held that the right to a lien under sections 3051 and 3052, Civil Code, must be interpreted according to common-law principles. Some of the common-law rules regarding this question, with relation to liens upon personal property by virtue of work done, are: A lien is acquired by virtue of the work done, and it is immaterial whether the work be done by the claimant or his agents. Hall v. Tittabawassee Boom Co., 51 Mich. 377, 402, 16 N. W. 770. An artisan has a lien for work done in the way of his trade by another than himself outside his shop. Thus, where a chronometer was left with a watchmaker to be repaired, and the watchmaker, finding that he could not make the repairs, sent it to another city to be repaired, it was held that the watchmaker had a lien for the charges paid by him for the repairs done. Webber v. Cogswell, 2 Canada Sup. Ct. 15. And we are not without authority upon this point in our own state. The case of Quist v. Sandman, supra, is not only an authority for the proposition that section 3051 of our Civil Code is to be interpreted in the light of common-law principles, but it is direct authority for the proposition that a subcontractor may not assert a lien, but the lien must be asserted by the party with whom the owner has contracted.

[5] Now to proceed with our story. Green and Gohl called at the office of the defendant bank and explained that there was $165 due upon the car, and that it was in their possession, and they were holding it for a lien. Conceding to the respondents that the claim of lien was for too large an amount, because the lien for the first work, amounting to $110, had been lost, and the only lien existing at the time of the demand was one for $55, the rights of the lien claimants were not prejudiced in any way by this mistaken demand, in the absence of any tender by the bank of the actual amount due. Folsom v. Barrett, 180 Mass. 439, 62 N. E. 723, 91 Am. St. Rep. 320; 17 R. C. L. 606.

Green and Gohl gave notice of a sale under the lien, and duly and regularly purchased the car at the sale. The question of their right to retain only $55 instead of $165 out of the proceeds of such sale is not involved upon this appeal. We are concerned only with the rights of an innocent purchaser from the vendee at the lien sale.

Upon the facts so far recited we think the purchasers at the lien sale received title to the automobile and consequently their vendees, the present plaintiffs, have a good title, and were entitled to recover possession of the automobile or its value from the bank.

[6] However, two technical obstacles are raised by the respondents as to the right of the appellants herein to recover: One is that they failed to comply with section 8 of the so-called Motor Vehicle Act (Act 2331b, [Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1917-1921] approved May 10, 1915, as amended by Stats. 1917, p. 382, and by Stats. 1919, p. 191), because they failed to secure an assignment of the certificate of registration issued in the name of James S. Brian and file the same with the motor vehicle department of the state of California. The other contention is that the plaintiffs did not file with the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco a certificate required by section 2466, Civil Code, stating the names in full and the places of residence of the persons transacting business under the name and style of Goodman Bros.

As to the first objection, the Motor Vehicle

Act (section 8 thereof) provides that, in case of transfer of ownership of a motor vehicle by operation of law, or otherwise than by the voluntary act of the registered owner, the notice of transfer, as well as the joint statement provided for by the act, shall be signed by the sheriff or other representative or successor in interest of the registered owner in lieu of such owner. Other provisions of said act are that, until the registration certificate is transferred in the manner provided in the act, delivery of said motor vehicle shall not be deemed to have been made, and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed, and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose.

Giving the above-quoted provisions of the act their full value, it follows that the plaintiffs did not have the legal title to the car, and the attempted transfer to them by bill of sale was incomplete. However, they were the equitable owners, for they had paid the full purchase price of the car, and they had the right to demand of the lien claimants the documents required by said Motor Vehicle Act to complete their title. The lien claimants were the "successors in interest of the registered owner" within the meaning of the Motor Vehicle Act, and had the power to make the assignment or the affidavits required by such act for a complete transfer of title to themselves as purchasers at the lien sale. If they failed to thus perfect their own legal title after they had purchased at the lien sale, such failure only delayed the completion of the transfer to them, and did not give third persons, with no claim to the property, the right to step in and deprive them or their vendees of its possession. When Green and Gohl purchased at the lien sale and paid the purchase price, they, individually, became the equitable owners of the property, with a right, as lien claimants and successors in interest of the registered owner, to complete the transfer to themselves, individually, of the legal title. This equitable title, coupled with the right to have the legal title perfected, devolved upon the present plaintiffs when they purchased the automobile from Green and Gohl. They acquired all the right, title, and interest in the automobile which Green and Gohl had. Therefore, while plaintiffs did not have a complete legal title because of the above-quoted provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, they had an equitable title and a right to receive the full legal title, and they had actual possession conferred upon them by the persons entitled to the possession, i. e., the lien claimants who were rightfully in possession of the property prior to the lien sale and were vested with a power of sale and absolute transfer under sections 3051 and 3052, Civil Code. On the other hand, the seizure of the automobile by the defendant bank was entirely without right. The bank had no shadow of a claim to the automobile, because its rights were cut off by the lien sale. It had been informed of the existence of a valid lien and had failed to make any tender to discharge the same; it had been notified of the contemplated sale under such lien, and had failed to take any steps to protect its interest in the car. The plaintiffs had become at least the equitable owners of the automobile, and were entitled to its possession under such equitable claim and also by reason of having been placed in possession of the lien claimants who were rightfully in possession and vested with a power of sale. Chucovich v. S. F. Securities Corp. (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 263; Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 Pac. 848.

[7] Plaintiffs were entitled to recover possession of the automobile from the defendants. They were the equitable owners and had been put in rightful possession by those who had the power to transfer to them the complete legal title and the possession of the property. Replevin may be maintained by one who has a qualified property in the goods, provided he has the right to the possession. Lazard v. Wheeler, 22 Cal. 139.

[8] As to the other objection of the respondents with respect to the filing of the certificate required by section 2466, Civil Code, it is sufficient to point out that, although the certificate was not filed at the time of the filing of the action or at the time the answer was filed, it had been regularly filed prior to the trial of the action. The question is settled against the respondents by the recent case of Rudneck v. So. Cal. M. & R. Co., 184 Cal. 274, 282, 193 Pac. 775. In speaking of the requirements of the section of the Civil Code under consideration, our Supreme Court said in said last-cited case:

"We have no hesitation in extending this rule so as to make it sufficient if there be a compliance with the statute before trial upon the issue."

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is reversed.

CONTANT v. WALLACE. (Civ. 3674.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 5, 1923.)

1. Brokers §58(1)—Obliged either to produce valid, enforceable contract to purchase, or to bring parties together so that vendor may secure contract.

The contract of a broker is to negotiate a sale, that is, to produce a valid contract to purchase which can be enforced by the vendor if his title is perfect, or, if he does not procure such contract, to bring the vendor and proposed purchaser together, so that the vendor may secure the contract unless he is willing to trust to an oral agreement.

2. Brokers §58—Broker bringing vendor and purchaser together does not lose commission if vendor makes unenforceable contract with purchaser.

Where a broker procures a contract from the purchaser, it is necessary that the paper be one which is valid, and the terms of which the vendor may enforce; but where the vendor himself formulates the contract with the purchaser, the broker does not lose his commission if an invalid or unenforceable agreement is entered into between the vendor and purchaser through mistake or ignorance of the former.

3. Pleading §112—Denial of something not asserted in complaint held not to raise issue as to matter denied.

Where, in an action by a broker for commission, the answer denied that the prospective purchaser was willing to buy, but such matter was not alleged in the complaint, the denial did not make an issue, and did not amount to an affirmative allegation that the prospective purchaser was not ready to buy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Alice Contant against John Wallace, executor of the estate of Jacob Sholley, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward H. Bautzer, of San Pedro, and Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. C. Schaefer, of San Pedro, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This cause was tried, the appeal was perfected, and the briefs on appeal were filed in the lifetime of Jacob Sholley, the original defendant. The suggestion of his death and the substitution of his executor in his stead were made in this court.

Plaintiff, a real estate broker, brought the action for the purpose of recovering a broker's commission. The complaint alleges that Sholley employed her as his agent to sell a certain parcel of real property, that she found a purchaser, and that Sholley "accepted the proposal of the purchaser so secured * * * and entered into a written agreement of purchase and sale relating to said real property with said purchaser." Plaintiff had judgment, and Sholley appealed.

[1, 2] That the above-mentioned allegations were all true was established at the trial by uncontradicted evidence, at least to the extent that it was shown that a purported agreement was entered into between Sholley and the purchaser, but appellant contends that the "agreement" was incomplete and unenforceable. Without passing upon this claim, it is enough to say that the point is immaterial.

"The contract of the broker is to negotiate a sale; that is, to procure a valid contract to purchase, which can be enforced by the vendor if his title is perfect; or if he does not procure such contract [italics ours] to bring the vendor and the proposed purchaser together, that the vendor may secure such a contract, unless he is willing to trust to an oral agreement." Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105.

See, also, Mott v. Minor, 11 Cal. App. 774, 106 Pac. 244; Cone v. Keil, 18 Cal. App. 675, 124 Pac. 548; Massie v. Chatom, 163 Cal. 772, 127 Pac. 56; Twogood v. Monnette (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 542.

It is true that in the opinions in some of the cases cited there are dicta which indicate that, where an agreement of sale is executed between one desiring to sell and a prospective purchaser presented to the seller by a broker, the latter does not earn his commission unless the agreement is valid and binding. Such a rule would place brokers in an intolerable position, as it would make their compensation for services depend upon circumstances beyond their control. Where the broker procures the contract from the purchaser it is of course necessary that the paper be one which is valid and the terms of which the seller may enforce, but where the seller himself formulates the contract with the purchaser the situation is different. It cannot be the law that a broker loses his commission, after bringing seller and purchaser together, if an invalid or unenforceable agreement is entered into between seller and purchaser through the mistake, inadvertence, or ignorance of the former. Where the seller himself negotiates the terms of the contract the responsibility for its form and contents is on him, and it is necessary only that it be satisfactory to him when executed. The fact of execution by him is sufficient evidence that he is satisfied, in the absence of fraud, duress or the like. When the seller takes into his own hands the completion of the agreement of sale, the affair is so much in his hands and the broker is so completely discharged from responsibility in the premises that the seller is estopped to contend against the broker's claim for commission that the purchaser was not ready, able, or willing, to make the purchase. Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 173 Pac. 1109; Sobaje v. Schubert, 37 Cal. App. 709, 174 Pac. 364. See, also, Johnson v. Krier (Cal. App.) 210 Pac. 966. Plainly, it is as much the seller's duty to formulate a valid and enforceable contract as it is to ascertain for himself that the purchaser is ready, able, and willing to buy. We are satisfied that respondent earned her commission.

[3] Appellant's only other point is that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding made by the trial court that the purchaser was ready and willing to buy the property which was the subject of the seller's contract with the broker. This finding was, however, upon an immaterial matter, as the pleadings make no issue as to the readiness or willingness of the purchaser to buy. The complaint presents no allegation on the subject, although the answer contains a denial that the purchaser was ready, able, or willing to buy. This denial of what is not asserted in the complaint did not make an issue. Surely, it does not amount to an affirmative allegation that the prospective purchaser was not ready, able, or willing to complete the transaction.

Judgment affirmed.

RUNDELL v. McDONALD et al. (Civ. 3869.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 2, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1097(1)—Decision on previous appeal conclusive only as to facts remaining unchanged at second trial.

A decision on a previous appeal of a case is conclusive only as to those points which are not affected by different state of facts disclosed at the second trial thereof.

2. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 142—Equity may enforce parol agreement to devise or bequeath property; rule stated.

Though a parol agreement to devise or bequeath property is within the statute and is at law a complete nullity under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 7, and Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1973, subd. 7, such rule does not preclude a court of equity from enforcing such an agreement; the rule being that, where there has been a part performance by one party under such circumstances as to render it inequitable to allow the other party to repudiate the contract on the ground that it is not in writing, he is estopped from so doing.

3. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 129(3)—Agreement to devise held taken out of statute by part performance.

Where plaintiff, pursuant to an agreement with defendant, who was his aunt and stepmother, conveyed property in which she had a life estate to her with the understanding that she would devise it to him, held, that his conveyance to her constituted such a part performance as to take the transaction out of the statute and entitle him to have the property in the hands of her personal representative impressed with a trust in his favor.

4. Specific performance $\S$ 86—Husband who married without knowledge of wife's previous agreement to devise certain property to nephew held not to have rights superior to nephew.

In an action against the administrator of plaintiff's aunt, who was also his stepmother and widow of his father, to impress certain real property with a trust in his favor by reason of an agreement by deceased to devise the property to him, the fact that decedent subsequent to her agreement had remarried without disclosing her agreement to her husband held not to vest in him rights superior to plaintiff's, as respects plaintiff's right to specific performance of the agreement.

5. Parties ⚡84(1)—Defect of parties defendant held waived.

Where, in action against surviving husband as administrator of his deceased wife's estate and of her other heirs to enforce agreement between plaintiff and deceased that she would devise property to him, plaintiff dismissed as to all defendants except the surviving husband, objection that decree against him was invalid for defect in parties defendant was waived by failure to object under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, unless such heirs were indispensable to final determination.

6. Specific performance ⚡106(3) — Heirs of deceased held not indispensable parties in action to enforce agreement to devise property.

In an action against surviving husband as administrator of his deceased wife's estate to enforce agreement between plaintiff and deceased that she would devise property to him, held, that heirs of deceased other than husband were not indispensable parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Albert M. Rundell against Albert W. McDonald, individually and as administrator of the estate of Mary Ann McDonald, deceased, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richards, Heaney & Price, Fred H. Schauer, and Francis Price, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Coleman E. Stewart, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to enforce performance of an oral contract made by plaintiff with his aunt—who, as his father's widow, was likewise plaintiff's stepmother—whereby the latter promised to devise to plaintiff, by her last will and testament, the parcel of land in controversy. It is sought to impress the property with a trust in favor of plaintiff and thus to secure to him the benefit of the contract pursuant to which he deeded the land to his stepmother on the strength of her promise to give it back again by devising it to him. She did, indeed, make a will whereby she devised the land to plaintiff as she had agreed—a holographic will duly executed by her on May 7, 1914—but this will, by reason of the provisions of section 1300 of the Civil Code, was revoked by her subsequent marriage to appellant and was never thereafter republished. The name of the stepmother at the date of the conveyance from her stepson was Mary Ann Rundell, she being at that time the surviving wife of plaintiff's deceased father. Subsequently she married the defendant and appellant, Albert W. McDonald. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and the defendant McDonald appeals.

This is the second time the cause has been before this court. The first appeal was upon a judgment entered against plaintiff after an order sustaining a general demurrer to his complaint. 41 Cal. App. 175, 182 Pac. 450. That appeal resulted in a reversal of the judgment, and on the going down of the remittitur the defendant Albert W. McDonald, personally and as the administrator of the estate of his deceased wife, answered plaintiff's complaint. A trial was had, resulting in findings in favor of plaintiff upon all the material issues. The principal facts in the case are stated in the opinion filed in the first appeal. It therefore will not be necessary to restate them or to do aught but point out certain additional facts developed by the evidence adduced on the trial.

It now appears that the contract between plaintiff and his stepmother, in pursuance whereof he executed the deed to her, rested in parol. Prior to and at the time of the execution of that instrument the stepmother was vested with a life estate in the land, plaintiff having deraigned his title through a deed from his father whereby the latter conveyed the land to plaintiff subject to a life estate reserved unto himself "and to his wife, Mary Ann Rundell, and to the survivor of them." The deed whereby plaintiff's father reserved this life estate was executed February 22, 1906. The father died a few months thereafter, whereupon his widow, as the survivor, became the sole owner of the life estate. On February 20, 1912, the date of plaintiff's deed to her, the stepmother was in the exclusive possession of the land as such life tenant. Subsequently, June 6, 1914, which was more than two years after plaintiff executed the deed to her, plaintiff's stepmother married the defendant and appellant, Albert W. McDonald. The trial court found, contrary to the uncontradicted evidence, that plaintiff's stepmother, prior to her marriage to appellant, informed the latter that she had devised the land to plaintiff. The evidence shows without contradiction that appellant had no knowledge of the oral agreement pursuant to which plaintiff executed the deed to his stepmother in consideration of her promise to give it back to him on her death by devising it to him.

[1] On the former appeal this court assumed that the agreement between plaintiff and his stepmother was in writing, there being nothing to the contrary stated in the complaint. That assumption was indulged because that appeal, as we have stated, was from a judgment entered on an order sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint. It also was said on that appeal that it did not appear from the complaint that the defendant McDonald did not have knowledge of the agreement at the time of his marriage to Mary Ann Rundell. The decision on that appeal is conclusive only as to those points which are not affected by the different state of facts disclosed by the record on this appeal.

Appellant's main contentions are: (1) That the contract between plaintiff and his stepmother was not taken out of the statute of frauds; (2) that appellant, having married respondent's stepmother in ignorance of the latter's agreement to devise the property to respondent, is possessed of intervening superior equities by reason whereof a court of equity should refuse to grant the relief sought hereby; and (3) that because respondent dismissed the action as against all of the stepmother's heirs other than her surviving husband, the judgment is against only one of several necessary parties defendant and should therefore be reversed.

[2] It is, of course, readily conceded that a parol agreement to devise or bequeath property is within the statute of frauds and is at law a complete nullity. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 7, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 7. But though the statute is a bar at law, we do not understand appellant to contend that a court of equity may not enforce a parol agreement to make a devise or a bequest of property if there has been sufficient part performance. His contention, if we rightly understand it, is that the facts of this case are not sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Therefore, for the purpose of this decision we shall assume that, as in the case of a parol agreement to convey real property, an oral agreement to make a devise or a bequest may be taken out of the statute of frauds in all cases where there has been such part performance on the part of the person seeking to enforce the contract that it would be a virtual fraud to interpose the statute as a bar to a completion of the contract. In cases of parol agreements for the conveyance of real property by deed, fraud inhering in the consequences of setting up the statute is the foundation of the doctrine that such parol agreements, if partly performed, may be enforced by courts of equity notwithstanding the requirement of the statute. The rule as to the effect of part performance is based entirely on equitable considerations. In cases of oral contracts for the conveyance of lands the general rule is that where there has been a part performance by one party to the oral agreement under such circumstances as to make it inequitable to allow the other party receiving the benefit to repudiate the contract on the ground that it is not in writing, he is estopped from doing so. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 318, 95 Pac. 154, 159. As an application of this equitable doctrine, it is generally held that where there is an oral contract for the exchange of lands, a conveyance by one on the faith of the agreement to exchange properties constitutes such part performance as will in equity take the case out of the operation of the statute. Pearsall v. Henry, supra.

[3] In principle the case at bar cannot be distinguished from Pearsall v. Henry, supra. In the case of an oral agreement to exchange lands, the party who has made a conveyance under the agreement is to receive in return a different parcel of land; in a case such as that presented by the record before us the party who makes the conveyance on the faith of the other's parol agreement to return it to him by devise is to get back, not other land, as in the case of an agreement to exchange, but the very property which he conveyed to the other on the strength of the latter's promise to give it back in the form of a devise. In so far as the statute of frauds is concerned, there does not appear to be any distinction, in principle, between a case where a party who has performed his part of the oral agreement is to get back the same land under the form of a devise and a case where he is to receive other land under the form of a deed of conveyance. It seems clear, therefore, that the principle of such cases as Pearsall v. Henry is applicable to the instant case, and that respondent's conveyance to his stepmother took the case out of the statute of frauds.

It is true that in the instant case the grantee was in possession when she received her stepson's deed. But even so, she made use of the title granted to her by mortgaging the land to secure the repayment of a loan made to her because she was able to give such mortgage security. She could not so use the title conveyed to her by respondent without estopping herself and her heirs from setting up the statute of frauds.

For these reasons we think the conveyance of the real property by plaintiff placed him in a position to compel compliance with his stepmother's promise to revest him with the title on her death by devising the land to him. Other than this promise there was no consideration for respondent's deed to his stepmother. To permit appellant or any of the heirs of respondent's grantee to keep the property which comes to them as heirs of their intestate, and for which no consideration was given other than their intestate's promise to devise the land to her grantor, would enable them to take a fraudulent advantage of respondent's generosity to his stepmother and would work a travesty on justice, wholly inconsistent with the great principles by which courts are universally controlled in administering equitable relief.

[4] There is no merit in the claim that appellant, because he was ignorant of his wife's promise to devise the land to respondent, is an innocent third party vested with superior intervening equities. Appellant cites us to Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 Pac. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369. There are material points of distinction between the equities which appear in the case at bar and the equities as shown in Owens v. McNally and in the other cases cited by appellant. In Owens v. McNally, the case mainly relied upon by appellant, the promisor at the time of his death had accumulated an estate in excess of $20,000 in value, to no part of which had the plaintiff contributed. In that case the agreement between the plaintiff and her uncle did not make certain either the length of time which the plaintiff was to spend in living with and caring for her uncle or the kind or character of services which she was to render. While in her uncle's household Miss Owens took and occupied the station of a daughter. She therefore undoubtedly received such support and maintenance as naturally would fall to a daughter's lot. This in itself was some compensation for the services which she agreed to render. The contract which she alleged her uncle had made with her contemplated the taking by her of all his estate, to the exclusion of any future wife or child. These are marked dissimilarities which readily distinguish that case from this. In the present case respondent only claims that which in his generosity he had conveyed to his stepmother on the strength of her promise that on her death he would receive it back in kind, free from conditions or incumbrances. The life estate which the stepmother held and which came to her under the deed executed by respondent's father on February 22, 1906, terminated with the expiration of the stepmother's life. Had respondent not deeded the property to her, and had he retained his title until his stepmother's death, he then would have owned all of the title to the property and not merely an estate in remainder. The result is that he is seeking to regain no more than what would have been his had his stepmother not been made the recipient of his bounty. The instant case presents an entirely different situation from that which arises where one promises to leave, at death, his own and indefinite estate, accumulated by his own efforts, for an unliquidated obligation for services rendered or to be rendered. We think it clear, therefore, that even if appellant did enter into the marriage relation with respondent's stepmother in ignorance of her oral agreement to devise the land to respondent, there does not inhere in his right of heirship or right of succession an equity which can be said to be superior to respondent's equities. There is nothing "harsh, oppressive and unjust" in returning the property to the one who, by virtue of contract and good conscience, is entitled to it, instead of passing it on, by succession, to one who, as was aptly said by Mr. Justice Sloane when the case was last here, "is only related to it by marriage."

[5] There remains for consideration only the contention that the judgment should be reversed because at the time when it was entered all the heirs of Mary Ann McDonald, plaintiff's grantee, were not before the court. All the heirs were parties to the suit until plaintiff dismissed as to the defendants other than the surviving husband, Albert W. McDonald. That dismissal was made prior to the time when appellant filed his answer. Indeed, it was made prior to the time when the first appeal was taken, and is alluded to in the opinion handed down on that appeal. Without doubt appellant had actual knowledge of the dismissal when he answered the complaint. He filed his answer and participated in the trial of the action, speculating on the possibility of a favorable judgment, without in any way calling the attention of the lower court to the fact that these other heirs no longer were parties to the suit. If therefore there was a defect of parties defendant at the time when the judgment was entered, appellant waived the right to complain (section 434, Code Civ. Proc.), unless the other heirs were indispensable parties without whose presence a complete determination of the controversy could not be had without prejudicing their rights (section 389, Code Civ. Proc.). It is only where the court cannot determine the controversy between the parties before it without prejudicing the rights of others that other parties must be brought in. Lytle Creek Water Co. v. Perdew, 65 Cal. 447, 455, 4 Pac. 426. If it is only an appellant's rights which may be injuriously affected by reason of the absence of other parties, it is his duty appropriately to call the trial court's attention thereto with a request that they be brought in. Failing to do so, he cannot be heard to complain in this court. Smith v. Cucamonga Water Co., 160 Cal. 611, 617, 117 Pac. 764; Alison v. Goldtree, 117 Cal. 545, 550, 49 Pac. 571.

[6] In passing upon appellant's contention that there is a fatal defect of parties defendant, it will not be necessary to decide whether an agreement to dispose of property by will may be enforced against the promisor's estate or personal representative, or whether it is enforceable against the heirs only. If it be enforceable against his estate or against his personal representative, then this appellant, who is sued as the administrator of his deceased wife's estate as well as individually, represents, in his capacity as administrator, the estate and the interests of all the heirs. If, on the other hand, as appellant contends, an action such as this can be maintained only against the heirs, appellant nevertheless is in no position to complain of any defect of parties defendant, since the decree cannot injudiciously affect the other heirs. Though the heirs succeeded to the legal title as tenants in common, they held their respective undivided moieties by several and distinct titles. The principle upon which courts of equity undertake to enforce the execution of an agreement to dispose of property in a particular way by last will and testament is one which is referable to the subject of specific performance. But a court has no power to compel a person to execute a last will and testament carrying out an agreement to bequeath or devise his property, for this can be done only in the lifetime of the testator. No breach of the agreement can be assumed so long as he lives, and after his death he no longer is capable of doing the thing agreed to be done by him. The theory on which the courts proceed, therefore, is to fasten a trust on the property in favor of the promisee, and to enforce such trust against the heirs of the deceased. Under this theory each heir holds the title to which he has succeeded in trust for the promisee. In the instant case the effect of the judgment against appellant as the surviving husband was to fasten a trust on the title to which he succeeded and to compel a conveyance of that title to respondent. If, as appellant contends, an action such as this lies only against the heirs of the deceased promisor and not against his estate or personal representative, then the judgment cannot be pleaded against any of the heirs as to whom the action was dismissed. It follows, therefore, that the decree in no wise affects the rights of appellant's coheirs, and that they were not indispensable parties to the action.

The other points made by appellant do not merit consideration. Indeed, they are in effect disposed of by what we have said in our discussion of his three principal points.

The judgment is affirmed.

GENERAL MOTORS ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION v. HOLMAN et al.
(Civ. 4708.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1923.)

Appeal and error §787—Appeal dismissed, in absence of notice of motion for new trial, bill of exceptions, transcript, or request therefor, or allowance of additional time.

Where no notice of a motion for new trial has been filed, and no proceedings therefor are pending, the notice of appeal contains no request for a transcript under Code Civ. Proc.

§ 953a, and no transcript thereunder or any bill of exceptions under section 650 has been filed, or any additional time allowed or draft of bill served, the appeal will be dismissed on appellee's motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the General Motors Acceptance Corporation against Jack Holman and Herbert Simmons. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Simmons appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

F. G. Eby, for appellant.

Haswell & Pierce, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a motion to dismiss the appeal of the defendant Herbert Simmons. Notice of said motion was duly served upon the attorney of record for said appellant.

It appears from the certificate of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, filed herein in support of the motion, that a money judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff and against defendants herein was duly made and entered on the 14th day of April, 1923; that notice of entry of said judgment was duly served upon the attorney for the defendants on the 29th day of May, 1923; that on the 12th day of June, 1923, the defendant Herbert Simmons filed a notice of appeal from the said judgment; that there has been no notice filed of motion for a new trial in said action, and no proceedings for a new trial are pending therein; that said notice of appeal contained no request for a transcript under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and that no bill of exceptions has been filed under section 650 of the said Code of Civil Procedure, nor transcript under said section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure; that no additional time within which to prepare and serve a draft of a bill of exceptions has been allowed by the said superior court or any judge thereof.

The motion is also supported by the affidavit of the attorney for the plaintiff and respondent that no draft of any bill of exceptions nor a copy thereof has been served upon the plaintiff in this action nor upon the attorney for said plaintiff.

It appears, therefore, that the appellant has failed to comply with the essential requirements of either method of appeal from a superior court judgment provided for in this state.

The appeal is dismissed.

The intent of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 9 (a), requiring the employer to provide medical treatment, and making an employer neglecting to do so liable for the expense incurred by the employee, is that the employer shall, in the first instance, have the right to designate and select physicians who are to give treatment to the employee, and the latter is authorized to make his own selection at the expense of the employer only where the employer has neglected to provide the necessary service.

Application by W. E. Myers for a writ of review to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Joseph G. Renteria for injuries. Affirmed.

Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, J. The petitioner seeks in this proceeding to annul the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding compensation to Joseph G. Renteria for injuries found by the respondent to have been sustained by the employee in the course of and arising out of his employment at the winery of the petitioner near Livermore. While working about a vat of boiling sherry wine, Renteria was severely burned by an explosion, caused by alcoholic fumes from the vat becoming ignited from a lighted candle which Renteria was using in his work.

The petitioner contends that there is no evidence in the record supporting the finding that the applicant sustained his injuries in the course of and arising out of his employment, and that he was, at the time, reasonably engaged in the performance of his work. The evidence taken before the Commission shows that Renteria was working around petitioner's winery as a laborer. He seems to have had no especial duties to perform, but did whatever he was told to do by Mr. Jaffe, the foreman in charge of the place. The interior of the winery was dark, and much of the work had to be carried on by the aid of artificial light. There were electric lights in and about the place, but these did not afford sufficient illumination to en-

MYERS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10508.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1923. Rehearing Denied Sept. 20, 1923.)

1. Master and servant ☞405(4)—Finding of compensable injury to workman taking temperature of boiling wine sustained.

In a proceeding to recover compensation for injuries to a laborer taking temperature of boiling sherry wine in a tank, who was injured by the explosion of alcoholic fumes which escaped from the tank and came in contact with a lighted candle, held, that the evidence supported a finding that he sustained injuries in the course of and arising out of his employment, and that he was at the time reasonably engaged in the performance of his work, notwithstanding the foreman's testimony that claimant was ordered to measure the contents of the tank, and not to take its temperature as claimant testified.

2. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Finding on evidence in compensation case final.

Where there is competent testimony to support a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission, it will not be reviewed by the court.

3. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Finding on question of willful misconduct of compensation claimant held final.

In a proceeding to recover compensation for injury to a winery employee, burned by exploding alcoholic fumes lighted by a candle which he was using, held, that the questions whether his action in using the candle rather than an electric light which had been provided amounted to willful misconduct, or whether he was ignorant, uninformed, or knowingly forgot, or whether he disobeyed orders made for his protection, were matters for determination by the Commission, and the appellate court could not say that the finding that the injury was not caused by serious and willful misconduct was justified by the evidence.

able employees to carry on their work in some locations. For this purpose candles were supplied by the petitioner and used by the workmen. It was necessary, from time to time, to take the temperature of the wine in the various tanks and vats in the winery. This was ordinarily done by reading the thermometers affixed to the sides of the tanks. There was one tank used for boiling sherry wine which had no such attachment. A thermometer had been provided, and a workman had been ready to put it on the tank. He was told by both petitioner and his foreman Jaffe to do other work and put the thermometer on later, as "they didn't need it." Without such an appliance, the temperature in the tank could be ascertained either by allowing some of the wine to run into a cup, or by dropping a thermometer on a line into the tank from the top.

[1, 2] On the day of the accident, Jaffe gave an order to Renteria concerning the tank containing the boiling sherry wine. Jaffe testified that he told Renteria to measure the contents of the tank. Renteria declared that he was ordered to take the temperature of the wine. He had never done that work in this particular tank. He proceeded to get a candle, and a thermometer on a line, and went on to the top of the tank. He found the thermometer too large to go through the bunghole in the top of the tank, and removed the cover from the manhole. He lowered the thermometer into the wine in the tank and drew it up. While he was attempting to read it, the fumes of alcohol escaping from the tank were exploded by coming in contact with the lighted candle. Renteria was hurled to the ground, his clothing afire, and was very seriously burned. If Renteria's testimony is true, he was, at the time of his injury, performing an act which he had been ordered by petitioner's superintendent to perform, and was, as found by the Commission, "reasonably in the performance of his work." He was then performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment, and was acting within the course of his employment. Engels, etc., Mng. Co. v. I. A. C., 183 Cal. 714, 717, 192 Pac. 845, 11 A. L. R. 785. Assuming it was Jaffe who spoke the truth, and that the employee misunderstood his order, he was still working in the petitioner's service and not doing anything personal to himself. As argued by respondent:

"He was doing an act which he had done before at the instance of the employer, but in another way, and for the employer's benefit, and which he could reasonably expect to be told to do again."

What he was doing had a direct connection with petitioner's business. Whether the applicant should be believed, or whether Jaffe's testimony should be accepted, was a matter resting solely with the Industrial Accident Commission. There being competent evidence to support its finding, it will not be reviewed by this court. Dearborn v. I. A. C., 187 Cal. 591, 594, 203 Pac. 112.

[3] Petitioner's further attack is directed to the finding of the Commission that the injury to Renteria was not caused by the serious and willful misconduct of the employee. Having shown that there was available a safe artificial light at the time Renteria attempted to take the temperature of the tank with a lighted candle, he argues that the employee chose a dangerous instrumentality in disregard of his own safety and the safety of others, and that the finding fails of support. Section 21 of article 20 of the state Constitution, as amended November 5, 1918, prescribes that compensation shall be provided the employee to the extent of relieving him from the consequences of any injury sustained in the course of his employment, "irrespective of the fault of any party." The applicant and other witnesses testified that petitioner kept candles around the winery for use about the tanks and in other dark places generally, and that they were never forbidden to use candles, and were never cautioned about their use or the danger arising from alcoholic fumes coming in contact with a flame. Renteria said he did not know the sherry tank was liable to explode, and had never heard of such an explosion before. On the other hand, Jaffe, the foreman, testified that he had repeatedly told the men to be careful about the use of candles, and had on one occasion told Renteria not to use lighted candles around the fortified wine tanks. The fact was well established, however, that candles were in common use about the winery to supply light in dark spots, and when the electric power was off, and for the purpose of testing tanks for the presence of carbon dioxide gas before the men went inside to clean them. An electric light on a cord of sufficient length to have been used by Renteria was near the tank.

When injured, the applicant was a common laborer, twenty-three years of age. It was for the Commission to determine the facts from all the surroundings and attendant circumstances as they existed at the time of the injury. Whether the action of the employee amounted to willful misconduct as used in the act, and as defined in Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 186, 149 Pac. 35, or whether it did not amount to that, was for the Commission to determine. Whether he was ignorant and uninformed, or, knowing, forgot, or whether he was or was not warned, or whether he disobeyed orders made for his protection—these were all matters for it to consider. U. S. Fidelity & Guar. Co. v. I. A. C., 174 Cal. 616, 621, 163 Pac. 1013; Western Pac. R. Co. v. I. A. C., 180 Cal. 416, 418, 181 Pac.

787. We cannot say, as a matter of law in opposition to its judgment of the facts, that the finding of the Commission was not justified by the evidence.

[4] The injured employee was very badly burned by the explosion. The Commission awarded him the sum of $2,528.98 for the reasonable medical and hospital treatment rendered necessary in his case. Petitioner attacks this allowance upon the ground that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the respondent to make it, in that the expenses were incurred in a manner not authorized by him. His contention is that he made suitable provision for the injured employee's care and attention, which was not accepted by Renteria; that there was no neglect or refusal on his part entitling the employee to make his own arrangements. There is no merit in the point. Section 9 (a) of the Workman's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831) provides that, where liability for compensation under the act exists, such medical and hospital treatment as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury shall be provided by the employer. In case of his neglect or refusal reasonably to do so, the employer shall be liable for the reasonable expense incurred by or on behalf of the employee in providing the same. The intent of this provision is that the employer shall, in the first instance, have the right to designate and select the physicians who are to give treatment to the employee. The latter is authorized to make his own selection at the expense of the employer only where the employer has neglected or refused to provide the necessary service. Leadbetter v. I. A. C., 179 Cal. 468, 470, 177 Pac. 449. There is a direct conflict as to what occurred in this case immediately following the explosion which caused the injuries to Renteria. The man was very seriously burned. He was in great pain and suffered intensely. There was in the town of Livermore at the time a sanitarium sometimes called "the emergency hospital," but privately owned and having no connection with the municipality. It was run by a registered nurse, Miss McKenzie, and adjoined the office of Drs. Warner and Dolan. Dr. W. L. Meyers, Renteria's family physician, also lived in and had his office in Livermore. Testimony offered for the petitioner is that Jaffe, the manager, directed that Renteria be taken "to the emergency hospital." Renteria denied this, and swore positively that he requested to be taken immediately to his family physician for treatment, which was agreed to by Jaffe.

The fact is he was taken to Dr. Meyers, who gave him a hurried "first aid" treatment, and directed that he be taken at once to a private sanitarium maintained by Mrs. Aylward, also in Livermore. Through a misunderstanding, the party charged with taking Renteria to the Aylward sanitarium took him to Miss McKenzie's place. There Dr. Dolan and Dr. Warner proceeded to put on a temporary dressing. Dr. Meyers arrived shortly after, and Renteria was immediately removed to Mrs. Aylward's sanitarium.

[5] No arrangement was ever made by petitioner with Dr. Dolan to furnish treatment at his expense, and, so far as the record discloses, no one was ever retained by him or instructed to attend Renteria. On the other hand, Mr. Jaffe visited Renteria at the Aylward sanitarium the morning after the explosion, and a number of times after that. He was solicitous about Renteria's condition, and expressed himself as satisfied with the treatment the young man was receiving. It is plain from a reading of the Compensation Act that it is the first duty of an employer to furnish medical aid and hospital service to an injured employee, and not merely to reimburse the latter after the service has been procured elsewhere. The Commission was entitled to accept as true the evidence of the applicant that his request that he be treated by his family physician, Dr. Meyers, was satisfactory to petitioner's manager. That was done. By tacit permission, and with the express approval of Jaffe, the treatment was continued by Dr. Meyers, and the employee was cared for at the Aylward sanitarium. Consent of an employer, either affirmatively given, or inferred from his inaction, to the employee to procure his own treatment, renders the employer liable for the reasonable expenses thus incurred. Trustees, etc., v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co., 267 Pa. 474, 110 Atl. 255; Ripley's Case, 229 Mass. 302, 118 N. E. 638; Bucyrus Co. v. Reisinger (Ind. App.) 133 N. E. 516. The reasonableness of the bills was by stipulation submitted to Dr. Gibbons, the physician and surgeon of the Commission, who filed his approval of the accounts. The jurisdiction of the Commission to make the award for reasonable value of the medical and hospital treatment received by the applicant in this case cannot be denied.

The award is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. DUFFILL et al. (L. A. 6814.)(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 17, 1920.)1. Judgment ¶735—Held not res judicata.

A judgment requiring specific performance by a former husband of agreement to convey to one of plaintiffs, as trustee for his former wife and son, a one-fourth of any property he might acquire in his mother's estate upon her death, the income from such one-fourth to be paid to the former wife, held not to estop, in a subsequent action, consideration of the question as to what constituted "corpus" of the estate and what "income" in the hands of the trustee, that question having not been involved in the first action.

4. Trusts ¶272(1)—Trust agreement in contemplation of divorce construed; "income."

Where a husband, by a trust agreement made in contemplation of divorce, agreed to convey to a trustee, for the benefit of his then wife, a one-fourth of any property or interest he might receive from his mother's estate, which agreement provided that the wife should be entitled only to the income from such one-fourth interest, and where subsequently the husband's mother by will placed all her property in the hands of a trustee so he received only the income thereof, one-fourth of which he paid to his divorced wife's trustee, held, that the portion so received by the trustee was "income" to which the wife was entitled, and not corpus of the husband's interest which was required to be reinvested, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 863, providing that beneficiaries under express trusts in real property take no interest, but may enforce performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against Martha Duffill and others. From an adverse decree, the named defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, and Alex. W. Davis, all of Los Angeles, James P. Sex, of San Jose, and Mulford & Dryer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove and Mattison B. Jones, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff, as trustee under the terms of a written agreement, brought this action for the interpretation of the trust, and sought the direction of the court as to the proper application of certain funds in its possession. Judgment was entered in accord with its contentions, and Martha Duffill, one of the defendants, and a beneficiary under the terms of the trust, appealed. On rehearing, we are satisfied with, and adopt the clear and comprehensive statement of, the facts prepared by Hon. Charles A. Shurtleff, a former justice of this court, on the first submission of the case:

"This action was brought by plaintiff as trustee for a decree interpreting a trust created by a certain written contract dated August 26, 1914, in which it is named as trustee, the principal beneficiaries of which trust are the defendants Harry Duffill, Martha Duffill, his divorced wife, and Albert Duffill, a minor, and only child of Harry and Martha Duffill. The contract was entered into between the defendants Harry and Martha Duffill pending an action for divorce brought by Martha against Harry, and embodied the terms of an adjustment of their property rights. The contract was made in view of the fact that orders for alimony for Martha and maintenance for Albert, the minor child, might be made in said divorce action, and was entered into subject to the approval of the court, which approval was subsequently given in and by decrees entered in said action. At the date of this contract Eugenie A. Duffill, the mother of defendant Harry Duffill, was alive and possessed a large estate, and Harry Duffill was her sole heir at law. The contract indicates that at the time of its execution the parties thereto had contemplated, indeed acted upon the assumption, that at his mother's death Harry would come into a large part of her estate. The portions of the agreement material to this discussion are as follows: 'The first party [Harry Duffill] covenants that in the event he shall acquire or receive from Eugenie A. Duffill [his mother], by devise, bequest, inheritance, succession, or from any trust agreement wherein the first party is the beneficiary and his beneficial estate arises after the death of said Eugenie A. Duffill, any property whatsoever, whether real or personal, of any kind and wherever situated, or any interest therein, that, forthwith upon acquiring or receiving each and every of said properties or interests, an undivided one-fourth of each and every such parcel and interest shall become the property of the Title Insurance & Trust Company [plaintiff] as trustee, in trust nevertheless for the uses and purposes hereinafter set forth. So far as is legally possible first party does hereby grant, bargain, sell, convey, assign, transfer and set over unto said trustee, an undivided one-fourth of each and every such property or interest. First party covenants that when, if and as, he shall become possessed of each and every such property or interest, or obtain the right to possession of any of the same, that forthwith and without any demand being made upon him by second party [Martha Duffill] or the trustee, and at his own proper cost and expense, he will cause title to an undivided one-fourth of each and every said such property and interest to be given, granted, conveyed, assigned and delivered to said trustee and will do all those things necessary or proper to establish the title of said trustee thereto as fully and effectually as could be done were first party seized and possessed of the same at the date of this instrument. * * * All the property, real and personal, held by Title Insurance & Trust Company as trustee hereunder shall be held by it as trustee for the uses and purposes, * * * namely, * * * from time to time to sell all or any part of said property on such terms and in such manner as it may see fit and from time to time to invest and reinvest the proceeds of any such sale or sales or any principal of the trust fund in such securities as are permitted for investment by savings banks under the laws of the state of California. * * * During the natural life of second party the trustee [at stated times] * * * shall pay over to second party [Martha Duffill], for her own use, all of the net income derived from the trust properties, but no part of the principal of said trust shall be expended or paid to second party.' The instrument further provides that upon the death of Martha Duffill the assets of the trust remaining in the hands of the trustee shall become the property of Albert Duffill, the son, and in the event his death shall have occurred prior to the death of Martha Duffill then such assets shall, upon her death, become the property of the lawful issue per stirpes et non per capita of Albert, living at his death, 'and in default of such issue the party of the first part shall have an estate in remainder in said assets, dependent upon the life estate in said assets herein and hereby created, for and during the natural life of the party of the second part.' It was further agreed that the trust 'shall wholly cease and determine upon the death of second party.'

"Eugenie A. Duffill died January 7, 1916, some sixteen months subsequent to the execution of the agreement of August 26, 1914, leaving a will, which will was admitted to probate by an order of the superior court of the State of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, and a decree of distribution was made therein on July 17, 1918. An appeal was taken from this decree to this court [Estate of Duffill, 180 Cal. 748, 183 Pac. 337], which resulted in an affirmance, and the same becoming final in August, 1919. The questions adjudicated and settled in that appeal are of no special moment here, and our reference to the same is for the purpose of showing the finality of such decree of distribution. Under the terms of this decree, property real and personal of large value was distributed to the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, the trustee named in the will, upon the following trusts: To take, hold and have possession of the same 'with full power to sell, lease, improve or exchange, invest or reinvest any or all of said property, * * * to invest, and reinvest and keep invested, said property' * * * and 'shall pay to said Albert Duffill, out of the income derived from the principal of the trust estate, the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) per year, at such times and in such amounts as said trustee shall deem expedient,

* * * the sum of four thousand dollars ($4,000.00) to Harry Duffill' [under like conditions], each of said payments to continue 'until said Albert Duffill shall reach the age of twenty-one years, or in the event of the death of said Albert Duffill, until the date when said Albert Duffill would have attained the age of twenty-one years had he lived.' * * * That one-half of the balance of the income from the principal of said trust estate, after paying the aforesaid [the sums payable to Harry and Albert] and the necessary expense of administration of the estate, shall be accumulated during the minority of Albert Duffill by said trustee, for his use and benefit, * * * and * * * the other one-half of the income from the principal of said trust estate shall be paid to Harry Duffill from time to time * * * after deducting the aforesaid annuities [those specified in the decree] and the necessary expense of administration of the said estate, * * * When said Albert Duffill shall attain the age of twenty-one years, in case said Harry Duffill shall then be living, the trustee shall segregate the corpus of said trust fund (excluding the accumulations for the benefit of Albert) into two equal parts, and shall transfer and convey one of said parts to the said Harry Duffill.' The decree proceeds to provide that in the event of the death of the said Harry Duffill prior to the distribution to him of said part, the trustee shall distribute all of said trust fund to said Albert Duffill upon terms and conditions not material to this inquiry, and that upon the death of Albert while there remains 'undistributed' to him any portion of the trust estate, the trustee shall transfer, convey and distribute such portion as follows: 'To Martha Duffill one-fourth of the entire trust estate then in the hands of the said trustee, including any accumulated income; and the remaining three-fourths of the said trust estate' to Harry Duffill, such distribution to said Harry Duffill to be made at the same time that the said Albert Duffill would have attained the age of twenty-one years.

"The decree of distribution further orders that 'in the event of the death of both Harry Duffill and Albert Duffill while any portion of the trust estate remains in the hands of the said trustee and undistributed, then upon the death of the last survivor of them said trustee shall thereupon distribute said entire trust fund so undistributed * * * as follows: To Martha Duffill one-fourth of the said estate,' and the remaining three-fourths to certain designated persons whose names need not be stated.

"The will of Eugenie A. Duffill also directed the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as trustee to accumulate the surplus income from the trust property until Albert attained or would have attained majority if he lived, and at said time, to pay to Harry Duffill one-half of such accumulated income, and to transfer to him one-half of the corpus of the trust estate. This provision for the accumulation of this one-half of the surplus income was declared to be invalid, not being for the benefit of a minor, and for that reason one-half of such accumulated income was distributed directly to Harry Duffill [Estate of Duffill, supra]. Pending the administration, which was prolonged by litigation, the income accumulated in a considerable amount. Subsequent to the decree of distribution becoming final the plaintiff, in an action brought against Harry Duffill for that purpose, obtained a decree directing specific performance of that portion of the contract of August 26, 1914, whereby he [Harry] obligated himself to transfer to plaintiff as trustee portions of any interests he might acquire from his mother's estate. In obedience to this decree Harry Duffill, at the time the instant suit was commenced, had paid or transferred, or caused to be paid or transferred to the plaintiff as trustee under the contract of August 26, 1914 (and wherever herein we refer to plaintiff as trustee it has reference to trustee under said last-mentioned contract), cash and properties in lieu of cash amounting to $12,229.44, which payment represented the proportionate amount of Harry Duffill's yearly annuity of $4,000 and one-half of said accrued income which was, as already stated, paid directly to Harry. At the same time, and upon the same date, there was also delivered to plaintiff, as such trustee, 150 shares of the common stock of the Grasselli Chemical Company, valued in said decree of distribution at $190 per share, making a total delivery of $40,729.44."

Martha Duffill claimed that under the provisions and trusts established by the agreement of August 26, 1914, she was entitled to have all of the cash and properties which had been delivered by Harry Duffill to plaintiff, as trustee, paid to her as income arising from the trust established by the contract, and that any and all other income which might thereafter be paid to plaintiff under the terms of the contract, or the decree of specific performance, and shall accrue from Harry Duffill's portion of the corpus of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, also constitutes income in the hands of plaintiff, distributable to her when and as the same is received by it. The plaintiff as trustee, being in doubt as to her interpretation of the trust agreement, brought this action. The trial court sets out in its findings, in hæc verba, the contract of August 26, 1914, and so much of the decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill as is germane to this controversy. It also "found," in what amounts to a misplaced conclusion of law, "that under the terms and provisions of the contract of August 26, 1914, all sums of money, and all other property which has been, or shall hereafter be, received by plaintiff out of and from defendant Harry Duffill's share and interest in either the income or the principal of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased, or of the trust created in and by the decree of distribution in the matter of said estate, constitutes principal or corpus in the hands of plaintiff, as trustee, under said contract of August 26, 1914, and not income; and defendant Martha Duffill is only entitled, under said contract, to receive from plaintiff the net income derived by plaintiff as trustee under said contract from the property and moneys so received and so to be received by it, and from the investment thereof, and that no part of any money or other property, which has been so received by it, shall be expended or paid to said Martha Duffill." The conclusions of law conformed to this view, and judgment was entered accordingly. From this judgment the defendant Martha Duffill appeals.

[1] Appellant is confronted at the outset on this appeal with the contention of the respondents that she is estopped by the judgment, in the action in specific performance referred to, from asserting the claims she brings to this court in the present action. She asserts that this question was not raised nor argued in the lower court, and is for the first time advanced here. Even though that be so, we feel inclined to consider briefly the situation in which the parties were left by the decree in specific performance, for the respondents have placed much reliance upon the point, and we do not agree with them in their contention. From the judgment roll introduced by appellant, we learn that the action referred to was brought by the plaintiff here, as trustee, Albert Duffill, the minor, by his guardian ad litem, and Martha Duffill, as plaintiffs, against Harry Duffill and the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as executor of the estate of, and trustee under the will of, Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased. The complaint sets out in full the agreement of August 26, 1914, and the decree of distribution in the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill; also the various steps in the administration of the mother's estate, substantially as narrated in our statement of facts, and the incurring by Harry Duffill of certain fees and costs in connection with securing his share of the estate under the testamentary trust. It is then alleged that a demand was made on Harry to assign, transfer, set over and convey to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as trustee under the terms of the contract of August 26, 1914, one-fourth of the annuity and all sums already received by him, and to be received, from the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, which he refused to do, although "the Title Insurance & Trust Company is entitled to receive under such contract of August 26, 1914, each and all of said properties." The prayer is for a determination of what, if any, fees and costs may be deducted by Harry from the one-quarter interests, under the terms of the August contract, and for a declaration of what interests and properties were properly transferable to the Title Insurance & Trust Company under that agreement, and that the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank distribute the same direct to, and that Harry execute proper deeds and transfers conveying and transferring to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as trustee, such interests and properties "to be conveyed or transferred under the terms of said agreement of August 26, 1914." Harry Duffill, in answer to the complaint, asserted that the plaintiffs, by reason of alleged opposition to distribution of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, had forfeited all right to, and were barred from, participating in, or having delivered to the Title Insurance & Trust Company any of the property ordered distributed in that estate, but that notwithstanding such alleged fact he was willing and ready to execute an instrument in writing transferring to the Title Insurance & Trust Company one-fourth of all property distributed to him or which he might receive, subject only to his right to reduce that portion to a one-fifth interest to offset reasonable costs and attorney's fees incurred by him in relation to the testamentary trust. The other defendants disclaimed any interest in the controversy other than the duty to pay over or distribute all money or properties to the persons entitled thereto. The court adjudicated the matter of the costs and attorney's fees expended by Harry Duffill. It found and decreed that the plaintiffs in the action were entitled to have the agreement of August 26, 1914, between Harry Duffill and Martha Duffill, specifically enforced "upon the conditions and as hereinafter expressed." It directed the proper transfers and conveyances to be made, and decreed that the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as trustee, "under and pursuant to the terms of the agreement of August 26, 1914," between Harry Duffill and Martha Duffill, was entitled to receive from Harry Duffill one-fourth of such interests as he had or could acquire from the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, after reducing to a one-fifth interest a certain portion of the estate to cover a pro rata amount of costs and attorney's fees incurred in conducting the controversy involving the distribution of the mother's estate, "all upon the trusts, and subject to the terms and conditions of the third subdivision of said agreement of August 26, 1914." The decree directed the execution and delivery of the proper conveyances and transfers to be made to make the judgment of the court effective. Nowhere in the findings, conclusions of law, or in the decree, did the court place, or attempt to place, any construction or interpretation upon the agreement of August 26, 1914. It contented itself with reading into its judgment the "terms and conditions of the third subdivision of said agreement." It is therefore necessary to resort to the agreement to understand what the effect of the judgment in specific performance is, and what is the situation of the parties under it. The issue in the case in which it was rendered was whether or not the plaintiff in the action, the plaintiff here, as trustee, was entitled to receive from Harry Duffill a certain proportion of all he received from his mother's estate. The controversy here is as to what constitutes principal or corpus of that portion of the estate in trust, once it is lodged in plaintiff's hands. That issue was, so far as the record discloses, never submitted to the court in the other action. When, therefore, respondents say that it was adjudged by the decree in specific performance, that precisely the same property which the appellant here claims to be hers absolutely is property from which, in the hands of, and subject to the management of, the plaintiff, as trustee, she is entitled to the income only, resort must be had to the contract of August 26, 1914, to determine if that be so. It results that whether or not appellant is estopped from asserting the claims she now brings to this court depends upon an interpretation of the agreement between herself and Harry Duffill.

While the ultimate question to be considered is, What constitutes the corpus or principal of the trust estate created by the August agreement entered into by Harry and Martha? the solution of that problem can only be accomplished by determining the nature of the property, or interest in property, which Harry took at his mother's death under the testamentary trust created by her will. In opposition to the theory which was accepted by the trial court, appellant contends the one-half of the income paid and being paid to Harry from the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased, constitutes income to Harry upon an equitable interest owned by him in his mother's estate, and that inasmuch as it is income to Harry it is income to plaintiff and appellant, and forms no part of the corpus of the trust provided by the contract of August 26, 1914. In the abstract her argument is that Harry Duffill, immediately upon the death of his mother, acquired and became the owner of an equitable estate in the property devised by Eugenie A. Duffill to the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, and has received, and will continue to receive, income therefrom by virtue of his equitable ownership of that interest; that at the same time and by reason of the contract of August 26, 1914, a like equitable estate as to one-fourth of such property and interest vested in plaintiff; that, immediately upon Harry acquiring and becoming the owner of his equitable interest, he held whatever portion he was obligated to transfer to the Title Insurance & Trust Company under his contract in trust for the plaintiff as trustee; that in equity the plaintiff immediately became the owner of such proportionate amount of Harry's equitable estate, which, although the legal title is still in the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, constitutes the corpus of the trust estate created by the agreement between Harry and Martha; that, as a result, any income accruing upon such proportionate interest constitutes income upon an equitable interest or estate held by plaintiff as trustee in just the same manner that the residue of the income constitutes income upon Harry's equitable interest in the mother's estate; that plaintiff has received, and is receiving, one-fourth of this income in exactly the same capacity as that in which Harry receives the remaining portion. More concretely stated, appellant's contention is that plaintiff, Title Insurance & Trust Company, has stepped into Harry's shoes as to this one-fourth proportionate interest, and consequently as the money paid would, in fact, constitute income on an equitable estate, if paid to Harry direct, it must constitute income on an equitable estate as paid to plaintiff, and should be paid directly to Martha. In answer to this contention, respondents, other than plaintiff, take the position that the right or interest of Harry Duffill in his mother's estate is only a right to receive something by transfer or conveyance from the trustee. Eugenie A. Duffill, they argue, did not choose to be her own conveyancer, but vested title in her trustee, Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, it in turn to pass the title by conveyance and transfer to whoever ultimately becomes entitled to it. The only present right or interest to which Harry Duffill is entitled, under their contention, is the right to enforce the trust with respect to the payment of his annuity, and one-half of the net income after all the annuities and the expenses of administration are paid. "While he has a present vested right to receive a share of the income of that [testamentary] trust estate," they say, "and so to enforce that trust, he has no present right in or to any property, or the possession thereof, until there is income which Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as trustee under the will of his mother, is required to pay over to him. When that state of facts comes into existence, and not until then, the right under the contract of August, 1914, arises in the [plaintiff] Title Insurance & Trust Company. And when it does arise," is the point of their contention, "the fruit of that right is principal of the trust in the hands of that company, as trustee," under the plain terms of the contract, and plaintiff may thereupon pay over to Martha, for her own use, all of the net income derived from such trust property in its hands, but no part of the principal of the trust may be expended or paid to her.

What acceptance of one or the other of these two different contentions concerning the trust created by the August agreement means to appellant is at once apparent. If her theory be the right one, and "what is income to Harry is income to Martha," she is entitled to immediate payment by the Title Insurance & Trust Company as trustee of all that it has thus far received, or will receive, from Harry pending the termination of the testamentary trust created by his mother's will; for, until that time he will receive nothing but income from that source. If, on the other hand, as contended by respondents, what is income to Harry from the testamentary estate becomes principal or corpus of the trust in the hands of plaintiff under the agreement, appellant is only entitled to receive whatever earnings plaintiff is in turn able to produce from the moiety of Harry's income turned over to it. Appellant here attacks what she terms "the inequity and iniquity" of the contention of the respondents. She assumes that in the administration of the contract trust plaintiff may realize 6 per cent. "Supposing a case," she says, "where Eugenie A. Duffill had disposed of her property to a trustee in trust to pay the income thereof to Harry Duffill for the period of his lifetime. If we would apply the contentions of Harry Duffill to such a case, his wife, by virtue of his settlement agreement by which he intended to have paid her one-fourth of his income which he should receive, would receive only 6 per cent. on one-fourth of" that amount.

[2-4] In seeking the true construction of a declaration of trust, the guiding principle must be the intention of the settlor—his intention as expressed. Not, What did he intend to say? but, What did he intend by what he did say? must be the test. Chater v. Carter, 238 U. S. 572, 584, 35 Sup. Ct. 859, 59 L. Ed. 1462. The only intention this court is authorized to declare is such as may be deduced from an interpretation of the instrument which was drawn and executed by the parties to express their intention (Welton v. Palmer, 39 Cal. 456, 458), which must be gathered from the general purpose and scope of the agreement (Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 311, 8 Sup. Ct. 1164, 32 L. Ed. 138. If there be any doubt or uncertainty in the language of the trust, it will be construed, if possible, in favor of the beneficiary and against the trustee. Sprague v. Edwards, 48 Cal. 239, 247; Ringrose v. Gleadall, 17 Cal. App. 664, 667, 121 Pac. 407. The underlying reasons which led to the execution of the agreement of August 26, 1914, and the situation of the parties to it at that time, are clearly set forth by the parties themselves in the preamble to that instrument:

"That whereas, the first party [Harry] and second party [Martha] are at the date hereof, husband and wife, and Albert Duffill is the only child born of their marriage and Eugenie A. Duffill is the mother of the first party; and "Whereas, an action is now pending in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, wherein second party is plaintiff and first party is defendant, being case No. B-1182, wherein the plaintiff prays, among other matters, for a decree that the bonds of matrimony between first party and second party be dissolved; and

"Whereas, there are involved in said action questions as to the respective property rights of said parties and issues of fact as to property which may be the basis of making and enforcing of orders for alimony and maintenance of second party and Albert Duffill; and

"Whereas, the parties hereto are desirous of making a settlement and agreement regarding all of the property rights and interests belonging to them and a division of said properties so that in the event an interlocutory decree of divorce shall be rendered in said action, that the property rights of the parties hereto may be settled and determined by said court in accordance with the intent of the parties as herein expressed; and

"Whereas, this agreement is made subject to the approval of said court and subject to the rendering of said decree for the sole reason that in the event that the parties hereto are to remain husband and wife some other and different division of their respective property rights would be proper and advisable for both of them;

"Now, therefore, the first party does hereby covenant and agree with second party as follows."

Then follow covenants and stipulations, from which it appears that Harry had deeded to Martha an undivided one-half interest in "all the real and personal property described in or referred to in" a separate declaration of trust with which we are not now concerned, and otherwise carried that agreement into execution. These clauses, designated "first" and "second," we may assume dispose of the rights and interests of the parties in whatever property they then possessed; but Harry's mother was possessed of much property, and it was only reasonable to suppose that he would come into a share of her estate upon her death. The "third" provision of the agreement relates directly to that subject. By its terms Harry covenanted with appellant that an undivided one-fourth of each and every parcel and interest of or in any property he should acquire or receive from his mother by devise, bequest, inheritance, succession, or from any trust agreement wherein he was the beneficiary and his beneficial estate arose after his mother's death, should forthwith, upon his acquiring or receiving the same, become the property of this plaintiff as trustee, for the uses and purposes set forth in the agreement. The vocabulary of legal phraseology is well nigh exhausted in the stipulations of the contract in an apparent endeavor to make it plain that so far as is legally possible Harry did, by the agreement itself, vest plaintiff with an undivided one-fourth "of each and every such property and interest," and would "if and as" he should "became possessed of * * * or obtain the right to possession of any of the same," do all things necessary or proper to establish the title of the plaintiff as trustee as fully and effectually as could be done if he were seized and possessed of the property or interest at the date of the instrument.

It seems improbable that the parties to such an agreement would enter into an arrangement, so far as their own acts and interests were to be governed, that would permit a situation to arise which might almost effectually defeat the scope and purpose of their contract. If a rationally fitting and proper interpretation of an instrument of this character will prevent that result, such exposition should be accepted. The instrument here calls for an exact division between Harry Duffill and his wife of whatever property Harry should acquire or receive from his mother's estate, on the basis of three-fourths to Harry and one-fourth to Martha's use. What each is to receive, and, we think, when each is to receive it, are stated in plain terms. A most reasonable and just construction of the agreement between Harry Duffill and his wife is to hold that it was their manifest intention, which they have clearly expressed in the contract, that just as soon as, and whenever, Harry should enter into the enjoyment of any part or portion of whatever property he should acquire or receive from his mother's estate, Martha Duffill should, at the same time, and coincidentally with Harry's beneficial use, enter into as full and free enjoyment of her allotted portion of that same property as Harry of his remaining share. The injustice of any other conclusion has already been indicated by the appellant in the apt illustration cited by her. It was certainly not the intention of the parties that Harry might enjoy to the fullest extent, other than actual possession, his share of his mother's estate, and that his wife, who was expected to share to the limited extent, should be cut off with a mere pittance as compared with what it was evidently intended she should have. It must not be forgotten that Harry did not vest plaintiff, for Martha's use and benefit, with one-quarter of any "income" he might thereafter receive from a share of his mother's estate held in trust, but with an undivided one-quarter of each and every parcel of "any property whatsoever, whether real or personal, of any kind and wherever situated, or any interest therein," which should forthwith "become the property of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as trustee," for the purposes of the trust. If Harry has acquired any interest or estate in the property held in the testamentary trust, and has entered into its enjoyment, it must follow that plaintiff, for Martha's use, must share in such use and enjoyment to the extent guaranteed by the August agreement. This we take to mean that, if Harry has now an interest in the corpus of the testamentary trust, a proportionate right and interest in the same corpus has vested in plaintiff. We find no reason for delaying the active operation of the trust for appellant under the August agreement in so far as is possible from the mere fact that plaintiff cannot now obtain the physical segregation of the trust properties in the hands of the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank. It is to all intents and purposes actually in receipt of the income on the share of the corpus of the testamentary trust with which it was vested on Harry's equitable succession to his entire interest. This income is not received by plaintiff from the mother's estate. It is income from property received by Harry from his mother's estate, the portion of which, under the terms of the August agreement, at once passed to plaintiff. In other words, the income receipts to plaintiff are not directly from the mother's estate, but are receipts from the income of its equitable property interest in a portion of the corpus of the testamentary estate. There is no more justification for holding that these receipts are corpus merely because they are in the hands of plaintiff as a trustee than there would be in saying they constituted corpus if the time of possible physical segregation of the trust properties had not been postponed by reason of the testamentary trust, and distribution of the mother's estate had been made. Under those circumstances, one-quarter of Harry's share of the property received (not the income it might produce) would have constituted the corpus of the trust in plaintiff for Martha's use, and she would have been entitled to have paid to her all the net income derived therefrom through plaintiff's administration of the fund. The interposition of the trust for Martha does not act to change the nature of the income. Our former opinion erroneously seemed to imply that it did. We see no reason for making a distinction between income accruing from Harry's property, received through his beneficial interest in the mother's estate, and paid to plaintiff, and income that might accrue to that same property if actually possessed and administered by the plaintiff. We deemed it unnecessary on the former hearing to determine whether or not Harry took an equitable estate in the corpus of the trust created by his mother's will, taking the position that if it did such equitable interest with the income thereon is an interest in property arising out of the mother's estate, and, under the August agreement, part of the corpus of the trust provided for by that instrument. We are now convinced that he took such an equitable or beneficial estate, and, as we have attempted to show, that any income received by him is not in any sense an interest, estate, or property acquired from his mother's estate, but interest derived from his own equitable estate in the property of the testamentary trust. This we think to be the proper theory on which to decide the controversy.

The theory that Harry Duffill received at his mother's death a beneficial interest in the property belonging to her, and that his subsequent receipts, therefore, are not directly from her, but are receipts from the income of his property, finds support in what we believe to be the status of the equitable interest and estate of a cestui que trust in property in this state. It is worthy of note that in the distribution of the mother's estate in this very matter Harry Duffill's equitable estate was recognized beyond the provisions of his mother's will. Mrs. Duffill intended that he should receive one-half of the income from the trust created by her, but upon the void condition that it should be accumulated during Albert's minority. As was pointed out by this court, it was undoubtedly the intention of the testatrix that the income should be retained and go with the corpus, to be held by the testamentary trustee and administered as principal, but this intention was frustrated by her unlawful wish for accumulation of that portion of the fund, and it was properly decreed that Harry should enter upon its immediate use and enjoyment. Estate of Duffill, 180 Cal. 748, 761, 183 Pac. 337. While it is beyond dispute that by the terms of the will of Eugenie A. Duffill the legal title to all property constituting the corpus of the testamentary trust created by her vested in the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as trustee, immediately upon her death, and that such title was declared and confirmed by the decree of distribution of her estate (W. P. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 166 Cal. 346, 349, 136 Pac. 284, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 825), it is equally beyond dispute that on her death there was also vested in Harry Duffill an equitable estate or beneficial interest in her property independent of the legal estate which vested in the testamentary trustee. In England, devises of trust, under this doctrine of an equitable interest, are distinct substantive devises, standing on their own basis, independent of the legal estate which is "nothing but the shadow which always follows the trust res in the eye of a court of equity (Atty. General v. Downing, Wilmot, 1 [Eng.] 22, 97 Eng. reprint, 1). In a still earlier English Case (Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden. 177), Lord Keeper Henly (page 251) said that the trust should be considered in equity as the "real estate" and the "trustee should take no beneficial interest that the cestui que trust can enjoy." In the same case, Lord Mansfield said (pages 217, 226):

"Now trusts are considered * * * as the real ownership of the land * * * the same as the land and trustee * * * is in no event to take a benefit."

The generally accepted rule in this country also is that—

"Under the system now prevailing the cestui que trust is regarded as the real owner of the property, the trustee being merely the depositary of the legal title. His is not a property right, but a legal duty founded upon a personal confidence; his estate is not that which can be enjoyed, but a power that can be exercised." 39 Cyc. 203.

Such estates "are in equity what legal estates are in law; the ownership of the equitable estate is regarded by equity as the real ownership, and the legal estate is, as has been said, no more than the shadow always following the equitable estate, which is the substance, except where there is a purchaser for value and without notice who has acquired the legal estate." 1 Pomeroy, Eq. Juris. (4th Ed.) § 147; Underhill on Trusts and Trustees (4th Ed.) p. 6, art. 2.

Respondents, it will be remembered, contend that Harry Duffill took no estate or interest in his mother's property, but only the right to enforce the performance of the trust. Such contention is largely based on section 863 of the Civil Code, which provides that, except as in the Code provided:

"Every express trust in real property, valid as such in its creation, vests the whole estate in the trustees, subject only to the execution of the trust. The beneficiaries take no estate or interest in the property, but may enforce the performance of the trust."

Aside from the fact that but little of the property held under the testamentary trust is real property, rendering the Code section of but little moment in this discussion, the construction placed upon its provisions by respondents does not follow. The section was adopted as part of the Civil Code in 1872. It has been construed by this court many times, and the conclusion has been firmly established that—

"The estate which a trustee takes by virtue of section 863 is not necessarily a fee, but only such estate as is required for the execution of his trust." Keating v. Smith, 154 Cal. 186, 192, 97 Pac. 300; Morffew v. S. F., etc., R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, 595, 40 Pac. 810.

This rule that the trustee takes only such an estate in the trust property as is necessary to the discharge of his trust duties refers directly to the quantity of his estate in the property, as, for instance, an estate for years, an estate for life, or an estate in fee. Estate of Pichoir, 139 Cal. 682, 688, 73 Pac. 606. In Gray v. Union Trust Co., 171 Cal. 637, 640, 154 Pac. 306, 308, a substantive "equitable estate" was recognized to exist in one who had a "usufructory interest in the whole estate during her life," notwithstanding there was "conveyed to the trustee the whole legal title, since so much [was] plainly necessary for the purposes of the trust (Civ. Code, § 863)," which general purposes were to give the trustor the beneficial use of the property during her life, and upon her death to see that the property went to her nominees under her will. See, also, Estate of Aldersley, 174 Cal. 366, 371, 163 Pac. 206; Weston v. Weston, 125 Mass. 268; Crooke v. County of Kings, 97 N. Y. 421, 446; Patton v. Ludington, 103 Wis. 629, 644, 79 N. W. 1073, 74 Am. St. Rep. 910; Williams v. Williams, 135 Wis. 60, 115 N. W. 342; Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 550, 571, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70.

It were useless, we feel, to carry this discussion to greater length, or to discuss other phases of the matter and probable lines of solution of the problem here presented. Harry Duffill was vested with an equitable estate and beneficial interest in his mother's property immediately upon her death, with only such legal title lodged in the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as is required for the execution of the testamentary trust. That this interest was assignable is beyond controversy. 5 Cor. Jur. p. 854; 3 Pomeroy, Eq. Juris. (4th Ed.) § 1271. See, also, Bridge v. Kedon, 163 Cal. 493, 500, 126 Pac. 149, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404. Whatever may be the duration or quantity of the equitable estate vested in Harry, whether for years or for life, or in mere expectancy, he has received, and is receiving, income thereon. What condition will prevail when the testamentary trust is terminated by lapse of time or death does not now concern us. The accrued and accruing income received by Harry, including the portion paid to plaintiff, is income from Harry's own equitable interest, and is not an interest in property arising out of the mother's estate. It is therefore "income to Martha," and should not be administered as corpus of the trust under the August agreement, but should be accounted for and paid direct to appellant as income.

As the relation of plaintiff to appellant in the matter of the disposition of whatever it has already received from Harry, and will continue to receive until the testamentary trust is dissolved, depends solely upon the interpretation of the agreement of August 26, 1914, there can be no occasion for another trial of the issues presented by this appeal.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the lower court, with instructions to enter judgment in accord with this opinion. When so entered, the judgment will stand affirmed.

ROBERTS v. WEHMEYER. (S. F. 9651.)(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 13, 1923.)

1. Husband and wife $\S$ 267(1)—Wife not required to join in husband's conveyance of community realty acquired after, but paid for by community funds acquired before, enactment of statute requiring wife's joinder.

Where real estate, conveyed to husband in August, 1917, was paid for out of community funds accumulated before July 27, 1917, on which date Civ. Code, $\S$ 172a (St. 1917, p. 829), requiring wife's joinder in deed of community realty became effective, the real estate had status of real estate acquired prior to that date, and the requirement of section 172a did not apply to the husband's conveyance thereof.

2. Constitutional law $\S$ 277(1)—Legislative regulations of method of transferring property may not contravene due process clause.

The Legislature may regulate and change at will the method of transferring property, but such regulations may not contravene the constitutional guaranty against deprivation of property without due process of law.

3. Husband and wife $\S$ 265—Wife has no vested future interest in community property; "vested."

While an interest in property may be present or future, and a future interest, entitling the owner to possession at a future period, is vested when there is a person in being having a defeasible or indefeasible right to immediate possession on the termination of the intermediate interest (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 688, 690, 694), a wife has no vested future interest in half the community property, but has only a possible interest in whatever remains on dissolution of the community otherwise than by her own death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Suit by Elizabeth V. Roberts against J. F. Wehmeyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hugh R. Osburn, of Oakland, for appellant.

F. P. Feliz, of Salinas, and Carey Van Fleet, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff, Elizabeth V. Roberts, and one William A. Roberts were husband and wife. On August 21, 1917, they purchased certain described land in Monterey county, the deed being taken in the name of William A. Roberts alone. The property was paid for out of community funds, substantially all of which had been accumulated before July 27, 1917, on which date section 172a of the Civil Code (St. 1917, p. 829), hereinafter considered, became effective. A house, also paid for with community funds, was later built upon the land, and the couple occupied it as a home. As a result of domestic differences, plaintiff, on January 24, 1920, commenced an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted her February 20, 1920, and she was awarded, among other things, the real estate involved in this action. On January 23, 1920, William A. Roberts executed and delivered to defendant, J. F. Wehmeyer, a conveyance of the premises, which was recorded January 29, 1920, in which plaintiff did not join, and received as consideration therefor defendant's promissory note maturing in one year. Defendant at the time of the transaction knew that plaintiff and William A. Roberts were husband and wife and that they were occupying the house as their family home.

This proceeding was instituted by plaintiff to have the deed from William A. Roberts to appellant declared null and void and to have the title to the property declared to be in her, on the ground that a conveyance of community property by a husband is void under section 172a of the Civil Code, unless his wife joins in its execution. The action was commenced on February 21, 1920, within one year of the date of the recordation of the conveyance, and also before a final decree of divorce was granted. The finding is that the land was purchased with community funds "substantially all earned and acquired prior to July 27, 1917," and we shall therefore assume that the funds were all acquired before that time. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendant takes this appeal.

Prior to the amendment of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 829) section 172 of the Civil Code provided:

"The husband has the management and control of the community property, with the like absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he has of his separate estate; provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto; and provided, also, that no sale, conveyance or incumbrance of the furniture, furnishings and fittings of the home, or of the clothing and wearing apparel of the wife or minor children, which is community property, shall be made without the written consent of the wife."

By the amendment referred to the operation of section 172 was limited to community personal property and a new section (172a) was added to provide for the control of community real property. That section is as follows:

"The husband has the management and control of the community real property but the wife must join with him in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed, or incumbered; provided, however, that the sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed of the husband, holding the record title to community real property, to a lessee, purchaser or incumbrancer, in good faith without knowledge of the marriage relation shall be presumed to be valid; but no action to avoid such instrument shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the filing for record of such instrument in the recorder's office in the county in which the land is situate."

1. It is contended by appellant that section 172a has no application to the case at bar, for the reason that, under the decisions of this state, the husband has always been regarded as the owner of the community property, and that to apply the section to transfers of property acquired before the section was adopted would deprive the husband of a vested interest in such property by restricting his power of alienation; that the realty in question is to be regarded as prior-acquired property, because, although transmuted into realty after the section was adopted, it was purchased with personality accumulated before that time.

[1] Deferring until later the consideration of what the respective rights of husband and wife in the community property are, we are of the opinion they could not be changed by a conversion of the property from personality into realty. There was no distinction made between realty and personality at the time the money in the case at bar was acquired. Whatever its form, the property had the status of community property and the rights of the spouses were fixed in it as such. It might be transmuted from personality into realty and again into personality without effecting any change in those rights, and no legislation subsequently passed could take away any of the vested rights of either of the parties in either form of property. This being so, no distinction could be drawn between the ownership of realty and of personality, nor any condition imposed on the right of either spouse to acquire realty, which would deprive either of a vested right enjoyed in the whole of the community property prior to the enactment of the restriction. It follows that in this case the transmutation of the property into realty after the passage of section 172a could not effect any vested right of the husband in it as community property. For the purpose of determining whether any such right is disturbed, the realty must be regarded as though it had been acquired before the adoption of the section. Respondent contends that when the husband, having personality of the community under his control after the passage of section 172a, voluntarily exchanged it into realty, he exercised his constitutional right of alienation and took the realty subject to the restriction on his right of disposal. But, in view of our conclusion that the whole of the community property was acquired subject only to the limitations in force at the time of its accumulation, this claim is without support.

[2] It is true, as said in Peck v. Walton, 26 Vt. 82, that the Legislature may prescribe regulations concerning the method of transferring property and change them at will, but such regulations may not contravene the constitutional guarantee that one may not be deprived of his property without due process of law. Prior to the adoption of section 172a, a husband in this state had the unqualified right to sell the community realty. By that enactment his right to sell it is so far limited that it can be exercised only with the consent of his wife. Whether or not such a restriction is unconstitutional as applied to property acquired before its enactment depends on the nature of the husband's rights in such property.

2. It is claimed on behalf of respondent that, although the courts of this jurisdiction have said that title to community property rests in the husband and that a wife's interest therein is a mere expectancy, she has in reality a vested interest in it, which she conveys by joining in the transfer or incumbrance. This, it is stated, has been recognized by the courts of all the other states wherein systems of community property exist, and by the Supreme Court of the United States (Beals v. Ares, 25 N. M. 459, 185 Pac. 780; Kohny v. Dunbar, 21 Idaho, 258, 121 Pac. 544, 39 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1107, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 492; La Tourette v. La Tourette, 15 Ariz. 200, 137 Pac. 426, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 70; In re Williams, 40 Nev. 241, 161 Pac. 741, L. R. A. 1917C, 602; Warburton v. White, 176 U. S. 484, 20 Sup. Ct. 404, 44 L. Ed. 555; Arnett v. Reade, 220 U. S. 311, 31 Sup. Ct. 425, 55 L. Ed. 477, 36 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1040), and it is urged that this court has recognized in a wife many rights over community property which are inconsistent with the view that she has no vested interest in it. Thus, it is pointed out, a wife's rights in such property have been held to constitute a valuable consideration for an agreement or transfer (Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 186 Pac. 135), and on the dissolution of the community by divorce the wife's half of the community property immediately vests in her as tenant in common with her husband (De Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 158).

[3] It is also argued that, as an interest in property may be either present or future (Civ. Code, § 688), a future interest entitles the owner to possession of the property at a future period (Civ. Code, § 690), and a future interest is vested when there is a person in being who would have a right, defeasible or indefeasible, to the immediate possession of the property upon the termination of the intermediate interest (Civ. Code, § 694), a wife has a vested future interest in the one-half of the community property which a husband cannot dispose of by will and which goes to the wife upon the husband's death. This position is not maintainable, in view of the decision in Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734, wherein it was held that the wife has but a possible interest in whatever community property remains upon a dissolution of the community otherwise than by her own death, which interest does not constitute an estate within the meaning of section 700 of the Civil Code.

This court has often considered the respective rights of a husband and wife in the community property. In Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 Pac. 537, the conclusions reached in the various decisions are thus epitomized:

"Under the statute prior to the addition of the first proviso in 1891, it was the established doctrine in this state that during the marriage the husband was the sole and exclusive owner of all the community property, and that the wife had no title thereto, nor interest or estate therein, other than a mere expectancy as heir, if she survived him [citing authorities]. The limitation upon the husband's testamentary power contained in the Code was not understood to vest in the wife, during the marriage, any interest or estate whatever in the community property, but merely to constitute a restriction upon the husband's power."

It was further held in that case that the proviso added in 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 425), imposing the limitation on a husband's right to make gifts of the community property, did not change this rule. These principles are thoroughly established in our law, and have been rigidly adhered to at least from the early case of Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308.

However, it is contended that the whole system of community property in this state rests upon a misconception of the Spanish law embodied in Van Maren v. Johnson, supra. Counsel point out that that case was decided upon the authority of Guice v. Lawrence, 2 La. Ann. 226, and assert that, while the Spanish law of community property was adopted in California and presumably in Louisiana, the rule laid down in Guice v. Lawrence, supra, is an innovation from the French law which has no place in our system. Further, Guice v. Lawrence, supra, is claimed to have been overruled in Succession of Marsal, 118 La. 212, 42 South. 778. Much the same question was raised and decided in Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207, but, in view of the earnestness with which counsel have pressed the point, which is conceded to be opposed to the decision in that case, we have examined the Louisiana authorities and the commentators upon the Spanish law.

The Civil Code of Louisiana provides that a marriage shall superinduce a partnership or community of acquêts or gains (Merrick's Rev. Civ. Code of La., art. 2399 [2369]) and that the husband is the head and master of such property, with power to alienate it, subject to certain limitations upon his right of making gifts and to the wife's right of action in case he fraudulently disposes of the property to her injury (Id., sec. 2404 [2373]). This provision was held in Guice v. Lawrence, supra, to be an embodiment of the Spanish law. The court there said:

"The rule of the Spanish law on that subject is laid down by Febrero with his usual precision. The ownership of the wife, says that author, is revocable and fictitious during marriage. As long as the husband lives and the marriage is not dissolved, the wife must not say that she has gananciales, nor is she to prevent the husband from using them, under the pretext that the law gives her one-half. But, soluto matrimonio, she becomes irrevocably the owner of one undivided half, in the manner provided by law for ordinary joint ownership. The husband is, during marriage, real y verdadero dueño de todos, y tiene en el efecto de su dominio irrevocable [citing authorities]. * * * The proviso of art. 2373 [2404] cannot be construed as giving or recognizing a title to or in the wife."

From subsequent cases it does not appear that the courts of Louisiana have departed from this view of the law, but rather that they have uniformly followed it. Tourne v. Tourne, 9 La. 452; Succession of Boyer, 36 La. Ann. 506; Landreaux v. Louque, 43 La. Ann. 234, 9 South. 32. Nor were the earlier cases overruled by succession of Marsal, supra. That case involved the legality of an inheritance tax sought to be collected upon a usufruct given by a statute providing in effect that, where one spouse died without disposing by will of his or her share of the community property, the surviving spouse, in addition to his or her own share of the community property, should take a usufruct in the half of which the other might have disposed. The court held that by this language of the statute it was not intended that the wife should take the usufruct by inheritance, for it was provided the property in which the usufruct was allowed should be inherited by decedent's issue. Quoting from Succession of Teller, 49 La. Ann. 281, 21 South. 265, it was said:

"The child of the marriage inherits the share in the community of his deceased parent subject to the usufructuary right of the surviving parent." (Italics by present writer.)

This holding is not inconsistent with the theory that the husband owns the community property, for the usufruct is created in the estate of her heir, not in that of the community while it exists. Such an enactment provides for the disposal of the property on the dissolution of the community. That the endowment of a wife with this usufructuary right does not vest title to the estate in her during the continuance of the community is shown by the later case of Peck v. Board of Directors, 137 La. 334, 68 South. 629, wherein it is declared:

"Differently from the wife, whose interest in the community property is residuary, the husband, as head and master of the community, owns its property during its existence, with full power of alienation, and after its dissolution by the death of the wife continues to own one-half with full power of alienation."

And the recent case of Jacob v. Falgoust, 150 La. 22, 90 South. 427, stating that—

"The wife's title, during the existence of the community, is inchoate. McDonough v. Tregre, 7 Mart. (N. S.) 68; Brassac v. Ducros, 4 Rob. 335. The title remains in the meantime in the husband, as head and master of the community."

Moreover, the view of the Spanish law adopted in Guice v. Lawrence, supra, is agreed by the text-writers to be correct. The following quotation from Febrero appears in Ballinger on Community Property, § 32 (1 Feb. Mej. 225, §§ 19, 20):

"The wife is clothed with the revocable and feigned dominion and possession of one-half of the property acquired by the husband during the marriage; but, after his death, it is transferred to her effectively and irrevocably, so that, by his decease, she is constituted the absolute owner in property and possession of the half which he left her. The husband needs not the dissolution of the marriage to constitute him the real and veritable owner of all the gananciales, since, even during the marriage, he has in effect the irrevocable dominion, and he may administer, exchange, and, although there be neither castrenses nor quasi castrenses acquired by him, may sell and alienate them as he pleases, provided there exists no intention to defraud the wife."

In McKay on Community Property, Introd. § VI, it is said:

"The use of the term 'marital partnership' as a synonym for the Spanish community between husband and wife in the matrimonial gains suggests many false analogies especially to lawyers trained in the learning of the common law, and the original Spanish idea has in some instances suffered at their hands. The community is not a partnership; it is lacking in nearly all the attributes of a partnership; there is a sort of a community of interests in the matrimonial gains, but even this interest has no likeness to a partnership interest, and the powers of the spouses are totally different from those of partners. * * *

"The words 'community property' suggest the idea of a common ownership, but this suggestion, too, is false, though it has been adopted in Texas and Washington. According to the Spanish law, community property is such as the spouses share together on a dissolution of the marriage, not such as they own together during marriage."

After considering what the respective rights of the parties in the community property are under the Spanish law, the same author says (section X, p. 44):

"Now if the wife has no present right to a given thing, but is limited to a share of the common fund on the dissolution of the marital partnership, it is clear that the wife does not hold what we call the legal title, to any given article of the community property, and it follows that the full legal title is in the husband; her right is to share in the surplus of the matrimonial gains after paying the debts chargeable against it."

That (section 287, p. 349):

"From the best evidence obtainable it seems reasonably certain that under the Spanish law the husband, during the marriage, held the full proprietary right in common property and that the wife had no actual proprietary right whatever."

And that (section XI, p. 44):

"California, Louisiana and New Mexico have adhered to the Spanish doctrine that until the dissolution of the community the wife has no proprietary right, while Texas and Washington have adopted the doctrine that the spouses during marriage have an equal proprietary right."

It clearly appears from these considerations that the early decisions of this court, wherein was laid down the rule that during the existence of the community title to the community property is vested in the husband, are not open to the criticism advanced. They rest upon sound authority and a proper interpretation of the Spanish law as incorporated in the statutes of this state through which the community property system was established. If anything to the contrary appears in such cases as Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 252, 63 Am. Dec. 125, which is authority for the proposition that the husband may not make testamentary disposition of the wife's half of the community property, it has been disapproved. Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 360, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207. It cannot be held to have been the law, as argued by respondent, that before the adoption of section 172a of the Civil Code a wife had any vested interest in the community property before dissolution of the community.

The cases from various other community property states undoubtedly have held that the wife has an estate during coverture, but an examination of those decisions shows wherein they are distinguishable from ours, and wherein, from the viewpoint of our decisions, they should not be followed. It is held in Louisiana and California that the statutes establishing a system of community property were intended to be an adoption of the Spanish law and hence that the incidents of the system as it was understood to exist, under the laws of Spain, should be deemed incorporated in the statutory law. This theory the courts of these two states have consistently followed. In other jurisdictions, notably Texas and Washington, the original characteristics of the community property law were not discussed in the early cases and it was simply held that the statutes gave equivalent rights of property to each spouse. Wright v. Hays, 10 Tex. 130, 60 Am. Dec. 200; Holyoke v. Jackson, 3 Wash. T. 235, 3 Pac. 841. See, also, La Tourette v. La Tourette, supra. In New Mexico and Idaho it has been held that, because of certain provisions in the statutes peculiar to each jurisdiction, an estate was vested in the wife. Arnett v. Reade, supra; Beals v. Ares, supra; Kohny v. Dunbar, supra. The Supreme Court of Nevada in Re Williams, supra, an inheritance tax case, frankly declined to follow the decisions of this court. After a careful consideration of authorities from other jurisdictions, including many where dower statutes prevail, and the Nevada statutory provisions, it was held the half of the community property taken by the wife upon her husband's death was not subject to the inheritance tax. No allusion was made to the origin of the system or the respective rights of the spouses under the Spanish law. In our opinion neither these authorities nor any other considerations would justify us in overturning a rule of property which has been settled law in this state for more than 60 years.

It thus appears that the husband is the owner of the community property, that except for such restrictions as the Legislature may have authority to impose he has the unqualified right to dispose of it, and that the wife has but a mere expectancy and not a title or interest which she would convey by joining in the deed. Under these circumstances, to provide that the husband must now obtain the consent of his wife to transfer realty acquired at a time when no such limitation was imposed on his right of alienation would deprive him of a vested right. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Clavo v. Clavo, 10 Cal. App. 447, 102 Pac. 556. It follows that section 172a can have no application to such a case, and hence does not govern the transfer in the case at bar.

In arriving at this conclusion we are not unmindful of the two decisions rendered in the case of Blum v. Wardell, one by the United States District Court, 270 Fed. 309, and the other by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, 276 Fed. 226. That action was brought to recover an estate tax paid to the government under protest on the half interest of the wife of the decedent Blum in the community property which passed to her under the laws of this state upon his death. The tax was levied under the revenue act of 1916 (39 Stats. 776, 777, Comp. St., § 6336½b et seq.), which imposed an inheritance tax upon the transfer of the net estate of a decedent "to the extent of the interest therein of the decedent at the time of his death, which after his death is subject to the payment of the charges against his estate and the expenses of its administration and is subject to distribution as a part of his estate." The California Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 880) provides that, for the purpose of the act, half the community property which goes to the widow on the death of the husband should not be deemed to pass to her as heir of her husband, but should go to her as for a valuable and adequate consideration, and should not be subject to the inheritance tax law of the state.

In the decision of the United States District Court it was held unqualifiedly that section 172a of the Civil Code recognizes in the wife a "valid, subsisting, vested interest and estate in the community property during the life of the husband." In the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals it was held that the interest of the decedent was to be determined by the law of the state where the property is situate, the court saying:

"In the present instance the law of that state is declared by the statute enacted in 1917, providing that, so far as state inheritance taxes are concerned, the wife of a decedent acquires upon his death one-half of the community property in her own right, and not as heir of the husband; in effect, therefore, that, in so far as state inheritance taxes are concerned, the estate of a decedent has no interest of any sort in the wife's half of the community property. That, in our opinion, settles the question here presented against the contention of the government; for we not only see nothing in the above-quoted provision of the United States statute to indicate any intention to impose a federal inheritance tax upon the wife's half of community property which the statute of the state where the property is situate expressly declares passes to the wife upon the death of her husband in her own right and not as heir, but the federal statute, as will be seen, expressly declares as one of the essential conditions to the imposition of a federal inheritance tax that the net estate of the decedent shall be 'subject to distribution as part of his estate.'"

The court then stated that, even if the case were not controlled by the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917, the sole question being one of federal inheritance tax, the rule announced in Arnett v. Reade, 220 U. S. 311, 320, 31 Sup. Ct. 425, 426 (55 L. Ed. 477, 36 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1040) was applicable, wherein it was said:

"It is very plain that the wife has a greater interest than the mere possibility of an expectant heir."

We need express no opinion of the decision of the United States District Court, for, as we have already held, section 172a has no application to the property involved in the case at bar.

We agree with the decision of the Circuit

Court of Appeals in so far as it is based on an interpretation of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917, to the effect that the part of the community property passing to the wife should not be subject to such tax. But, in so far as it relies on Arnett v. Reade, supra, as indicating that a wife has at all times had an interest or estate in the community property, we are constrained to disagree with it. The latter case arose in the territory of New Mexico and turned upon the construction of a statute of the territory, passed in 1901, which provided that neither husband nor wife should transfer or incumber community real property by onerous title, unless both join in the execution thereof. The Supreme Court of the territory held that the statute did not apply to community real property acquired before its passage because the husband was the absolute owner of such property and would be deprived of vested rights if the statute were construed as applicable to property so acquired. This decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the position taken by the territorial court was in conflict with the old law of New Mexico, which, in effect, was that, after payment of the common debts, the deduction of the survivor's separate property and his half of the acquest property and subject to the payment of the debts of the decedent the remainder of the acquest property and the separate estate of the decedent shall constitute the body of the estate for descent and distribution. It was accordingly held that, prior to the passage of the statute of 1901, the wife had a greater interest than a mere possibility, and that the statute did not change the estate which the husband had prior to the passage of the statute. The case is to be distinguished from the one at bar, for, as already indicated, in this jurisdiction a husband is held to have absolute ownership of the community. It may be noted in this connection that a conflict of opinion apparently exists with reference to the law of Louisiana, under which the state courts have held that title rests in the husband, whereas the United States District Court has held otherwise. Liebman v. Fontenot, 275 Fed. 689.

Because of our conclusion that the property in this case is to be regarded as having been acquired before the adoption of section 172a, it is unnecessary to consider the question, argued at length by the parties, whether, with reference to after-acquired property, the section creates an estate in the wife which she had not theretofore possessed, and if so, whether a transfer of such property by the husband alone would be void or voidable. Nor is it necessary to consider the contentions which appellant makes that the action was prematurely commenced, and that William A. Roberts was a necessary party to its complete disposition.

Finally, it may be said that no title could have vested in respondent by virtue of the interlocutory decree of divorce. Aside from the proposition that the community property may be divided only upon a dissolution of the marriage and that an interlocutory decree is not such a dissolution (Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 Pac. 1168; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107; Remley v. Remley, 49 Cal. App. 489, 193 Pac. 604), the deed to appellant was valid, and title vested in him. The property involved no longer belonged to the community, and respondent has no claim to it.

The judgment is reversed.

In re SUTTER-BUTTE BY-PASS ASSESSMENT NO. 6 OF SACRAMENTO & SAN JOAQUIN DRAINAGE DIST. (Sac. 3405.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 20, 1923.)

1. Levees and flood control ☞25—Decision of three judges sitting as court on assessment in Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district held conclusive.

Under St. 1919, p. 1094, § 8, the decision of three judges sitting as a court, as to the assessment of lands of and in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, is final and conclusive.

2. Constitutional law ☞329—Legislature empowered to make judgment on questions of fact, not trenching on validity of assessment in Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, conclusive.

While the Legislature could not deprive a litigant of the right to an appeal upon any question of law as to validity of an assessment, under St. 1911, Extra Sess. p. 117, providing a plan for the flood control of the Sacramento river, it could forbid the consideration on appeal of those questions of fact which involve the correctness of the apportionment of the assessment, and that the Legislature could not make the judgment conclusive on every question does not deprive it of the power to make a judgment conclusive on those questions which in strictness do not trench on the validity of the assessment.

3. Constitutional law ☞63(1)—Legislature may make decision of statutory board concerning spreading of assessment final and conclusive.

The Legislature may, in its discretion, make the decision of a statutory board concerning the spreading of an assessment final and conclusive.

4. Appeal and error ☞1—Statutory appeal to specified subordinate court does not confer privilege of further appeal to court of last resort.

The remedy of an appeal to some specified subordinate court may be provided for by statute, but such a remedy is a matter of grace and not of right, and does not confer the privilege of having the judgment of the reviewing court again upon appeal taken to a court of last resort.

5. Levees and flood control ☞29—Appeal lies from judgment of superior court determining legality of assessment in Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district.

An appeal lies from a judgment of the superior court determining the legal questions involving the validity of the assessment, under St. 1919, p. 1092, providing for the issuance and sale of bonds of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, based on assessments by the reclamation board on lands therein.

6. Levees and flood control ☞23—Certain lands held exempt from assessment for benefits in Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district.

Under St. 1919, p. 1126, § 2, lands east of the by-pass above contour 40 of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, held exempt from assessment for flood control benefit.

7. Drains ☞66—Legislature may determine lands benefited by drainage district.

It is competent for the Legislature to determine the lands to be benefited by a drainage district, either by describing them or by laying down a rule which serves to identify them and to determine the amount of the benefits accruing thereto.

8. Constitutional law ☞70(1)—Determination by Legislature of lands benefited by drainage district not reviewable.

The determination by the Legislature of lands benefited by a drainage district is not subject to review.

9. Levees and flood control ☞25—Assessment on land of Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district held valid.

Under St. 1913, p. 269, § 13, providing that the assessors must assess all lands within the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district proposed assessed for plans adopted by the reclamation board the sums included in the estimates of the board, and shall apportion it according to the benefits accruing to the land, held, that the assessment was not vitiated, on the ground that after the assessment district was formed and a hearing with respect thereto had before the assessors, the reclamation board reduced the cost of the project.

10. Constitutional law ☞284(2)—Notice may be had by publication in cases for assessment of benefited lands.

In cases for the assessment of lands benefited by a drainage district, notice may be had by publication or otherwise.

11. Constitutional law ☞284(2)—Notice by publication in court proceedings of assessment of lands of drainage district held sufficient.

Service of notice by publication is sufficient in a case for the assessment of benefited lands of a drainage district, where a court proceeding has been authorized.

12. Levees and flood control ☞25—Published notice of proposed assessment of benefited lands in Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district held sufficient.

In a proceeding to validate the assessment of lands within the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, the publication of a notice fixing the time for objection to the assessment lists filed with the clerk of the court before which the action was pending, that any person might oppose the assessment against his property as shown by the lists, but not specifically describing the property, held sufficient.

13. Drains ☞15—Drainage district considered entity, although extending over two or more counties.

A drainage district, even though the lands embraced therein consist of several and separate parcels of land which extend over and into two or more counties, is in its general nature a single entity and must be considered and treated as a unit, extending to and embraced within the boundaries of the district.

14. Venue ☞16—Superior court has jurisdiction as to lands extending over two or more counties, in county where greater part affected situated.

The superior court has constitutional jurisdiction in a suit in equity to quiet title to lands extending over two or more counties, in the county in which the greater part of the land affected is situated.

15. Statutes ☞95(1)—Law for notice by publication of assessment of benefited lands in named drainage district held not special law.

The provision for service of notice by publication of the assessment of benefited lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district in St. 1919, p. 1093, § 5, held not special legislation, violating Const. art. 4, § 25.

16. Continuance ☞50—Continuances pending stay held not irregular and void.

In a suit to validate the assessment of benefited lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, where the court having jurisdiction by statutory notice retained jurisdiction pending the hearing by the Supreme Court of an application for writ of prohibition, which, operating as a stay of proceedings, automatically continued the proceedings in the court below, and continuances pending the stay were not irregular and void.

17. Continuance ☞52—Order for continuance of suit to validate assessment in drainage district, signed by majority of judges, held sufficient.

An order for the continuance of a suit to validate the assessment of lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, signed by a majority of the judges, held sufficient.

18. Continuance ☞52—Continuance of proceedings to validate assessment in Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, signed by judges outside the district in which court sitting, held valid.

The order for a continuance of proceedings to validate the assessment of lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, signed by one or two of the judges outside the county in which the court was sitting, held regular and valid.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court, in and for the county of Sutter, three judges sitting, purporting to validate an assessment, aggregating in value some eight millions of dollars, spread over certain lands of and in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district.

The controversy presented upon the appeal had its origin in the adoption, in the form of a legislative enactment by the Legislature of the state of California, of the report of the California debris commission, which provided a plan for the flood control of the Sacramento river. Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 117.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the Sacramento river in its natural condition is able to carry within its banks during flood seasons only a very small proportion of the water delivered to it from its watershed. The result is that the surplus waters spread out and flood the country on both sides of the river. For more than 50 years reclamation districts have been organized on the west side of the Sacramento river and levees built to protect the adjacent lands from submergence. The construction of levees on the west side of the river had the natural effect of throwing the surplus water, which had formerly overrun the west side, to and upon the lands on the east side, thereby naturally increasing the height of the flood plane on that side. At that time the rule was laid down by various decisions in this state, following the English common-law rule, that flood waters were a common enemy, and landowners whose land were inundated by levees constructed by other landowners could not enjoin such construction or recover damages for the injury resulting therefrom to their lands. It was held that they must, in turn, protect their lands, if they so desired, by the construction of levees. In other words, it was the declared rule that the right of a landowner was not to be protected from injury by flood water caused by the construction of levees on his neighbor's lands, but that he had the right to protect his own land, in turn, by the construction of levees. Obviously in such a situation it was only a question of time until the landowners on the east side of the river would begin to build levees in an endeavor to retain and reclaim the lands on the east side, with the obvious and inevitable result of compelling the landowners on the west side to raise their levees. The individual reclamation work would, therefore, develop into a contest between the landowners on each side of the river (each attempting to build his levee higher than those of the landowner on the opposite side). It would also happen at times that back lands which were formerly unprotected by levees, but nevertheless free from the danger of flooding, would become subject to annual submergence. Clearly, therefore, the only adequate method of preventing this result was the unification of the individualistic and antagonistic efforts of the landowners on the opposite sides of the river into one comprehensive co-ordinating plan, looking toward the flood control of the river in its entirety. Only by carrying into effect some such a plan could the lands on both sides of the river be reclaimed.

Exhaustive investigations were made in an effort to find the best solution to the problem. One method suggested, known as the Dabney plan, called for the widening of the riverbed sufficiently to take care of all the surplus water. This plan, however, was found to be too expensive, inasmuch as it involved the purchase of valuable lands on both sides of the usual river channel. Of the several solutions offered, the report of the California debris commission, created by the United States government to investigate the problem, was found to be the most feasible, and it was accordingly adopted by the California Legislature, by an act entitled "An act approving the report of the California Débris Commission," etc. Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 117.

This plan provided, in general, for the leveeing of both sides of the Sacramento river to protect the adjacent lands from submergence, and also provided that a by-pass, practically paralleling the Sacramento river on the east, should be acquired, into which the surplus flood waters of the Sacramento river should be turned through certain openings in the levees on the east side of the Sacramento river. The proposed by-pass, which is in its nature an auxiliary river, was planned to leave the Sacramento river at Moulton weir, which is just west of Marysville's Buttes, sometimes known as Sutter Buttes, and continue through Butte basin and Butte slough basin and thence through the Sutter basin to the confluence of the Sacramento and Feather rivers, where it would empty into the Yolo by-pass.

Below Moulton weir the capacity of the Sacramento river channel was estimated to be 65,000 second feet, and since the estimated water presented to the river at this point during flood periods was 250,000 second feet, it was planned to divert 185,000 second feet of water into the by-pass through the Moulton weir. The capacity of the river channel thereafter decreases at a point subsequently designated as the Tisdale by-pass to 30,000 second feet, and it was therefore planned that a break should be made in the east levee of the river at this point and a channel constructed from the river to the Sutter-Butte by-pass, to relieve the river at this point of the excess 35,000 second feet which the river was incapable of handling.

The report included plans for building levees on both sides of the Sutter-Butte by-pass to prevent the inundating of lands on either side of the by-pass, and also provided that levees should be built on both sides of the channel leading from the Sacramento river to the Sutter-Butte by-pass at the Tisdale weir.

The act of 1911, which adopted the report, also created a board to be known as the reclamation board, which was to have entire charge of the carrying out of the plan, and which should have the power to see that all of the reclamation work in the future should be performed in accordance with the report. Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess. § 2, p. 117.

By act of 1913, the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district was created, as a governmental agency, for the purpose of carrying the plan into effect. Its boundaries were specifically defined, and its management and control vested in the reclamation board already created. Stats. 1913, p. 252. Section 13 of this act gave to the reclamation board the power of levying assessments for the carrying into execution of the plan, and provided that the plan as a whole should be divided into separate portions or projects, to facilitate the levying of the assessment for each particular portion or project which should be carried out and constructed as separate units. It provided that each particular portion or project should be designated by a name and number, and that all assessments, plans, and funds should be kept separate and should be used only for the purpose of carrying out the particular portion or project. In pursuance of this provision, the reclamation board designated the assessment, the validity of which is here contested, as Sutter-Butte by-pass assessment No. 6, and the project for the construction of which this assessment was levied as Sutter-Butte by-pass project No. 6.

It was evidently not the intention of the Legislature to vest in the reclamation board the sole power of carrying out the plan in detail, for it provided that any reclamation district, levee district, drainage district, or municipal corporation should have the right to acquire rights of way, or other easements, and to construct levees, cuts, canals, or gates, subject, of course, to the approval of the plans by the reclamation board, which works might be conveyed to the drainage district upon compensation being made of the actual reasonable cost. In other words, it was contemplated that the different owners and agencies interested in flood control and reclamation of the lands should work in conjunction with the drainage district; the drainage district supplementing the work of the other agencies whenever necessary or desirable for the carrying out of the general plan. Stats. 1913, § 18, p. 275.

In the same year, 1913, the Legislature passed an act creating reclamation district No. 1500, which was situated on the east side of the Sacramento river, and whose boundary on the east was a portion of the west line of the Sutter by-pass, and whose northern boundary was the south line of the Tisdale by-pass. The act creating the district authorized and directed the reclamation district to construct the south levee of the Tisdale by-pass and a portion of the west levee of the Sutter basin by-pass. Stats. 1913, p. 130. In the performance of the duty therein imposed, and under the direction and approval of the reclamation board, reclamation district 1500 proceeded to construct the south levee of the Tisdale by-pass and the west levee of the Sutter by-pass. The construction of the west levee of the Sutter by-pass had the effect of raising the flood plane of the lands east of the by-pass not yet protected by levees and endangering lands above contour 40, which, as back lands, had theretofore never been subject to flood. A suit was instituted by the owners of these lands to enjoin the construction of the levees until such time as the east side levee should be constructed, both upon the ground that the by-pass area was a natural watercourse, and that the construction of the levee was an illegal interference with the waters flowing in a natural watercourse, and, furthermore, that the construction of the levees prevented the adequate drainage of the plaintiff's lands. In Gray v. Reclamation District No. 1500, 174 Cal. 622, 163 Pac. 1024, the right of these landowners to enjoin the construction of the levee was denied upon the ground that the construction of levees was merely a method of protecting the lands from flood waters, which were a common enemy, which the reclamation district had a right to do, and furthermore, that it was a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state.

In 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1034) reclamation district 1660, lying just north of reclamation district 1500, was created, situated on the east side of the Sacramento river, its south boundary being the north boundary of the Tisdale by-pass, and its east boundary being the west line of the Sutter-Butte by-pass.

In November, 1917, the first steps were taken by the reclamation board in the proceedings for the levying of an assessment for the construction of the Sutter-Butte by-pass project. On that date plans and estimates were prepared and approved, the estimated cost being $14,993,190. On December 27, 1918, the board revised and amended its plans and estimates, reducing the estimated cost to $10,624,522.25. On August 11, 1919, the second amended plan and estimate of cost for the project was adopted by the board; the cost being estimated at $11,995,578.71, and the plan remaining practically the same as the first amended plan. Thereupon the preliminary report of the assessors, appointed by the reclamation board to apportion the assessment, was made, fixing the boundaries of the proposed assessment district on September 27, 1919, and a hearing before the assessors with respect to the assessment was held on November 7, 1919. Thereafter, on September 20, 1920, the reclamation board again adopted a third amended plan and estimates of cost; the estimate being reduced to $8,155,798.70. It will be noted that the final plans were adopted after the report of the assessors fixing the boundaries of the proposed assessment district. And it is also to be noted that the change consisted principally in the reduction of the estimated cost of the project. The area included by the assessors within the assessment district's boundaries included lands on the west side of the Sacramento river, lands in the Butte and Sutter basin, on the east side of the river, and certain lands east of the proposed Sutter-Butte by-pass.

In 1919 three acts were passed by the Legislature relative to the proposed flood control work. One act provided for the authorization, issuance, and sale of bonds based upon the assessments levied by the reclamation board, and provided the judicial procedure to be followed in validating the assessment in order that the bonds might be issued. Stats. 1919, p. 1092. Another act, amending the original act of 1911 as subsequently amended, specifically provided that, in determining the benefits that would accrue to each particular tract of land by the construction or maintenance of the works contemplated by any particular project or unit, "the works of such project or unit shall be considered as a whole." The latter act further provided:

That the "lands shall be assessed for the work embraced in such project or unit only in the proportion that they will or may be benefited by the construction of the entire works embraced in said project or unit," and that "no lands shall be considered as benefited by the construction or maintenance of the works embraced in such project or unit, or any part or portion thereof, nor shall any lands be assessed for the expense of the construction or maintenance of such project or unit or any part or portion thereof, because such lands have been or may be first endangered or flooded, or the natural drainage thereof obstructed by the construction or maintenance of any part or portion of the works embraced in such project or unit in advance of or prior to the completion of the construction of the entire works embraced in such project or unit." Stats. 1919, § 2, p. 1126.

By another act the sum of $3,000,000 was appropriated by the state for the purpose of co-operation in the construction of the Sutter-Butte by-pass project No. 6. Stats. 1919, p. 1209. And it was specifically provided that the assessors in apportioning the assessment should set opposite each tract of land the amount assessed for the flood control benefit, and that the $3,000,000 appropriated by the Legislature should be applied only to the flood control benefit assessment. Stats. 1919, § 3, p. 1129; section 5, p. 1130.

The assessors, in determining the apportionment of the assessment, divided the benefits to be derived by the construction of the project into two general groups—"flood control benefit" and "reclamation benefit." To solve the problem of how much of the total cost should be apportioned to reclamation benefits, the assessors took the situation as it existed prior to the construction of any part of the project and undertook to ascertain the total cost of reclaiming the land independent of the project. The sum total of the cost, including both levee construction and the drainage necessarily required for reclamation, was apportioned exclusively to the lands on the east side of the river subject to overflow. This sum was then deducted from the sum total of the entire cost of the project and the difference, representing the flood control benefit, assessed to lands on both the east and the west side of the river as being lands which would benefit by the removal of the flood menace.

After the tentative apportionment of the assessment by the assessors, hearings were held before commissioners appointed by the reclamation board to levy the assessment, and, after certain statutory proceedings, the commissioners finally made the assessment, which, over the protest of certain property owners, was approved by the reclamation board.

Thereafter, in keeping with the provision of the statute (Stats. 1919, p. 1092, §§ 5, 6, 7, 8), the proceeding now before us upon appeal was instituted in the superior court, in and for the county of Sutter, that being the county in which "the largest acreage of land affected by said assessment" is situate, for the purpose of validating the assessment preparatory to the issuance of bonds. Judgment validating the assessment was rendered by the unanimous vote of three judges.

[1] The main ground of objection, and the one most strongly urged upon this appeal, is the claim by the landowners on the west side of the Sacramento river that their land is compelled by the assessment to bear an undue and unwarranted burden of the required expense. They argue that the lands on the east side of the river and the lands east of the by-pass should bear a greater share of the burden, and in this behalf contend that (1) the lands east of the by-pass were not and should have been assessed for flood control features of Sutter-Butte by-pass project No. 6; (2) that the levees constructed by reclamation districts 1500 and 1660, which levees are a part of the general plan of flood control work, should have been assessed only to those reclamation districts and should not have been included in the assessment spread over the lands of the entire assessment district; and (3) that the west side should have been assessed only for the amount necessary to acquire the land within the by-pass, and should not have been assessed for any of the construction work of the levees built in order to confine the water within the by-pass.

These objections, involving, as they do, the question of the method of the spreading of the assessment between the different characters of land, as distinguished from the question of the legality of the assessment, have been excluded, we think, from our consideration by the provisions of section 8 of the statute of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1094), which provides that the decision of the three judges sitting as a court shall be "final and conclusive * * * and no appeal from the judgment given and made by said court shall be had."

There can be no doubt but that the Legislature intended by such provision, and attempted, to make the decision of that court binding as to all questions of fact involving either the spreading of the assessment or the validity of the assessment. That intention is expressed by the clear and unequivocal language of the statute—"no appeal * * * shall be had." So far, therefore, as the Legislature had the power to do so, the decision of the tribunal in question was made final.

[2] True it is this court held upon the motion to dismiss this appeal that, inasmuch as there was a constitutional provision guaranteeing to litigants a right to appeal in cases involving the legality of a tax, assessment, etc., the Legislature had not the power to finally close and conclude by this provision all questions of law which might be involved in the proceeding to validate the assessment. In the Matter of a Proceeding to Validate Sutter-Butte By-Pass Assessment No. 6 (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 974. But it was not intended by that decision to hold, nor did we hold, that all questions, irrespective of their nature and character, involved in the proceeding for the validation of the assessment, could be raised on appeal. While the Legislature did not have the power to deprive a litigant of the right to an appeal upon any question of law touching the validity of the assessment, it did have the right to forbid the consideration upon appeal of those questions of fact which involved the correctness of the apportionment of the assessment. The fact that the Legislature did not have the power to make the judgment conclusive upon every question cannot, of course, be said to operate to deprive the Legislature of the will and the power to make a judgment conclusive upon those questions which in strictness do not trench upon the validity of the assessment.

[3, 4] It is the rule generally in this and other jurisdictions that the Legislature may, in its discretion, make the decision of a statutory board concerning the spreading of an assessment final and conclusive. And it has been held the decision of such board is conclusive, except where an appeal is expressly provided by law. Larsen v. City and County of San Francisco, 182 Cal. 1, 186 Pac. 757; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 692, 76 Pac. 661; People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 388, 103 Pac. 207; Ward v. Beale, 91 Ky. 60, 14 S. W. 967; McDonald v. City of Escanaba, 62 Mich. 555, 29 N. W. 93; Grand Rapids v. Welleman, 85 Mich. 234, 48 N. W. 534. The remedy of an appeal to some specified subordinate court may be provided for by the statute, but such a remedy is a matter of grace and not of right, and does not confer the privilege of having the judgment of the reviewing court again upon appeal taken to a court of last resort. General Custer Min. Co. v. Van Camp, 2 Idaho (Hast.) 40, 3 Pac. 22; Fulkerson v. Stevens, 31 Kan. 125, 1 Pac. 261; Olympia Waterworks v. Board of Equalization, 14

[5] The judgment of the superior court in the instant case was, in effect, dual in its nature, to the extent that it embodied a determination of the legal questions involving the validity of the assessment and the judgment of an equalization board concerning the spreading of the assessment. As to the former there was doubtless a right of appeal. In the Matter of the Proceeding to Validate Sutter-Butte By-Pass No. 6 (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 974. But inasmuch as the Legislature had the power to make the assessment final and conclusive, had it been equalized by an administrative board, it had the same power to make an equalization of the assessment final and conclusive when made by a superior court sitting, in effect, as an equalizing board.

It is no new practice for courts to take an active part in the levying of an assessment. It is held in some states that when acting in this dual capacity, the court is in reality two separate and distinct entities, a board of equalization and a court having distinctly judicial powers. General Custer Min. Co. v. Van Camp, supra; Olympia Waterworks v. Board of Equalization, 14 Wash. 268, 44 Pac. 267. Other states hold that, in acting as a board of equalization, the court is acting solely as a court. Matter of Canal & Walker Streets, 12 N. Y. 406. But whether it be two separate bodies composed of the same members, or one body with different duties, the judgment of the court upon questions involving the benefit to be derived from the work and the apportionment of the assessment are matters of equalization, and therefore are final and conclusive, when so provided by the Legislature.

[6-8] It is, however, maintained that the question of whether or not the land east of the by-pass, above contour 40, should have been assessed for the flood control benefit presents a question of law which appellants are entitled to have considered and determined by this court, and that it cannot be disposed of by saying that it relates merely to a question of the spreading of the assessment. This may, for the sake of argument, be conceded. The contention in this behalf is that this court, by a long and harmonious line of decisions, culminating in Gray v. Reclamation District, 174 Cal. 662, 163 Pac. 1024, has determined that flood waters from streams like the Sacramento river are common enemy, against which each property owner may defend himself by protection levees, even though the result be to cast the water upon his neighbors, and that the only right which the neighbor has is to protect his own lands by the building of levees. It is argued from this that, inasmuch as the construction of the levees of reclamation districts 1500 and 1660, which are a portion of the entire flood control project, will cast the water upon the land of the east side owners above contour 40, which lands will be protected from inundation by the final completion of the project, and that these lands should have been assessed for flood control benefit, that the action of the assessors in exempting these lands from the payment of a share of the assessment was purely arbitrary and, as a matter of law, unjustified by the amendment of 1919 (Stats. 1919, § 2, p. 1126), which is undoubtedly the law under which the assessors proceeded. As to this appellants make two contentions: (1) That this amendment, properly construed, does not operate to exempt those owners, and (2) that, if it is to be construed so as to exempt them, it is unconstitutional. A mere reading of the statute satisfies us that it was the intent and the definite purpose of the Legislature by the amendment to exempt these lands from assessment for flood control benefit. Nor is there any merit in the second objection for the reason that it is always competent for the Legislature to itself determine the lands to be benefited, either by describing the same, or by laying down a rule which serves to identify them and to determine the amount of the benefits accruing to those lands. Such determination is conclusive and not subject to review. This is upon the theory that the landowners themselves have had a hearing before the Legislature in arriving at such determination by and through their representatives in the Legislature. Tarpey v. McClure (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 983; Flynn v. Chiappari (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 682; Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 123, 169 Pac. 1028; Miller & Lux v. Sacramento-San Joaquin Drainage Dist., 182 Cal. 252, 187 Pac. 1041; Rec. Dist. 108 v. Evans, 61 Cal. 104. The only questions, therefore, remaining for consideration of this court upon this appeal are those relating to the validity of the assessment itself, and these are necessarily confined to those jurisdictional matters similar to those raised in cases where the assessment has been made by an administrative board and its validity assailed in a court of justice.

[9] It is the contention of appellants that the whole assessment was vitiated by the fact that, after the assessment district was formed and a hearing with respect thereto had before the assessors, the reclamation board reduced the estimated costs of the project. Section 13 of the statute (Stats. 1913, p. 269) provides that the assessors must assess upon all the lands within said drainage district proposed to be assessed for the plans adopted by the reclamation board the sums included in the estimates of said board, and shall apportion the same according to the benefits that will accrue to each tract of land in said district, respectively, affected by any particular portion or project by reason of the expenditures of said sums of money. It further provides:

That "after said assessors have examined the plan or plans of the work contemplated and the estimates of the cost, they shall make a preliminary report to the reclamation board indicating the exterior boundaries of the lands that in their opinion will be benefited by the expenditures."

No claim seems to be made that there was any material change in the plans after the fixing of the exterior boundaries, but simply that, inasmuch as the estimated cost of the project was reduced thereafter, the entire assessment must be thrown out, and thus the whole expensive and prolonged procedure of making and validating the assessment be re-enacted. The only step taken by the assessors before the estimate was reduced by the reclamation board was the establishment of the limits of the property benefited by the plan. The fixing of the limit necessarily was dependent upon the plan as proposed and not upon the estimate cost, for whether the estimated cost amounted to much or little, if the plans remained unchanged, the lands benefited would ordinarily be the same. It is the plan of the project which forms the basis of the determination by the assessors of whether certain lands would or would not be benefited and, therefore, whether they should or should not be included within the proposed assessment district. Inasmuch as the burden is upon the appellants to show error, it must be assumed that no material changes were made in the plans.

Furthermore, even if changes may have been made in the plans, after the "preliminary report" of the assessors which, as required by the statute, contained a "general description" of the land which "in their opinion" would be benefited, it is evident from the language of the statute directing the assessors to make such a report fixing the boundaries, that the original determination of the boundaries was merely tentative, and subject to revision upon hearings held after the amendment of the plans. This being so, it cannot, we think, be said that the revision of the estimates of the reclamation board, after the filing of the preliminary report by the assessors, rendered the entire assessment a nullity.

The remaining objections involve the claim of various appellants who, it appears, did not file any objection to the assessment in the court below or otherwise appear therein in the validation proceedings. It is their contention that jurisdiction was not obtained over them or over their lands by the superior court in and for the county of Sutter. Admittedly the only service of process upon them was by publication as provided by the statute. Stats. 1915, p. 1344, § 10, and Stats. 1919, p. 1093, § 5. Judgment was entered validating the assessment on the lands owned by them. Their appeal is prosecuted primarily upon the ground that the provisions of the validating statute providing for notice by publication violate the "due process of law" provisions of the state and federal Constitutions. Incidentally, in support of these particular appeals, it is also argued that, even if personal service could have been dispensed with, the published notice provided for by the statute was ineffectual, because it did not describe the lands or give adequate information to the landowners affected. And it is further insisted that the provision of the act in question, permitting service by publication, is special legislation.

In addition to the foregoing objections, the contention is advanced in behalf of the appeal of Ella Hershey et al. that, inasmuch as the action for the validation was commenced and carried to a conclusion in the county of Sutter, jurisdiction was never obtained over the last-named appellants, for the reason that the action is in the nature of a suit in equity to quiet title, and must be commenced in the county in which the land affected is situated. Section 5, art. 6, Const.

We will take up and dispose of these contentions in the order of their making.

[10, 11] In so far as the decision of the statutory court involved the correctness of the apportionment of the assessment there can be no question but that the notice given was sufficient to answer the requirements of due process of law, for it has become firmly established that in assessment cases notice may be by publication or otherwise. Indeed, no court proceedings at all are necessary; it being sufficient to satisfy the requirements of due process of law if a hearing has been had before the assessing board itself. Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. 71 (approved by U. S. Supreme Court in Lent v. Tillson, 140 U. S. 316, 11 Sup. Ct. 825, 35 L. Ed. 419); State Sav. Bank v. Anderson, 165 Cal. 437, 447, 132 Pac. 755, L. R. A. 1915E, 675; Wulzen v. Supervisors, 101 Cal. 15, 22, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; United Real Estate, etc., Co. v. Barnes, 159 Cal. 242, 113 Pac. 167; Miller & Lux v. Sacramento-San Joaquin Drainage Dist., supra (writ of error dismissed by U. S. Supreme Court in Miller & Lux v. Sacramento-San Joaquin Drainage Dist., 256 U. S. 129) 41 Sup. Ct. 404, 65 L. Ed. 859; Davidson v. Adm'rs of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. Ed. 616; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369; Brown v. Drain (C. C.) 112 Fed. 582. A notice by publication being sufficient to satisfy the requirements of due process, if the hearing is before a statutory board, it is also sufficient where a court proceeding has been authorized. If the assessment can be made a lien without personal service by action of a subordinate body, it can be made a lien by a court without personal notice. Board of Directors v. Tregoe, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. 237, citing Lent v. Tillson, supra; Crall v. Irr. Dist., 87 Cal. 140, 26 Pac. 797; Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477, 91 Am. Dec. 595; People v. Doe, 36 Cal. 220; Eitel v. Foot, 39 Cal. 439; Cullen v. Glendora Water Co., 113 Cal. 503, 39 Pac. 769, 45 Pac. 822, 1047; Davies v. Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 37, 24 Pac. 771; Merchants' Trust Co. v. Wright, 161 Cal. 149, 118 Pac. 517; Fox v. Wright, 152 Cal. 59, 91 Pac. 1005; People v. Irr. Dist., 128 Cal. 477, 61 Pac. 86.

[12] We are of the opinion that the notice of the county clerk fixing the time for the objection to the assessment lists did give adequate information, by reference, to the landowners affected. The notice was given that the assessment lists had been filed in the office of the clerk of the court before which the action was pending, and that any person objecting thereto might appear and be heard in opposition to the assessment against his property as shown by these lists. While this notice did not specifically describe the property, it must be borne in mind that this was not the only notice given to the landowners. The statute itself specifically defined the boundaries of the drainage district and was notice to the landowners therein situated that in all probability their lands would be subjected to an assessment for the cost of the proposed improvements and thereby put them upon notice to watch the subsequent proceedings. The case of Lent v. Tillson, supra, is particularly in point. In that case it was held that a notice of the organization of the board and a notice that the report of the board was open to inspection was sufficient and adequate. The court declared that it was to be presumed that the statute is known and that the sufficiency of the notice must be determined from the particular circumstances of each case, and that in that case the statute, by informing the landowners beforehand of the course of procedure which would be followed and the notices which would be given, cast upon them the duty of exercising a certain degree of diligence in regard to them.

Furthermore, notice was given of a hearing before the assessors in the instant case to hear objections to the preliminary report fixing the boundaries of the proposed assessment district. In this notice was a general description of the lands, which, in the opinion of the assessors, would be benefited, and it referred to the preliminary report on file in the office of the reclamation board for such exterior boundaries. In addition to this notice, the statute provides for a notice by publication of the hearing before the reclamation board to be published in each county wherein any of the lands assessed are situated. No objection being urged here to the adequacy of the notices given of the hearing before the assessors and before the board of reclamation, their regularity and legality will be presumed.

The contention that jurisdiction by the superior court in and for the county of Sutter cannot be obtained over land in Yolo county is predicated upon the assumption that the present proceeding is in the nature of a suit in equity to quiet title. But to admit this assumption is to answer the contention. The Constitution provides:

That "actions * * * quieting title to * * * real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, is situated."

[13, 14] A drainage district even though the lands embraced therein consist of several and separate parcels of land which extend over and into two or more counties, is in its very nature a single entity, and must be considered and treated as a unit extending to and embraced within the boundaries of the district. State v. Elliott, 32 Ind. App. 605, 70 N. E. 397; Denton v. Thompson, 136 Ind. 446, 35 N. E. 264. Conceding, therefore, that this is a suit in equity to quiet title to land situated in Yolo, Sacramento, and Sutter counties, it follows that jurisdiction is given by the Constitution to the superior court in and for the county of Sutter, the county in which the greater part of the land affected is situated. Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 79 Pac. 527; Murphy v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 69, 70 Pac. 1070.

[15] We cannot concur in the contention that the provision in the act in controversy for service by publication is special legislation and violates the provision of the Constitution which prohibits the Legislature from passing special laws "regulating the practice of courts of justice." Article 4, § 25, Const. It is the rule generally that an act applying uniformly to any single class in its entirety, when the classification is founded upon some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, is not special legislation. Of course, it will be conceded that the Legislature is vested, primarily, with the discretion to make the classification, and it has been repeatedly held that courts will not disturb a legislative classification unless it is palpably arbitrary in its nature and neither founded upon nor supported by reason, and the courts, generally, with the commendable purpose of upholding the constitutionality of a legislative enactment, when possible, are permitted to and do indulge in a liberal construction of an assailed statute. Title, etc., Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199; Sacramento and San Joaquin Drainage Dist. v. Rector, 172 Cal. 385, 156 Pac. 506; People v. Sacramento-San Joaquin Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207. The law creating the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district and the reclamation board stands, in many respects, in a class by itself. This necessarily follows from the nature of the subject-matter, which necessitates special law. People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., supra. We are of the opinion that the nature of the whole proceeding is sufficiently distinct and different from ordinary civil actions to justify the creation of a class for which special rules of procedure may be provided.

[16] There is no merit in the final contention of appellants that the continuances were irregular and void. The statutory court having acquired jurisdiction in the first instance by the filing of the assessment and by the publication of the notice required by the statute, retained jurisdiction of the proceeding pending the hearing by the Supreme Court of an application for a peremptory writ of prohibition. It is conceded, as indeed it must be, that the alternative writ operated as a stay of proceedings and that as a matter of course the judges of the court below were powerless to do anything in the premises save to await the decision of this court determining the constitutionality of the act under which the court below was created and the proceedings provided therein permitted. This being so, it is manifest that the proceedings of the court below were continued by operation of law. In addition to this, the court below, as a matter of caution, formally ordered the hearing of the validating proceedings continued from time to time until the prohibition proceedings were decided by this court, and then, upon that decision coming down, the court below gave notice by publication of the time set for hearing.

[17,18] The point that the orders for continuance were in some instances signed only by two of the judges does not seem to us to be possessed of much merit. The statute itself provides that the decision of a majority of the judges shall control, and, that being so, we know of no good reason why a majority of the judges should not be permitted to make an effective order for a continuance of the hearing of the proceeding. Nor do we think there is much merit in the contention that the order for a continuance was void because it was signed by one, or perhaps two, of the judges outside of the county in which the court was sitting. The order for a continuance relates to but a mere matter of procedure necessary to put the proceedings in a condition to be heard and as such its validity was not impaired by the fact that it may have been signed outside the county in which the proceeding was pending. Comstock, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 625; Walter v. Merced Academy Association, 126 Cal. 588, 59 Pac. 136; Estudillo v. Security Loan Co., 158 Cal. 66, 109 Pac. 884.

PALMER v. TSCHUDY. (L. A. 7192.)

1. Negligence §83—Requisites of "last clear chance doctrine" stated.

The "last clear chance rule" applies only when the plaintiff has been negligent, and as a result is in a position of danger of which she is either not aware, or from which she cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; and defendant is aware of her danger and her inability to escape, and has a clear chance to avoid injuring her by the exercise of ordinary care, but fails to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

2. Municipal corporations §705(10)—Last clear chance rule not applicable where plaintiff's negligence continued to instant of injury.

Where a pedestrian, intending to cross the street, saw an automobile approaching, and proceeded to cross without again looking, and was struck by the car when it skidded on the wet pavement, his contributory negligence continued to the very instant of the injury, and the last clear chance rule did not apply.

3. Appeal and error §1066—Error in taking issue of contributory negligence from jury does not require affirmance of judgment for plaintiff on erroneous application of last clear chance doctrine.

Where the trial court erroneously instructed the jury that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, but the verdict went for plaintiff under the last clear chance rule, which had no application to the case, the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded, there being no basis for affirmance since the issue of contributory negligence has not been determined in favor of plaintiff by either court or jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Ethel B. Palmer against J. H. Tschudy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Arthur W. Eckman, William B. Himrod, and Frank E. Carleton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Barker and Wm. H. Neblett, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries suffered by her as a result of being struck by defendant's automobile. The plaintiff testified that she was walking with a friend westerly along the north side of Seventh street, which runs east and west, in the city of Los Angeles, approaching the intersection of Hope street, which runs north and south; that upon ar-riding at the east curb of Hope street she glanced to the north and saw defendant's automobile approaching south-bound at a distance of about one-third of a block (this block was shown by other evidence to be about 590 feet long); that she then started across Hope street, and when she had taken two or three steps from the curb she again glanced to the north and saw the automobile still approaching, and, of course, nearer at hand; that she and her companion then proceeded on across Hope street, and that she did not again look at or toward the approaching automobile and did not again see it until after the accident had taken place; that when she had proceeded a few feet or a few steps beyond, and to the west of, the center line of Hope street she received a blow upon her right hip, which threw her to the pavement; that she at first did not realize what had happened, but thereafter she saw defendant's automobile, which had come to a stop within a few feet westerly and southerly from where she lay. Plaintiff's companion, Mrs. Webb, testified to substantially the same effect, but added thereto:

"The first thing I knew the machine was pretty near on top of us; I grabbed Miss Palmer by the arm and pulled her out of the way; otherwise she would have been struck. She was struck with force and hit me and knocked me down. * * * The machine stopped immediately, within 2 or 3 feet."

Hope street was 56 feet wide from curb to curb, and there was a gutter along the northerly curb line of Seventh street in which water was flowing across Hope street. The pavement of Hope street from this gutter sloped up to the north at the rate of 1 foot in the first 12 feet, and 2 inches in the next 10 feet. The testimony is conflicting as to whether the pavement was wet or dry in the vicinity of this gutter. Defendant and his chauffeur testified that it was wet and slippery at the point of the accident and for a considerable distance north of the gutter, but plaintiff and Mrs. Webb testified that it was dry at the point of the collision. Plaintiff also introduced in evidence as part of her case the deposition of the defendant, who testified that the automobile was approaching the intersection at about five miles per hour, and his attention was first directed to plaintiff and her companion by his chauffeur sounding the horn; that the two ladies were then standing near the center of the street facing south with their backs to the approaching automobile, which was about 40 or 50 feet away; that the automobile was proceeding at about the center of the street, and the two ladies were slightly to the right thereof; that when the horn sounded they both looked around; that when the automobile was about 25 feet from them the horn was again sounded; that he does not remember that the ladies again looked around, and that the chauffeur then began coming to a stop; that he did not succeed in bringing the car quite to a standstill; that the pavement was wet, and because of its sloping and slippery condition the car slipped into the incline of the gutter on Seventh street, and that the right front fender brushed the plaintiff, causing her to jump and strike the other lady, whereupon they both fell to the pavement; that the street where they were standing and where they fell was slippery and wet; that the car stopped within a couple of feet after touching plaintiff. Plaintiff was a young woman 29 years of age, in good health and in normal possession of all her faculties. The accident occurred about two o'clock in the afternoon, on a clear day. There was no evidence that the car was going faster than five or six miles an hour, except as it might have been inferred from the chauffeur's testimony that at five miles per hour he could have stopped in two feet on a dry pavement. He explained his failure to stop by the slope of the pavement and, as he claimed, its wet and slippery condition. So far as disclosed by the evidence, there was no other vehicle or pedestrian upon the street at the time in the immediate vicinity. Plaintiff having rested her case, defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove any negligence of the defendant, and upon the further ground that the evidence established plaintiff's contributory negligence as a matter of law. The trial judge, in ruling upon the motion, stated that he was satisfied that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence and would so instruct the jury, but that he was of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury upon the question of the last clear chance, and for that reason he denied the motion. Thereupon defendant's chauffeur was called as a witness. His testimony was in the main to the same effect as that given by defendant upon his deposition, but was in some respects confused and self-contradictory, and the jurors might, by accepting portions of it and discrediting other portions thereof, as they had a right to do, have found sufficient facts to support a conclusion that the defendant was negligent. The trial court instructed the jurors that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and submitted the case to them upon the single issue of the last clear chance, under appropriate instructions defining that rule; whereupon a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff. Defendant contends upon this appeal that his motion for a nonsuit should have been granted upon both grounds stated therefor, and contends further that in any event the evidence did not justify the submission of the case to the jury upon the issue of the last clear chance, and that it is legally insufficient to support a finding in favor of plaintiff upon that issue.

[1] The last clear chance rule presupposes: That the plaintiff has been negligent; that as a result thereof she is in a situation of danger from which she cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; that the defendant is aware of her dangerous situation under such circumstances that he realizes, or ought to realize, her inability to escape therefrom; that he then has a clear chance to avoid injuring her by the exercise of ordinary care, and fails to do so. If all of these elements are present, the rule applies and enables the plaintiff to recover, notwithstanding her own negligence. But if any of them be absent the rule does not apply, and the case is governed by the ordinary rules of negligence and contributory negligence. The rule does not require that the inability of the plaintiff to escape the danger shall be due to a situation which renders it physically impossible for her to do so. It applies equally when she is wholly unaware of the danger and for that reason unable to escape it. But the rule also requires that if she is aware of the danger, or becomes aware of it, she must thereafter exercise ordinary care for her own protection. If, being aware of the danger and able to escape it by exercising ordinary care, she neglects to do so, she cannot invoke the last clear chance rule to place the burden of the resulting loss upon the other party.

"Obviously, if both parties to an accident could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided it, neither can be said to have had the last clear chance. It is only when a defendant charged with the negligent infliction of the injury, knowing plaintiff's peril, could and the injured plaintiff could not have avoided the injury that the defendant is liable. The liability is placed upon the party inflicting the injury only if immediately before the actual infliction of the injury the injured person was in such a situation as to be unable, by the exercise on his part of reasonable and ordinary care, to extricate himself, and vigilance on his part would not have averted the injury." Young v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 259.

[2] Measuring the facts of this accident by the foregoing rules of law, it becomes apparent that they do not meet the requirements of the last clear chance rule. According to plaintiff's version, when in a position of safety, within three steps of the east curb, she saw the automobile approaching the spot which she intended to traverse. Then she proceeded to walk across the street in front of the approaching automobile without ever again looking at it or in the direction from which it was approaching. Can it be justly said, under these circumstances, that the defendant could, and the plaintiff could not, have avoided the injury? Undoubtedly either one of them could have avoided it very easily. The defendant could have avoided it by bringing his automobile to a stop. Plaintiff could have avoided it by waiting until the automobile passed, or by keeping her eyes on it as she went forward and timing her steps so as not to pass in front of it so close as to be in danger. If her conduct in going forward in the manner in which she did was negligent, it was negligence which continued up to the very instant of the injury.

"This exception to the general rule [the last clear chance rule], however, has no application to a situation where, by their mutual carelessness, an injury ensues to one of two parties, both of whom are contemporaneously and actively in fault down to the very moment of injury." Young v. Southern Pacific Co., supra.

If we accept defendant's version, plaintiff stood in the middle of the street with her back to the approaching automobile, knowing that it was approaching her, without taking the slightest precaution for her own safety. If this was negligence, it continued up to the instant of the injury. If the approach of the automobile under these circumstances did not create a dangerous condition, there is no basis for the application of the last clear chance rule. If it did create a dangerous situation, plaintiff was aware of it from the beginning, and could easily have avoided it, either by stepping to one side of the street or by watching the automobile so as to keep out of its path. In this version of the facts it cannot be said that there was any point of time when the defendant could, and the plaintiff could not, have avoided the injury.

[3] We are of the opinion that the facts of this case, taking either version of them, do not justify the application of the last clear chance rule. Respondent does not very seriously contend that they do, but urges that the judgment should nevertheless be affirmed because, as she contends, she was not guilty of contributory negligence at all. She concedes that she cannot upon this appeal claim prejudicial error because of the ruling of the trial judge holding her guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, but she insists that it was error nevertheless which operated greatly to the advantage of the appellant, and the jury having found in her favor, notwithstanding this error, the judgment should be affirmed. She earnestly contends that she was not guilty of contributory negligence, at least not as a matter of law. She relies upon the case of Burgesser v. Bullock's (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 649, in which we held that the issue of contributory negligence should have been submitted to the jury. She asserts that the facts in that case are identical with the facts herein, but there are, in fact, important differences. In that case a pedestrian, alighting from a street car at night, attempted to cross the street in front of an approaching automobile. He continually watched it as he crossed, but apparently misjudged either its speed or its distance and was struck as a consequence thereof. The instant case much more nearly parallels in its essential facts the case of Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 203 Pac. 1031, in which the trial court directed a verdict for the defendant on the ground of the contributory negligence of the decedent and the judgment was affirmed. We pointed out, in the Burgesser Case, the distinction between the two sets of facts in the following language:

"There may be circumstances under which it can be said that the pedestrian is negligent as a matter of law. For instance, in the case of Finkle v. Tait (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 1031, in the case of a directed verdict, the District Court of Appeal affirmed the decision, but, in denying the transfer to this court (Finkle v. Tait, 203 Pac. 1034), we sustained the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal solely for the reason that the pedestrian was crossing the street without looking and under such circumstances that he could not see in the direction from which traffic might be expected." (Italics added.)

In that case the pedestrian was carrying a box upon his shoulder in such manner that it obstructed his vision, but manifestly one who can see and will not is at least as negligent as one who cannot.

For the purposes of this appeal it is not necessary to determine whether or not the trial judge was correct in ruling that the evidence established contributory negligence of the plaintiff as a matter of law. If he was correct the plaintiff could recover only by virtue of the last clear chance rule, and, as we have seen, that rule was not applicable under the evidence. If he was mistaken, the fact still remains that the issue of contributory negligence has never been determined in favor of the plaintiff, by either court or jury. That was a material issue in the case which was withdrawn from the jury by the trial judge. We cannot assume that if it had been submitted to the jurors they would have resolved it in favor of the plaintiff. To affirm a judgment in a case, tried by a jury as a matter of right, where in the jurors have not found, either expressly or impliedly, upon an essential issue of fact, would be a miscarriage of justice. O'Meara v. Swortfiguer (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 975.

The appellant complains of the giving of one instruction which is justly subject to the criticism that it was likely to be misleading. It should not have been given without further qualifications or explanation, but it is not probable that the jurors were misled thereby under the evidence herein. In view of the fact that other evidence may be produced upon another trial, it is not necessary to give further consideration to appellant's contention that the evidence herein was insufficient to sustain the implied finding of defendant's negligence.

The judgment is reversed.

TARTAR v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 7516.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1923.)

1. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Findings of Industrial Accident Commission on substantial evidence conclusive.

The findings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon questions of fact are conclusive, and are not subject to review, where there is any substantial evidence to support them.

2. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Reviewing court determines whether inferences deducible from facts sustain findings of Industrial Accident Commission.

When an award of the Industrial Accident Commission is based wholly upon circumstantial evidence, it is within the province of a court of review to determine whether there are inferences reasonably deducible from the facts to sustain the Commission's findings.

3. Master and servant ☞405(1)—Finding of Industrial Commission must be based on fair inference.

There must be direct evidence or a fair inference based on the testimony tending to support the conclusion of the Industrial Accident Commission, or it will not be upheld.

4. Master and servant ☞405(2) — Evidence held to warrant finding that transfer of business by employer was a sham.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant inference and finding of Industrial Accident Commission that applicant for award was, at the time of injury, in the employ of T. and that a sale and transfer of the business by T. to W. was a sham and pretense.

5. Appeal and error ☞996—Inference drawn from facts legally proved is finding impervious to review.

A finding based upon reasonable inference, drawn from facts proved with legal sufficiency, is as much and as completely a finding, as respects review, as any other finding based upon good and sufficient evidence.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, J. [1-3] Petitioner seeks an annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, upon the ground that there is no evidence to sustain the findings upon which the Commission based its decision that the applicant was entitled to recover. The return of the Commission discloses that support for the award rests solely upon disputable inferences arising from facts of a circumstantial nature; the weight of which petitioner contends was overcome by positive and uncontradicted evidence. It is well settled that the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon questions of fact are conclusive, and are not subject to review, where there is any substantial evidence to support them. Southern Pac. Co. v. I. A. C., 177 Cal. 378, 381, 170 Pac. 822; Western Indemnity Co. v. I. A. C., 182 Cal. 709, 720, 190 Pac. 27. But, while this court has no power to weigh the effect of positive evidence (Dearborn v. I. A. C., 187 Cal. 591, 594, 203 Pac. 112), it is within its province, in reviewing an award based wholly upon circumstantial evidence, to determine whether there are inferences reasonably deducible from the facts to sustain the Commission's findings, which may not rest on conjecture or guesswork (Clapp's Parking Station v. I. A. C., 51 Cal. App. 624, 627, 197 Pac. 369). There must be direct evidence or a fair inference based on the testimony tending to support the conclusion of the Commission, or it will not be upheld. Employers' Liab. Assur. Corp. v. I. A. C., 182 Cal. 612, 187 Pac. 42. If it cannot be said in this case that the inferences drawn by the Commission are sufficient to raise a conflict, in the light of the positive evidence produced by the petitioner, the award must be annulled.

[4] The sole question presented is whether or not Robert H. Smithers, the applicant before the Commission, was, at the time of the injury, in the employ of petitioner, who for many years conducted a jewelry store in the city of Los Angeles, maintaining an optical department as an adjunct thereto. There is no direct evidence to that effect. In August, 1921, Smithers applied at petitioner's store for employment as a bench worker and assistant in optometry. His application was first made to Dr. R. E. Walters, one of the respondents here, who appeared to be the head of the optical department. The applicant and Dr. Walters "talked it over," and Dr. Walters told Smithers he "would have to see Mr. Tartar before anything could be done." Smithers thereupon gave his references to Mr. Tartar and was asked by the latter concerning his schooling, ability, and habits. He was informed that "if it was all right with Mr. Walters, he [Tartar] thought it would be all right * * * that they would try me out for a week." With this understanding, Smithers went to work. He was injured October 7, 1921, by the explosion of an alcohol lamp he was using in the course of his employment. He received extensive burns, and no question is raised as to the nature and extent of his injuries.

Smithers filed an application with the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation, alleging that he was injured "in the course of his employment by A. P. Tartar." The latter answered, denying that he was the owner of the optical business or that Smithers was ever in his employ. When the matter came on for hearing, Dr. R. E. Walters, who was personally present, asserted that he, and not Tartar, was the employer. The referee for the Commission thereupon made Dr. Walters a party defendant to the cause. The established facts relied on by Smithers in support of his claim that the defendant A. P. Tartar was in fact his employer are: When he applied to Dr. Walters at the store he was not given employment until after he had been referred to Mr. Tartar. The jewelry store was located at Eighth and Spring streets. The optical department was located in one corner of the establishment adjacent to the Eighth street entrance. It was not separated from the other departments. There were three small signs in and about the optical department, bearing the legend, "R. E. Walters, Optometrist," or "Optician." One sign read, "Our Optical Department, A. P. Tartar." Other signs in and about the place tended to indicate that Tartar was the owner of the entire establishment. Money received for optical goods sold, and the sales slips on which were printed the words "Optical Department," were turned over to Mr. Tartar's cashier. But one set of books was kept. In these all accounts of both the optical department and jewelry business were kept. Smithers, while employed at the place, from time to time gave out advertising matter consisting of a chemically treated, antiseptic cloth for cleaning lenses, which bore the printed legend, "Compliments of our Optical Department, A. P. Tartar, Jewelers and Mfg. Opticians." After the injury to Smithers, a card announcing the removal of the business to a new location bore the name "A. P. Tartar, Jeweler, Silversmith, and Manufacturing Optician and Official Railroad Watch Inspector. * * *" This card also bore the following: "Dr. R. E. Walters Optometrist & Optician Office with A. P. Tartar, 107 West Ninth Street, Los Angeles."

In opposition to the claim of the applicant, A. P. Tartar, the petitioner, testified that he disposed of the optical business theretofore carried on in connection with his jewelry store to Dr. Walters on the 25th of September, 1920, nearly one year before Smithers was employed. The reason he assigned for making the sale was that he had much business to attend to in the jewelry department, and, not being a registered optometrist, he had been previously told by the state board of optometry that it would be necessary for him to dispose of the optical business. In September, 1920, Dr. Walters was in the employ of Mr. Tartar on a salary of $45 per week. On the date mentioned, Tartar and Dr. Walters, according to the testimony of both of them, signed a contract in writing, which was produced in evidence, whereby Dr. Walters purchased all the fixtures, furniture, optical goods, and good will of the optical department, for and in consideration of $12,000, payable in the form of a promissory note for that amount, due one month later. It was mutually agreed that Dr. Walters should secure the payment of the note by a chattel mortgage on the furniture and fixtures located in the storeroom. Mr. Tartar agreed to pay all indebtedness then existing against the optical department, and stipulated that he would execute a bill of sale covering the property upon full payment of the note. Dr. Walters agreed to pay $75 a month as rent, including "light, water, space, and everything." At this time Dr. Walters had little or no funds, the arrangement entered into being that the profits of the optical department, after deducting expenses and a reasonable amount for the living expenses of Dr. Walters, should apply in liquidation of the note until the full purchase price was paid. Petitioner relies upon the testimony of Dr. Walters, which strongly corroborates everything Mr. Tartar testified to. Both witnesses asserted that immediately following the purported transfer Dr. Walters assumed full control of the optical department and all business in connection therewith. There were introduced in evidence monthly returns for excise tax purposes required by the United States internal revenue regulations, of the business done in the optical department after the alleged transfer of ownership. These were all made out in the name of and were sworn to by Dr. R. E. Walters as owner. He also appeared to have paid the required amount of tax. It is also in evidence that after Smithers went to work his wages were paid to him by checks signed by Dr. Walters. One set of books, in which the accounts of the jewelry store and the optical department were entered, was introduced in evidence. The method of book-keeping employed was far from being satisfactory. About all that can be said of it is that it served to segregate the account of sales in the jewelry store from the business done in the optical department, in response to the governmental requirements in that respect. No change in the method of bookkeeping appears to have been made after the purported sale, other than a notation of the sale to Dr. Walters, which appears on one of the pages in the midst of the accounts. It does not satisfactorily appear when that entry was made. From time to time, Dr. Walters, instead of drawing a regular salary, as he had been accustomed to do before the sale, withdrew amounts sufficient for his living expenses, and it is claimed he paid bills incurred in running the business. A recapitulation of accounts, which was before the Commission, tended to show that on November 21, 1921, after making deductions of amounts drawn by Dr. Walters and bills paid, he was entitled to a credit arising from the profits of the business amounting to $2,627.74, on the purchase price of the optical department. No notation on the note or elsewhere was introduced in evidence, showing that he had actually been credited with any amount for that purpose. The defendants before the Commission were unable to show that Dr. Walters had paid the monthly rental, said to have been agreed upon for the optical department, and, in fact, it was admitted that he had not been charged therefor.

Only one copy of the agreement of sale was in existence. That was kept by Tartar in the safe in the store, where, it was contended, Dr. Walters had access to it. Neither the promissory note for $12,000 nor the chattel mortgage securing its payment was written or executed until after the injury to Smithers, when an antedated note, bearing the date of September 26, 1920, one day after the date of the contract of sale, was signed by Dr. Walters. The chattel mortgage, bearing the same date, containing a copy of the antedated note, was introduced in evidence and was shown to have been executed by Dr. Walters and Mr. Tartar, and sworn to and acknowledged on October 17, 1921, and recorded the following day, more than a month after the accident. There is confusion in the record as to whether or not an inventory of what was actually in the optical department was taken at the time of the alleged sale. None was produced. At the hearing it was shown that fixtures, furniture, stock, and supplies worth only about $3,000 were regarded as being in the property agreed to be sold for the sum of $12,000. There was brought here in the record of the proceedings before the Commission a large number of exhibits, consisting of checks drawn by Dr. Walters and by A. P. Tartar, a list of cash tags from the prescription department of an optical company for goods sold to Dr. Walters, and various receipts purported to have been given by Dr. Walters in connection with the business. There were also included a list of credit memorandums, a list of cash tags and miscellaneous papers. These were introduced for the purpose of corroborating the contention that Dr. Walters conducted the business after the alleged transfer. They do not have that effect, for it appears that after the purported sale the method followed was that Tartar, by himself or by his bookkeeper, drew checks payable to Dr. Walters for everything he withdrew from the business for his own support and for the bills due. These checks seem to have been deposited in the bank, and checks by Dr. Walters drawn against the account thus created for the wages of the employees and other expenses incurred in the optical department. Many of these checks, and all of the cash tags and the receipts, bore date after the accident to Smithers.

Explanations were made, principally by the petitioner Tartar, of the various transactions we have noted, which are relied upon by the respondent to negative the fact of a bona fide sale of the optical department. For instance, Tartar testified that it was necessary for him to be satisfied as to the character and honesty of employees working in the optical department because of the valuable nature of the jewelry stock kept in the other part of the store. The continuation of the use of Tartar's name in connection with the matter distributed at the store, and announcing the removal to the new location, he testified, was for the purpose of "advertising." He saw no need of exacting the note and security provided by the contract of sale for the reason that the business would not be transferred until fully paid for. The note and mortgage were only executed after the injury because Smithers was "threatening to make trouble."

[5] Here we have a very considerable number of inferences, all tending to sustain the finding of the Commission, contradicted by the positive testimony of two witnesses who were directly interested in the outcome of the proceeding. They were both attempting to prove that the applicant was employed, not by Tartar, who, according to the Commission, was financially responsible, but by Dr. Walters, who, the Commission asserts, was financially irresponsible. Their testimony is wholly uncorroborated by the testimony of any disinterested witness, although it appears there were at least two persons who would have been in position to corroborate the circumstances relating to the purported transfer of the optical department. There are numerous facts and circumstances, to which we have referred, which reasonably tend to support the inference relied upon by the Commission that the claimed contract of sale from Tartar to Walters may have been a sham. The motive for such pretense is not, we think, supplied by the desire to escape liability in the present proceeding, as claimed by the respondent, but may have been actuated by the direction of the state board of optometry requiring Tartar to dispose of his optical business. The optical business was conducted after the purported sale in precisely the same manner as it had been prior thereto, except that wages and the expenses of the business, instead of being paid directly by Tartar, were paid by Tartar to Walters and by the latter disbursed. In fact, it may be safely inferred that the business was under the actual or potential direction of petitioner as before. Apparently Dr. Walters drew from the business whatever money he desired. But an examination of the accounts and of the exhibits would indicate that he actually appropriated to himself no more than would have amounted to a reasonable salary. There seems to be justification also for the inference that the segregation of the accounts upon the books, which showed no change in the method of entry after the purported sale, was required by the excise tax regulations, regardless of who owned the business. Under all these circumstances it cannot be said that the Commission was required to accept the testimony of petitioner and Dr. Walters. If it was not so required, then it would appear that it was justified in finding upon the circumstantial evidence, and the inferences arising therefrom, that the purported sale from petitioner to Dr. Walters was a sham and a pretense. From this it would follow that the finding that petitioner was the real employer of Smithers is supported by the evidence and that the award should be sustained.

"If the finding of fact is based upon a reasonable inference it is not within the power of this court to set it aside any more than it is within its power to set aside any other finding supported by sufficient legal evidence. For a finding of fact based upon reasonable inference drawn from facts proved with legal sufficiency is as much and as completely as is any other finding of fact a finding based upon good and sufficient evidence. It is the peculiar and exclusive province of trial court or trial jury in the first instance to make such finding of fact, and it is the especial right of every litigant to have all facts so determined by court or jury: this court sitting only to review the findings and being empowered to set them aside as matter of law only when not sustained by adequate evidence." Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 799, 158 Pac. 753, 756."

The award is affirmed.

EAST BAY MUNICIPAL UTILITY DIST. v. GARRISON, Auditor of Alameda County, et al. (S. F. 10737.)(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1923.)1. Statutes §227—Whether statute providing for performance of act within specified time is mandatory or directory determined from terms thereof, nature of act, and consequences of doing act or not.

Whether a statute providing that an act shall be done within, at, or before a specified time is mandatory, or merely directory, in the absence of an express provision of law, must be determined from the terms thereof construed as a whole, the nature of the act, and the consequences of doing or failing to do it at such time.

2. Municipal corporations §958—Act as to taxation of property in utilities districts embracing existing political subdivisions construed strictly, and not as retroactive, unless expressly made so.

Municipal Utility District Act, § 20, subds. 1-4, being in invitum in imposing taxes on property in districts embracing existing political subdivisions already subject to tax burdens, will be construed strictly, and hence not as retroactive, unless expressly made so.

3. Municipal corporations §958—Act requiring utility district to elect to adopt county assessor's assessments by certain date held mandatory.

Municipal Utility District Act, § 20, subd. 3, requiring the board of directors, which by subdivisions 1 and 2 is empowered to levy and collect district taxes by its own system, to declare its election to adopt assessments made by assessors of the counties in which the district is situated by ordinance filed with the county auditors by the first Monday in February, held mandatory, especially in view of Pol. Code, §§ 3629 (see Const. art. 13, § 8) 3656, 3718, as to the time when the lien of taxes attaches, and the times within which the assessor must prepare and complete his books, embracing the matters required by section 3650, and furnish copies to cities, towns, and districts requesting them.

4. Statutes §263—Not construed as retroactive in absence of express declaration or clear implication.

An act will not be construed as retroactive, in the absence of an express declaration or very clear implication of such intent.

5. Taxation §501—Existence of obligation to pay particular tax essential to fixation of lien.

A lien being a charge imposed on property as security for performance of an act or obligation (Civ. Code, §§ 2872-2875), it is essential to the fixation of a tax lien on property as of the first Monday in March, as required by Pol. Code, § 3718, that there be, at such time, an existing obligation to pay the particular tax secured by the lien.

6. Municipal corporations §958—Act authorizing utility district directors to take county assessment as basis for district tax not retroactive as to property in districts formed after times for attachment of lien.

Municipal Utility District Act, § 20, subdivision 3 of which) authorizes the board of directors to elect to take assessments made by the assessors of counties in which the district is situated as the basis for district taxation by filing an ordinance declaring its election with the county auditors by the first Monday in February, is not retroactive as respects property within a district not yet in existence on such date or the first Monday in March, when the lien of general property taxes attaches under Pol. Code, § 3718, which is made a part of the act by subdivision 4, and officials of a county in which such district is situated cannot be required, by writ of mandate, to assess, levy, and collect a district tax because of an election made after such dates.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandamus by the East Bay Municipal Utility District against E. F. Garrison, Auditor of Alameda County, and others. Application denied.

Wm. J. Locke, of San Francisco (Louis Bartlett, of San Francisco, of counsel), for plaintiff.

Ezra W. Decoto, Earle Warren, and Ralph E. Hoyt, all of Oakland, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding wherein the petitioner applies for a writ of mandate directed to the respondents herein, who are, respectively, the auditor, the assessor, and the tax collector of the county of Alameda, requiring the said E. F. Garrison, as said county auditor, to compute and enter in the assessment book or books of said county, to be prepared by him in accordance with the laws governing the making and collection of property assessments and taxes for such county, and in a separate column in said assessment book or books, to be headed Utility District Tax—Municipal Utility District [naming it], the sum or sums to be paid as a district tax on the property within the East Bay municipal utility district, the petitioner herein, and requiring the said Louis J. Kennedy, as the county assessor of said county, to assess and levy, and the said Edward T. Planer, as the county tax collector thereof, to collect said district tax for the use and benefit of said East Bay municipal utility district, in accordance with law and the provisions of an act of the Legislature providing for the creation and maintenance of municipal districts for supplying water and other commodities within such districts, known as the "Municipal Utility District Act," approved May 23, 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 245.

The petitioner alleges that it was duly organized as a public corporation under and in pursuance of the terms of said act of the Legislature on the 22d day of May, 1923, and that said district embraced within its territory certain lands and the inhabitants thereof within the counties of Alameda and Contra Costa; that thereafter, and on the 31st day of May, 1923, the petitioner duly adopted an ordinance entitled "An ordinance of the board of directors of the East Bay municipal utility district whereby said board elects to avail itself of the assessments made by the assessors of Alameda and Contra Costa counties," and reading as follows:

"Section 1. The board of directors of the East Bay municipal utility district hereby elects to avail itself of the assessments made by the assessors of Alameda and Contra Costa counties respectively for the territory within said counties embraced within said district, and elects to take such assessments as the basis for district taxation, in accordance with the provisions of the act of the Legislature entitled 'An act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal utility districts, authorizing such districts to incur bonded indebtedness for the acquisition and construction of works and property and to levy and collect taxes to pay the principal and interest thereon.'" (Approved May 26, 1921.)

The petitioner further alleges that, pursuant to the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 20 of said Municipal Utilities Act, the board of directors of said district filed a certified copy of said ordinance with each of the respondents herein; that each of said respondents, notwithstanding the presentation and filing of the respective copies of said ordinance, have refused to comply with the provisions of said act, and to compute, assess, and collect the taxes for said district as is in said act provided; wherefore the petitioner prays for the issuance of a writ of mandate compelling the said officials respectively so to do.

The respondents demur to said petition as failing to state sufficient grounds for the issuance of said writ. In support of their said demurrer respondents assert and show that the power and authority of the board of directors of the petitioner herein to pass and adopt the ordinance above set forth, and by so doing to entitle the said petitioner, as a municipal utility district, to require the respondents herein, as the auditor, assessor, and tax collector, respectively, of the county of Alameda to compute, assess, levy, and collect the taxes for the uses of said district for the fiscal year 1923-24, is to be found in that portion of subdivision 3 of section 20 of said Municipal Utilities Act, which reads as follows:

"(3) The board of directors may elect to avail itself of the assessment or assessments made by the assessor or assessors of the county or counties in which the district is situated, and may take such assessment or assessments as the basis for district taxation; provided, that the board of directors shall declare its said election by ordinance and file a certified copy of the same with the auditor or auditors of the county or counties in which the district is situated, on or before the first Monday in February of each year. Thereafter all assessments shall be made and taxes collected by the county assessor and tax collector, or county assessors and tax collectors, of the county or counties in which the district is situated until the board of directors of the district by ordinance elects otherwise."

The respondents insist that, since the application of the petitioner herein affirmatively shows that the ordinance upon which the petitioner relies for its authority to compel and seeks the compulsion of the respondents to do the acts and things required under the provisions of said enactment was not adopted by said board of directors "on or before the first Monday in February" of the year 1923, nor, in fact before the 31st day of May, 1923, and that a copy of said ordinance was not presented to or filed with the respondents herein before the 14th day of June, 1923, and that, having thus failed to comply with the express provision of said act with respect to the time on or prior to which such ordinance should have been adopted by said district, and a certified copy filed with said respondents, it is not entitled to impose upon the latter as county officials of the county of Alameda the added duties provided for in said enactment.

The respondents further insist that, since the petition herein affirmatively shows that the petitioner was not organized as a public municipal utility district prior to May 23, 1923, and had no existence prior to that time, it could not legally impress a lien for taxes for the use of such district upon the property within it which should take effect as of the first Monday of March, 1923, so as to impose a lien as of that date upon said property, and hence could not require the respondents herein to compute, assess, levy, and collect taxes upon the property within said district for the enforcement of said lien.

The answer which the petitioner makes to the first objection above set forth is that the provisions of said Municipal Utilities Act with regard to the time within which the board of directors of a corporation organized and functioning under said enactment should take action in the adoption and filing of said ordinance electing to avail itself of the general laws governing the levy and collection of taxes and of the services of the county officials in charge of the administration thereof are not mandatory, but directory in character, and hence that the failure of the board of directors of the petitioner to exercise the election provided for in said enactment through the passage of the ordinance in question on or prior to the first Monday in February of the current year was not fatal, and that the adoption of said ordinance on the later date, constituted a substantial compliance with the requirements of said enactment by which these respondents are bound.

[1] Whether the terms of a statute which provides that a particular act shall be done within or at or before a specified time are to be construed as mandatory or merely directory, in the absence of an express provision of law declaring them to be one or the other, must be determined from the terms of the statute construed as a whole, from the nature and character of the act to be done, and from the consequences which would follow the doing or failure to do the particular act at the required time. The act of the Legislature approved May 23, 1921, and known as the Municipal Utility District Act, is an act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal utility districts for the purpose of acquiring, constructing, owning, operating, controlling, and using within or without, or partly within and partly without, the designated district, works for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants and municipalities of said district with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service, or other means of communication or works for the disposition of garbage, sewage, or refuse matter, with power to do all the things necessary or convenient for the full exercise of the powers granted to districts organized within such territory. Such districts are given the right of eminent domain, and are empowered to construct works across or along streets and highways and over lands which now are or may become the property of the state, including the right to construct works upon or across any stream or water course, and in the exercise of these rights shall have the same rights and privileges which have been or may be granted to municipalities within this state. A district thus formed and functioning is expressly given the right to levy and collect, or cause to be levied and collected, taxes for the purpose of carrying on its operations and paying the obligations of the district.

Section 20 of said act deals specifically with the matter of taxation. By subdivision 1 thereof it is provided that—

“If from any cause the revenues of the district shall be inadequate to pay the principal or interest on any bonded debt as it becomes due, the board of directors must, or if funds are needed to carry out the objects and purposes of the district, which cannot be provided for out of the revenues of the district, then the board of directors may, levy a tax for such purposes as herein provided. The board shall state the purposes for which such taxes are necessary, and must fix, by resolution, the amount of money necessary to be so raised by taxation.”

Subdivision 2 of said act provides that—

“The board of directors may by ordinance provide the mode and manner of assessing, and of correcting and equalizing assessments upon, the taxable property situated within the district, for the purpose of levying district taxes, and of levying and collecting such taxes, and may provide for the collection of delinquent taxes by actions or legal proceedings which are hereby authorized to be brought, prosecuted and maintained in the name of the district against the several owners of property from whom such taxes may be due and delinquent, for the purpose of recovering the amount of the delinquent tax, with penalties, interest, and costs; provided, that the provisions of such ordinance shall be conformable to general law.”

Subdivision 3 of said act provides in part that—

“The board of directors may elect to avail itself of the assessment or assessments made by the assessor or assessors of the county or counties in which the district is situated, and may take such assessment or assessments as the basis for district taxation, provided, that the board of directors shall declare its said election by ordinance and file a certified copy of the same with the auditor or auditors of the county or counties in which the district is situated, on or before the first Monday in February of each year. Thereafter all assessments shall be made and taxes collected by the county assessor and tax collector, or county assessors or tax collectors, of the county or counties in which the district is situated until the board of directors of the district by ordinance elect otherwise.”

By subdivision 4 of said section 20 of said act it is provided that—

“All taxes levied under the provisions of this act shall be a lien on the property on which they are levied; and the enforcement of the collection of such taxes shall be had in the same manner and by the same means as is provided by law for the enforcement of liens for state and county taxes, all the provisions of law relating to the enforcement of the latter being hereby made a part of this act, so far as applicable.”

[2] From this statement of the provisions of said act germane to the question before us, it is manifest that it is an act most comprehensive in its application to districts to be formed thereunder regardless of pre-existing political subdivisions, county, district, or municipal, and susceptible of embracing populous communities already organized in political subdivisions and already subjected to their own burdens by way of taxation, imposed under state, county, municipal, and charter laws, ordinances, and regulations. The particular provisions of the act above set forth touching the subject of taxation come clearly within the category of laws which are in invitum in their imposition of the burdens of taxation and hence are to be strictly construed. McDougald v. Boyd, 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168; Mulville v. City of San Diego, 183 Cal. 734, 192 Pac. 702; Weyse v. Crawford, 85 Cal. 196, 24 Pac. 735.

[3] So interpreted, the provisions of this act, whether they are regarded as a whole or whether the particular portion thereof embraced in section 20 thereof is to be considered as a tax measure, are not to be construed as retroactive in their application in the absence of language in the statute expressly making them so. When the particular provisions of section 20 of the act are considered it will appear that they purport to provide an alternative method for the imposition and levy of the taxes which are to be imposed upon property within the limits of said district, and for its use and benefits in carrying into effect the purposes of its creation. By subdivision 1 of said section the board of directors is fully empowered to levy and collect taxes for such purposes; by subdivision 2 of said section the board of directors of the district is fully empowered to create by ordinance its own complete system for the assessment, levy, and collection of such taxes, its only limitation in that regard being the requirement that the provisions of such ordinance shall be conformable to general law; by subdivision 3 of said section the board of directors is empowered by ordinance to elect to avail itself of the assessment or assessments made by the assessor or assessors of the county or counties in which the district is situated, and may take such assessment or assessments as the basis for district taxation. This substitute method for the computation, assessment, levy and collection of district taxes is made subject to the proviso that the election which the board of directors are thus permitted to make must be exercised through an ordinance duly adopted and duly filed with the respective county officials of the county or counties in which such district is situated, on or before the first Monday in February of each year. Reading these two subdivisions of section 20 of said act together, it would seem to have been the apparent purpose of the lawmakers to fix upon a date early enough in each year to enable the district itself to organize its own complete equipment for the assessment, levy, and collection of such taxes as its board of directors should find it necessary or expedient to impose; or, in the event of the exercise of said election, to enable the county officials upon whom the burden of computing, levying and collecting such taxes was to be laid to provide the necessary equipment for the doing of the additional work which the exercise of such election cast upon them. To interpret these provisions of said section fixing the first Monday in February as the date on or prior to which the board of directors of the district should exercise this election to be merely directory would be altogether unreasonable as leaving both the officers of the district who might be charged with the assessment, levy, and collection of those taxes in the event such election was not exercised and the county officials who would be charged with the like duty in the event of its exercise in a state of uncertainty as to which body of officials should undertake the task, until such a time, owing to the failure of the board of directors to pass the ordinance of election, as would be likely to imperil or render difficult, if not impossible, the legal performance of the precise, detailed, and delicate duty of computing, assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes of the district for any current year.

These views of the interpretation to be given the particular provisions of the statute are further enforced by an examination of the provisions of the general laws relating to the assessment and taxation of property. Section 3718 of the Political Code provides that the lien of taxes upon real property and the improvements thereon to be assessed, levied, and collected for each year attaches to said property as of the first Monday of March in each year. Section 3629 of the Political Code (see section 8, art. 13, Const.) provides that the assessor must exact from each taxpayer a statement under oath setting forth specifically the real and personal property owned by such person at 12 o'clock noon of the first Monday in March of each year. Between these dates and the first Monday in July of that year the assessor must prepare his assessment books embracing the detailed matters required by the provisions of section 3650 of the Political Code, and he must complete his said assessment books on or before the last-named date, and deliver the same to the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county, and for his failure so to do he is subject to the penalties provided for in section 3656 of the said Code. He must also, on or before the third Monday of July of each year, furnish to such incorporated cities, towns, lighting, water, and irrigation districts within his county as shall have made written requests for the same on or before the first Monday of March of each year, certified copies of his said assessment books in so far as the same pertains to property within the limits of these several bodies so requiring the same. It will thus be seen that the statutes relating to taxation fix upon a date not later than the first Monday in March of each year when the activities of these several county officials in the matter of the assessment, levy, and collection of taxes begin. The Legislature must be held to have had these several provisions of the Political Code in mind in the formulation of the particular act under review and in the fixation of the particular date named therein when the ordinance of the board of directors of the district to be formed under said act should be adopted and a certified copy thereof filed with the county officials specified therein, and that the adoption of said ordinance on or before said date and the filing of a certified copy thereof with each of said officials was to be a mandatory duty cast upon the governing body of said district in order to the exercise of the election provided for in subdivision 3 of section 20 of said act.

The applicant herein relies strongly upon the case of Cake v. City of Los Angeles, 164 Cal. 705, 130 Pac. 723, as upholding their contention that the provisions of said act are to be deemed directory. There can be no doubt that said decision correctly states the law as to the particular situation presented in that case; but the cases are in no wise similar. The act to be done in that case related to the preparation of an amended assessment under the Street Opening Act of 1903 (St. 1903, p. 380, § 16), as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 1040), and the statute contained the general direction that such amended assessment should be made by the street superintendent within 60 days after the council had ordered the same to be made, with a proviso that the council might extend said time for a period not exceeding 90 days additional; and this court, in construing these provisions of said act, held that, in view of the fact that there were no negative words denying the power to return the new assessment after the indicated time, and no undue advantage would be gained by the county or the contractor, and no benefit either to the public or any individual impaired or lost, the said provision in said statute must be held to be merely a directory provision. A very different situation is, as we have just seen, presented by the requirements of the act under review in this proceeding when read in the light of the particular duties imposed upon county officials with respect to the levy and collection of taxes under the provisions of the Political Code above set forth.

[4-6] The foregoing views as to the proper interpretation of the meaning of these provisions of the act in question are further enforced by a consideration of the main objection which the respondents herein urge against the issuance of the writ of mandate sought by this proceeding. The record shows that the petitioner herein was not in existence as a political or corporate entity on the first Monday in March of the present year, and was not, in fact, created or organized as a municipal utility district under the provisions of said act until on or about the 21st day of May, 1923. The date upon or before which it was required under section 20 of said act to exercise its election as to how and by whom its taxes for the fiscal year 1923-24 were to be assessed, levied, and collected had expired more than three months before it came into being. To give to the act the interpretation which the petitioner claims for it in this proceeding would be to render the provisions thereof retroactive in their operation as to districts not in being at the time when the particular election provided by its terms was to be made. There is nothing in the act itself to indicate that it was intended to have any such retroactive effect, and it is a well-settled principle of statutory construction that an act will not be construed to be retroactive in the absence of either an express declaration to that effect or a very clear implication that such was the intent of the Legislature. Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 Pac. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 Pac. 158; Estate of Richmond, 9 Cal. App. 402, 99 Pac. 554; State Commissioner, etc., v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 Pac. 974.

But the respondents urge an even more serious objection to the giving to this act the retroactive aspect which the petitioner is seeking to impose upon it. Under section 3718 of the Political Code the lien of property taxes to be imposed under general laws attaches to the property to be affected thereby upon the first Monday in March of each year. The act under review provides in subdivision 4 of section 20 thereof that all taxes levied under the provisions of this act shall be a lien upon the property upon which they are levied, and that the provisions of the general law relating to the enforcement of such liens are made a part of said act. The duty imposed by the general laws relative to taxation upon those county officials who are the respondents herein is to compute, list, assess, levy, and collect such property taxes as by virtue of said section 3718 of the Political Code become a lien upon real property and the improvements thereon upon the first Monday in March of the current year. A lien, according to its general definition, is a charge imposed upon property as security for the performance of an act or obligation. Civ. Code, §§ 2872 to 2875, inclusive. The lien of taxes differs in no respect from other liens, in that it must rest upon an obligation to do the particular act which its attachment to the property of the obligee, or another, secures. In order, therefore, for the lien of taxes to be legally imposed upon property as to the first Monday in March of any particular year, it is essential to the fixation of such tax lien upon such property as of said date not only that the property itself should be in existence at the time of the attachment of such lien, but also that there should be at such time an existing obligation to pay the particular tax which the lien thus imposed is to secure. Otherwise the lien would have no foundation upon which to rest, and would by the imposition of an incumbrance having no obligation to support it, amount to the taking to the extent of such incumbrance of the property of the citizen without due process of law. On the first Monday in March, 1923, the property lying within the region which now forms the East Bay municipal utility district was in existence and was the subject of ownership on the part of persons who were on that date legally liable to pay the taxes upon their respective holdings which were then impossible under existing laws; and for such obligation the lien of taxes as of that date legally attached to such property, but as to any taxes for the maintenance or expenditures of the East Bay Municipal Utility District there could on said date be no such tax nor any lien to secure its future collection, for the reason that such district had not yet been formed, did not exist, and, not having been called into being, could not create an obligation which would support a tax lien attaching as of said prior date.

We can perceive no distinction in principle between the nonexistence of a law creating a tax at the date of the attempted attachment of the lien of such tax and the nonexistence of a municipal district capable of creating the obligation which is requisite to support such a lien as of said date. In the case of Dodge v. Nevada Nat. Bank of San Francisco, 109 Fed. 726, 48 C. C. A. 626, it was held that an act of the Legislature of California which went into effect on March 14, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 96), and which purported to render national bank stock taxable which had not theretofore been subject to taxation under existing state laws, was ineffectual to subject such property to the lien of taxes for that year. In so deciding the federal court construed the Constitution and law of California relative to taxation, and in so doing used this significant and persuasive language:

"The entire system of taxation in the state of California plainly contemplates the existence of property liable to be assessed for taxes, and that its assessment, at whatever date actually made, shall relate to some fixed period of time, and that the taxable status of the property is to be determined by its condition on that day. The Constitution and Codes clearly designate the time when the assessable character of property becomes fixed, to wit, 'at 12 o'clock, meridian, on the first Monday in March,' and the question here involved must be determined with reference to that date. The initial right of the assessor to assess any property during the assessing period relates to that day. The assessor is not authorized to assess any property that is exempt from taxation on that day. The owner or party in control of property is not required to include in his list, to be given to the assessor, any property not subject to taxation on the first Monday of March in each year. That is the time the lien on the property for the taxes attaches, regardless of the date when the assessment is made. The property assessed in this case was in existence on the first Monday in March. At that date there was no law in force which made it taxable."

A similar question was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wagoner v. Evans, 170 U. S. 588, 18 Sup. Ct. 730, 42 L. Ed. 1154, which involved the validity of an attempted tax upon cattle kept or grazed in an unorganized county of the territory of Oklahoma; and in holding the tax invalid the Supreme Court said:

"It is sufficient to say that, prior to the passage of the act of March 5, 1895, there existed no power in the authorities of Canadian county to tax property within the attached reservation. Such authority was first given by that act, and could only be validly exercised on property subjected to its terms after its enactment."

So in the case at bar there was on the first Monday in March, 1923, no law which rendered the property within the region later to be organized into the East Bay municipal utility district subject to taxation for the use of such as yet nonexistent district, and hence no lien which could attach to such property for such uses upon said date, and therefore no duty imposed or impossible upon the respondents herein to set in motion the official machinery provided by general laws for the enforcement of a lien. We are constrained, therefore, to hold that the respondents herein, as county officials of the county of Alameda, were not bound to conform to the requirements of the act in question by virtue of the election sought to be exercised by the board of directors of the petitioner herein pursuant to the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 20 of said act, and that a writ of mandate should not issue to compel said officials so to do.

We have not considered the practical difficulties in the application of the provisions of said act to the assessment of the property of the district for the current year which are discussed in the briefs of counsel, preferring to dispose of the case upon what appears to be the fundamental questions involved in its consideration.

The application is denied.

We concur: LAWLOR, J.; WASTE, J.; SEAWELL, J

WILBUR, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment for the reason that, even if we assume that the date of the passing of the ordinance calling upon the county officers to make the assessment by the utility district is directory, it is manifest, in view of the fact that our system of taxation is based on the accruing of a lien on the first Monday of March, that an ordinance after that date demanding the assessment of a tax in favor of a district not in existence on the first Monday of March was not intended by the statute.

I think it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the Legislature would have power to provide that an assessment made after the district was created could relate back to a date before it was incorporated. Assuming that they had power to do so, they have not, in fact, exercised that power.

I concur: MYERS, J.

PEOPLE v. GRAY. (Cr. 1114.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 18, 1923.)

1. Criminal law §1159(3)—Evidence not reviewed if any is in harmony with verdict.

The appellate court will not review the evidence if there is any in harmony with the verdict and judgment.

2. Criminal law §1170(2)—Exclusion of testimony held not prejudicial in view of testimony rendering it immaterial.

In a prosecution for violating Juvenile Court Law, § 21, by procuring and permitting a girl under 21 to visit and remain in a house for prostitution, exclusion of testimony that gas and electric bills were charged to, and the furniture purchased by, another, held not prejudicial to defendant; such testimony being immaterial in view of other testimony tending to show that either one of two other persons was responsible for the conduct of the premises when the offense was committed.

3. Criminal law §1170½(3)—District attorney's misconduct in asking defendant whether he had been bootlegger held not prejudicial, in view of instructions.

In a prosecution for procuring and permitting a girl under 21 to visit and remain in a house for prostitution, the district attorney's misconduct in asking defendant if he had not been engaged in the bootlegging business held not prejudicial to him where the jury could not have convicted him under the court's instructions unless it believed prosecutrix's story and testimony corroborating her, and the court ruled the questions improper, and instructed the jury to disregard them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Chester Gray was convicted of violating Juvenile Court Law, § 21, by procuring and permitting a girl under 21 to visit and remain in a house for the purpose of prostitution, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1246). He was charged with having procured, permitted, and allowed a girl under the age of 21 years to visit in and remain in a designated house in the city of Oakland, state of California, for the purpose of prostitution.

[1] Three assignments of error are made. The one with relation to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment need not be discussed by us further than to say that the evidence was conflicting, but that, upon the testimony of the prosecutrix and the police officers, the jury was entitled to bring in a verdict of guilty. Our function ceases with relation to a review of the evidence upon encountering in the record testimony in harmony with the judgment.

[2] Objection is made to the rulings of the trial court by which was excluded, upon the objection of the plaintiff, certain testimony of an employee of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and of a furniture dealer. By the testimony of these witnesses it was sought to be shown by the defense that the gas and electric bills incurred on the premises in question were charged to one William Canty, and that the furniture on said premises at the time of defendant's arrest had been purchased by said William Canty, and was being paid for by him upon the installment plan. A statement of certain facts appearing in the record will demonstrate that the testimony excluded was entirely immaterial, and its exclusion, therefore, could not have prejudiced the defendant. Defendant introduced testimony to the effect that the premises in question were rented about March 1, 1922, by William Canty. The defendant was arrested on or about May 6, 1922. He stated that he had rented a room in the house from Canty some time the latter part of March. He also testified:

"Q. During the time that you were there, from the last week of March up until the time of your arrest, the 7th day of May, 1922, did Mr. Canty remain there all the time? A. No; he was there part of the time. Q. Yes, sir. Was he there at the time of the arrest? A. No, sir. Q. Did any one else aside from Mr. Canty have charge of those premises after you went there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who else did? A. Why, a party by the name of Schultz come in there about 10 days after I come in with his wife, and had charge of the property up until the day of the arrest. Q. Up until the day of the arrest? A. Yes, sir. Q. And on the day of the arrest who took charge of the premises? A. A party by the name of Whitey. Q. And he was there at the time of the arrest by the officers? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was anything said by the officers as to who was in charge of the premises at the time of the arrest on May 7, 1922? A. Mr. Whitey told Mr. Canning, himself, that he was in charge at the time he took me."

Neither Mr. Canty, Mr. Schultz nor Mr. Whitey, the persons alleged to have been in charge of the premises, successively, were produced as witnesses, but it is apparent that, if the testimony of the defendant had been accepted as true by the jury, either Whitey or Schultz, and not Canty, would have been responsible for the conduct of the premises at the time the offense was committed, and Canty's original connection with the house would have been immaterial. The testimony of the defendant was aided by the testimony of one of his witnesses, Corato, with reference to the responsibility of Schultz and Whitey for the conduct of the premises at the time of defendant's arrest. In view of this contention and this testimony by the defendant and his own witness, it becomes unimportant who originally purchased the furniture for the premises or in whose name the gas and electric service was being obtained, as it was not contended that Canty was in charge of the premises at the time of the arrest, which occurred a few moments after the offense. The objection, therefore, is without significance upon this appeal.

[3] The only other objection made is with reference to alleged misconduct of the district attorney. It is contended that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking the defendant if he had not been engaged in the "bootlegging" business at various places mentioned at dates prior to the time of the offense for which he was being tried. It is evident that these questions were improper, and the court so ruled, and afterwards instructed the jury to disregard them, and not to consider them. In the excitement of a contest in the trial court, it often happens that a district attorney, through overzealousness on behalf of the people, attempts to bring before a jury matters which the settled rules of evidence exclude. This is to be regretted, and, in cases where it is evident from a perusal of the entire record that justice has not been done, or that the defendant has been prejudiced by such efforts of the prosecutor, judgments will be reversed for these reasons. But in the instant case it is not apparent that any prejudice has resulted to the defendant from the questions complained of. The jury could not have convicted the defendant under the instructions of the court unless it believed the story of the prosecutrix and the testimony and matters appearing in the record which corroborated her, and, if the jury believed that story, it is evident that the conduct of the district attorney did not influence the result. Furthermore, the direction of the court with reference to the conduct complained of must be deemed to have cured the error.

What we have just said applies with equal force to the other assignments of misconduct on the part of the district attorney.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHAW v. KING. (Civ. 4549.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 13, 1923.)

1. Specific performance ⇨49(2)—Consideration of contract held insufficient to warrant specific performance.

An alleged contract between brother and sister, evidenced by letters wherein the brother offered to maintain the sister for the rest of her life, held so lacking in consideration on the part of the sister that specific performance of it was unwarranted.

2. Specific performance ⇨28(1)—Contract held too indefinite to warrant.

An alleged contract by a brother to care for his sister during the remainder of her life held too indefinite to warrant a decree of specific performance.

3. Specific performance ⇨62—Held unwarranted in absence of showing that damages could not be adequately compensated for at law.

In an action by a sister against her brother's estate to enforce specific performance of an alleged agreement by decedent to maintain plaintiff during the rest of her life, where there was no showing that plaintiff's damages, if any, could not be adequately compensated for at law, held, that specific performance was unwarranted.

4. Specific performance ⇨6—Held unwarranted because of lack of mutuality of remedy.

In an action against the estate of plaintiff's brother to enforce specific performance of an agreement by decedent to care for plaintiff during her life in exchange for her society and company, held, in view of the death of plaintiff's brother, rendering specific performance by plaintiff impossible, that there was no mutuality of remedy, and specific performance was unwarranted.

5. Contracts ⇨19—Death of offeror before acceptance held revocation of offer precluding.

Where a brother, after forwarding his sister money on which to come to him, and offering to maintain her during the rest of her life, dies before the offer is accepted, it must be deemed revoked, under Civ. Code, § 1587, subd. 4.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Eoline W. Shaw against Hazel Hubbard King, as administratrix of the estate of Fred C. King, deceased. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Goldstone, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Geo. Clark Sargent, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment against her entered upon granting the motion of the defendant for a nonsuit. The defendant is the surviving wife of Fred C. King, deceased, and also the administratrix of his estate. The plaintiff presented her alleged claim against the estate to the administratrix. It was rejected. She thereupon brought this action, seeking specific performance of an alleged contract with deceased, or, failing in that, for damages against his estate for its breach.

It is unnecessary to go into the facts at great length, for the case presents but one question, which is answered by a fundamental rule of contract law, i. e., that an enforceable contract must be founded upon a consideration known to the law.

In the present case, the plaintiff and deceased were sister and brother. The brother lived in California and the sister in New York. The letters of the brother to his sister, relied upon by her to establish the alleged contract, as well as the undisputed testimony of relatives and intimate friends, prove beyond doubt that there was a deep and tender affection between the brother and sister, and that he looked after her and provided for her necessities and comforts with loving care. It is also apparent that the brother planned for years, and frequently expressed his purpose, to care for his sister during the remainder of her lifetime. He was the president and a large stockholder of an oil company, and a short time before his death the affairs of this company were in the hands of a federal court receiver. During the period of the receivership he wrote to his sister frequently, telling her of the situation, and that $1,500,000 would soon be received by the company from the receiver and distributed among its stockholders; that he would then receive a substantial sum of money, and would be able to carry out long-cherished plans for her; that he would send her money to come to California, where the climate would improve her health, and that they would spend the remainder of their lives near each other, and enjoy the companionship they had known as children. These letters were attached to plaintiff's complaint, and indicate clearly the generous, kindly spirit of the brother toward his sister. In November, 1920, the receiver paid over to the company the money held by him, and deceased received a dividend of 50 cents a share on 50,334 shares of stock in the oil company, and also received additional money from other sources. On November 16, 1920, deceased forwarded to plaintiff his personal check for $300, together with a letter telling her to start for California at once, and to stop on the way and see another sister, who was ill, and to whom he had also sent money.

Plaintiff alleged that after receiving this check she quitted the employment upon which she had previously depended for her livelihood and support, and terminated and abandoned her former domicile in New York, with the intention of thereafter establishing her residence in California, and relying for her permanent future maintenance and support for the remainder of her life upon her brother. Plaintiff left New York on December 14, 1920, without knowledge that her brother had died suddenly three days earlier. This information was communicated by telegraph to friends in the east with whom the plaintiff was living at the time, but they, fearing she would not be able to endure the long railroad journey if she knew the truth, concealed the fact from her, and she did not learn of her brother's death until she reached San Francisco. Plaintiff is a woman of the age of 60 years, in delicate health, and without financial means to provide for her own support and unable to earn her own living.

The testimony of several friends and relatives of the family is undisputed that the brother frequently spoke of his purpose to care for his sister during her entire life; that it was an object ever before him. He stated frequently that he had promised his mother when she was dying that he would care for his sister, who had been afflicted with brain fever when a child, and thereby incapacitated for solving her own economic problems. His great desire was to have the affairs of the oil company settled so that he might carry out his promise to his mother and enjoy the comfort and society of his sister in California. He had almost accomplished this purpose when the hand of death was laid upon him, thwarting his long-cherished plans.

The trial judge was moved to comment upon the kindly, generous nature of deceased, as evidenced by the letters to his sister and his conduct toward her, and to regret that his estate could not be charged with a moral obligation which he so constantly recognized. We join in those sentiments, but we can find no enforceable contract in the facts proven at the trial.

[1] As previously stated, the plaintiff sought recovery upon two grounds: One by the enforcement of specific performance of the alleged contract to provide for her maintenance for the remainder of her life, and the other for damages for breach of said contract. Viewed as an action for specific performance, the pleading and proof is insufficient for several reasons. There is no showing that the consideration for the alleged contract was adequate; the terms of the alleged contract are too vague to be specifically enforced; there is no showing that the plaintiff cannot be compensated in damages for a breach of the alleged contract. Parsons v. Cashman et al., 23 Cal. App. 298, 301, 137 Pac. 1109, 1111.

As to the first objection, the contract was evidenced by letters written by the brother to the sister. In one of these letters he expresses the hope that he will soon be able to tell plaintiff to "stop work and come West and be near us." The same idea is expressed in the other letters. In the last letter he said: "Inclosed find check for $300. I think you had best come at once. I think you had far better put off your visit to Boston until next summer, when I will be far better prepared financially to send you and spare the money." The letter then continues with directions as to her tickets, etc. The plaintiff started for San Francisco in response to that letter. She alleged, but offered no proof upon the subject, that she had quitted her employment in New York. The only suggestion of any employment by the plaintiff is the references in the letters to her work. But there is no proof that she was working at the time she received the last letter which induced her to leave New York, nor that she gave up her employment because of her brother's offer. On the contrary, the testimony of her friends and relatives offered on her behalf was all to the effect that she was in delicate physical health, and was unable to look after herself in the matter of earning a living. So far as the record shows, therefore, there was no consideration given for the alleged agreement of defendant's intestate, except the journey from New York to San Francisco. Plaintiff offered no evidence that this was any hardship or detriment to her, and the expense of it was paid by her brother. There was no proof that plaintiff had sacrificed any opportunities of any kind in leaving New York for a short time. She never performed any services for her brother, and never gave him the comfort and pleasure of her society, because he died before she left New York.

A case rather closely in point is Jaffee v. Jacobson, 48 Fed. 21, 1 C. C. A. 11, 14 L. R. A. 352, where it was held that a failure to perform services called for by the agreement, although due to the death of the party for whom the services were to be performed before the beneficiaries had an opportunity to carry out the agreement, will prevent enforcement of the contract by the beneficiaries.

[2] As to the rule that a contract must be definite before specific performance will be decreed, there is no showing, either by the letters relied upon as constituting the contract, nor by the testimony introduced on behalf of the plaintiff as to the approximate amount monthly which the brother contemplated allowing his sister. Was it to be $50 a month or $200, as she asks in this action?

[3] Furthermore, this is not a case where the plaintiff gave up years of her life and opportunities for pleasure and profit in order to minister to the needs of her brother, in reliance upon his promise to care for her. In such cases it has been held that damages would not be an adequate compensation for the loss of the opportunities of an entire lifetime, and that the contract would be specifically enforced. There is nothing in the present record to indicate that plaintiff's damages, if any, could not be adequately compensated for at law.

[4] As a further objection to enforcing this alleged contract specifically, there was no mutuality of remedy. A court of equity will refuse to decree the specific performance of an executory contract wherever it creates a duty from the plaintiff of such confidential or personal nature that the court could not have enforced it at the instance of the defendant. After the services have been rendered, however, the reason for the foregoing rule no longer applies, the contract having become mutual in both obligation and remedy. 25 R. C. L. § 118; Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 29, 43 Am. Rep. 239. In the instant case plaintiff contends that in return for her brother's provision for her financial needs during her lifetime she was to give him the benefit of her society and companionship, and to maintain her residence near him, so as to make their constant association practicable. As in the case of Jaffee v. Jacobson, supra, this companionship and association was the real consideration for the contract. The brother could not have enforced this contract against the sister. Equity would not undertake to compel the plaintiff to be her brother's companion in California. She had not entered upon the fulfillment of that portion of the contract at the time of the breach, and there was no mutuality of remedy.

We are now brought to a consideration of the legal remedy sought. Plaintiff asks for damages for breach of contract in the event specific performance cannot be had. Apart from the uncertainty of the contract there is no proof of damage in the record. Plaintiff's damage would be the difference between the value of the thing she was to receive and the value of the things she was to give up. How much money was plaintiff to receive from her brother and for how long a time, under the terms of the contract, and what was the value of the time and attention she was expected to devote to her brother in return therefor? The record is silent upon all of these matters; there was no proof offered.

[5] A further answer to appellant is that, taking her view of the legal situation and regarding the letters of the brother as an offer to the sister which she accepted by part performance when she started upon her journey from New York to San Francisco, a difficulty is presented by the fact that before plaintiff left New York her brother had died. The offer of the brother was revoked by his death before plaintiff's acceptance of it by part performance. Section 1587, Civ. Code, subd. 4.

The judgment is affirmed.

A. B. Bigler, of Santa Maria, for appellants.

Armstrong & Shaeffer, of Santa Maria, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants M. Fleisher and M. Fleisher & Co. from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien. The complaint alleges that the defendant M. Fleisher & Co., a corporation, entered into a contract with the Santa Maria Construction Company, a copartnership, whereby the latter agreed to construct, remodel, and erect for the former a certain one-story business and office building in the city of Santa Maria, Santa Barbara county, and that plaintiff, a corporation having its principal place of business at San Francisco, furnished glass and other material to be used in, and which were used in, the construction, remodeling, and erection of the building. The court found these averments of the complaint to be true. It is contended by appellants that there is no evidence to support the finding that the glass and other material were furnished by plaintiff to be used in this particular building.

[1] In a suit to enforce a materialman's lien it not only must be alleged and proved by the plaintiff that the material was actually used or consumed in the construction, alteration, addition to or repair of the building, but it also must be averred and proved that the material was furnished by the materialman expressly for that particular building. Upon this proposition the decisions in this state are of one accord, from the early case of Bottomly v. Rector of Grace Church, 2 Cal. 90, to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Ensele v. Jolley, 188 Cal. 297, 204 Pac. 1085. It is not enough that the owner or contractor purchased the material for use in the building on which the lien is asserted; the materialman himself must have furnished it for use or consumption in that building. Weatherly v. Van Wyck, 128 Cal. 329, 60 Pac. 846.

[2] Respondent contends that the rule that the materialman must have furnished the material to be used or consumed in the particular building upon which he claims the lien is not justified by the language of the present mechanic's lien law—the law of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1313), as amended. There is no merit in the claim. So far as the rule under consideration is concerned, the language of the present statute does not differ substantially from that of the prior statutes. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it now reads, declares that—

"Materialmen * * * furnishing materials to be used or consumed in * * * the construction, alteration, addition to or repair * * * of any building * * * shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have * * * furnished materials, for the value of such * * * materials furnished."

As will be noticed, the section gives to materialmen liens only upon the property "upon which they have * * * furnished materials." It is the furnishing of material to be used or consumed in the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair of the particular building upon which the lien is claimed that creates the lien. The statute does not contemplate that a lumber merchant should have the right to follow the materials which he has sold to another, in general terms, and assert a lien upon any building to which the materials may happen to have been applied.

The record before us is barren of any evidence tending to support the finding that plaintiff furnished the materials for use in the construction, remodeling, or erection of this particular building. All that the evidence shows is that the Santa Maria Construction Company ordered the materials of plaintiff, and that the latter shipped them from San Francisco to Santa Maria, consigned to the construction company. Nowhere is there any evidence that the materials were sold by plaintiff for the purpose of being used in the construction, remodeling, or erection of any building in particular.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

63 Cal. App. 73

BUTLER v. ZEISS et al. (Civ. 4557.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 19, 1923.)

1. Municipal corporations — 663(3)—Abutting owner may sue for wrongful injury to shade trees.

An owner of property abutting on a street has a property right under Civ. Code, §§ 831, 833, sufficient to permit him to maintain an action against any person, except the highway officials, who wrongfully injures or destroys shade trees growing in the highway.

2. Adjoining landowners — 5—Cutting down overhanging trees wrongful.

The fact that shade trees growing in a street in front of the premises of an abutting landowner leaned over and were a menace to the property of an adjoining landowner did not necessarily give the latter the right to cut the trees down.

3. Trespass — 61—Grounds for treble damages.

To entitle plaintiff to recover treble damages under Code Civ. Proc. § 733, for cutting down trees, he must allege that defendant willfully and maliciously removed the trees knowing them to be plaintiff's property.

4. Trespass — 46(3)—Evidence held to show willful and malicious cutting of trees.

In an action under Code Civ. Proc. § 733, for treble damages for cutting trees, evidence held to sustain a finding that the cutting was willful and malicious.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. Butler against Louis F. Zeiss and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. B. Martinelli and Jordan L. Martinelli, both of San Rafael, for appellants.

John W. Woten, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover damages. She was awarded a judgment in the trial court, and the defendants have appealed. The facts are briefly stated in the findings as follows:

"(1) That on the 23d day of April, 1913, plaintiff became, and ever since has been, and now is, the owner in fee of, and as such owner was during all of said time, and now is, in possession of, that certain real property, together with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, located in the town of Inverness, county of Marin, state of California, described as follows: Lot No. 15 in block 16 according to the plat of the survey of the same now on file in the office of the county recorder of said Marin county and duly recorded in liber 1 of Maps, at page 80, thereof.

"(2) That at all the times mentioned in the complaint herein, and until on or about the 1st day of November, 1919, there were growing and standing in place on Aberdeen Way, the street or highway in front of plaintiff's real property hereinabove described, seven trees, and that at all said times there was and now is standing upon plaintiff's said real property a house, which said house fronts upon said Aberdeen Way, and in which said house plaintiff resided, and now resides.

"(3) That on the 1st day of November, 1919, and at the time of the felling and destruction of said trees as hereinafter stated, said Aberdeen Way was, ever since has been, and now is, a public street or highway, and that on the 1st day of November, 1919, and at the time of the felling and destruction of said trees as hereinafter stated, said Aberdeen Way in front of plaintiff's said real property and house, and that part of said Aberdeen Way in front of plaintiff's said real property and house, was, ever since has been, and now is, a public street or highway.

"(4) That said trees aforesaid stood and were growing until destroyed in front of plaintiff's said real property and house and on Aberdeen Way as aforesaid.

"(5) That on or about the 1st day of November, 1919, and within two years preceding the commencement of this action, defendants maliciously, wilfully, wrongfully, and without any lawful authority, or any authority, cut down, felled, and destroyed said seven trees aforesaid, and all of them.

"(6) That thereby, and by reason of such destruction of said trees, plaintiff was, and thereafter continued to be, deprived of the said shelter afforded by said trees, and of the pleasure, comfort, and enjoyment derived from said trees in front of her said house. That prior to the destruction of said trees plaintiff had for many years enjoyed the same, and the beauty thereof, and the shade and shelter afforded thereby.

"(7) That, by reason of said destruction of said trees, the value of plaintiff's said house and real property above described became and was lessened to the extent of $350, and that plaintiff's enjoyment of her said house on said real property has been ever since the destruction of said trees materially and substantially lessened.

"(8) That, by reason of the premises and said wrongful act of defendants in cutting down said trees, plaintiff has been and is damaged in the sum of $350 actual damages suffered and sustained by plaintiff in the premises.

"(9) That it is not true that said trees aforesaid were of a dangerous nature, or were dangerous to the person and property, or to the person or property of defendant Zeiss and the members of his family, or of defendant Zeiss or the members of his family, as alleged in defendants' answer herein, or at all.

"(10) That it is not true that said trees aforesaid rendered the premises of defendant Zeiss unhealthful or unfit for human habitation as alleged in the answer herein or at all.

"(11) That, by reason of the foregoing premises and the above findings, it becomes and is unnecessary to find or make any findings herein as to any other facts involved or in issue herein or involved upon the issues made and joined by the pleadings herein, and that such other facts in issue herein are immaterial.

"And this court now concludes that said plaintiff is entitled to have judgment in her favor against said defendants, and each of them, for treble and the amount of her damages aforesaid or for the sum of $1,050, as provided for by section 733 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Let judgment herein be entered accordingly."

[1, 2] There being nothing in the record to the contrary, it will be presumed that the plaintiff's title extended to the center of Aberdeen Way. Civ. Code, § 831. Trees whose trunks stand wholly upon the land of one owner belong exclusively to him. Civ. Code, § 833. In the case of Donahue v. Keystone Gas Co., 181 N. Y. 313, 73 N. E. 1108, 70 L. R. A. 761, 106 Am. St. Rep. 549, the Supreme Court of New York had under consideration a set of facts quite similar. Following some earlier cases in that state, the court held that the plaintiff had a property right sufficient to permit him to maintain an action against any person, except the highway officials, who might wrongfully injure or destroy the trees. See, also, 3 Dillon, Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 1126. The defendants claimed that the trees leaned over the property of the defendant Zeiss and were a menace to his property. The trial court found against him on that contention. Even though the trial court had found the fact the other way, the defendant would not necessarily have had the right to cut the trees down. Grandona v. Lovdal, 70 Cal. 161, 11 Pac. 623. To the same effect is Scarborough v. Woodill, 7 Cal. App. 39, 93 Pac. 383.

[3, 4] Having the right to some relief, the plaintiff filed her action under the provisions of section 733, Code of Civil Procedure. That section authorizes the trial court to award treble damages. But to entitle a plaintiff in one of these cases to treble damages under section 733 of the Code of Civil Procedure he must allege that the defendant wilfully and maliciously removed the trees knowing them to be the property of the plaintiff. Stewart v. Sefton, 108 Cal. 197, 41 Pac. 293. The plaintiff in the case at bar pleaded that the acts of the defendants were done wilfully and maliciously, and the court so found. However, the appellants claim that there is no evidence in the record that the defendants' acts were both wilful and malicious. The respondent replies that such evidence is in the record, and she cites and relies upon the testimony of Mrs. Barton, a sister of the plaintiff. That witness testified that about two months before the date of the cutting she had a conversation with the defendant Zeiss concerning the trees. That conversation was as follows:

"Mr. Zeiss said he was going to cut this tree down. 'You better not,' I said. 'If you do, there will be war in camp. Mrs. Butler would have a fit.' He said, 'I will take the initiative and let her do the fighting.' I said, 'I wouldn't do that; she will be awful wild.' 'Well,' he said, 'the district attorney is a particular friend of my brother's. He said if I considered these trees a menace to my property I can cut them down.' I said, 'There is not a menace to your property. There is not one tree leaning towards your house. There are some branches reaching over to my house. There isn't one leaning towards yours.'"

It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff and her family, and the defendant Zeiss and his family, did, during the summer months, occupy their respective residences at Inverness. When the summer had come to a close and the plaintiff had left the neighborhood, the defendant Zeiss gave directions to his codefendant, Reeves, and, acting on such directions, the defendant Reeves executed the act. If the trial court believed the foregoing testimony (and from its findings we must assume that it did), then it had the power to make a finding that the cutting was done willfully, and maliciously. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 163, 116 Pac. 530. Having found the facts accordingly the trial court had the power to treble the damages.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

HOLSON et al. v. BUTLER et al. (Civ. 4043.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 18, 1923.)

1. Reformation of instruments ☞36(2)—Essentials of complaint seeking reformation of deed stated.

A complaint, seeking reformation of the description in a deed on the ground of fraud, to be good as against a demurrer must show the original agreement as relates to the description of the property, and show wherein the description in the deed differs from the property agreed to be conveyed, and that such difference was caused by defendant's fraud.

2. Reformation of instruments ☞37—Cross-complaint seeking reformation of description in a deed held sufficient as against demurrer.

A cross-complaint, seeking the reformation of a description in a deed on the ground of fraud, which alleged that cross-defendants had "sold" to cross-complainant a lot designated as No. 130 and 25 feet of lot 131, but that only lot 130 was actually conveyed, and that the failure to include the addition of 25 feet of lot 131 was done "intentionally and purposely," and "with the express purpose and intention of defrauding" cross-complainant, held sufficient as against a demurrer.

3. Reformation of instruments ☞13(1)—Description in deed may be reformed for fraud when it does not describe property intended.

Under Civ. Code, § 3399, equity will reform the description in a deed whenever, through fraud of the grantor, it fails to convey all the property intended by the parties to be conveyed.

4. Appeal and error ¶907(3) — Where evidence not record, court's findings assumed supported.

Where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, and the evidence is not before the appellate court, it must assume that the court's findings are supported by the evidence.

5. Trial ¶396(1) — Finding held not subject to objection that it made new contract between parties.

Where by cross-complaint the defendants, in an action to quiet title to land, asserted title to the easterly 25 feet of the lot involved by reason of purchasing from plaintiff, a finding that the easterly 20.20 feet of the lot involved was sold as alleged in the cross-complaint held not erroneous as being tantamount to making a new contract for the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Albert B. Holson against John N. Butler and Rebecca J. Butler, wherein the last-named defendant filed a cross-complaint, joining as cross-defendant Nellie Holson. From judgment for cross-complainant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Shankland, R. L. Hogan, and D. S. Hammack, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Gates & Randles, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Albert B. Holson brought this action against John N. Butler and Rebecca J. Butler, husband and wife, to quiet title to lot 131 of Holson Heights, in the city of Los Angeles. The defendants answered, denying that plaintiff possesses any title to the easterly 25 feet of the lot. The defendant Rebecca J. Butler filed a cross-complaint, wherein she alleged that she purchased from the plaintiff and his wife, Nellie Holson, whom she made a cross-defendant, all of lot 130 of Holson Heights and the easterly 25 feet of the lot in controversy, i. e., the easterly 25 feet of lot 131, but claimed that, by reason of fraud on the part of her vendors, the deed to her incorrectly described the property, in that it failed to mention the easterly 25 feet of lot 131, wherefore she prayed that the deed to her be reformed so as to include that property in the description of the land conveyed to her, and that her title thereto be quieted. The trial court found that plaintiff and his wife sold to cross-complainant all of lot 130 and the easterly 20.20 feet of lot 131, and that, through fraud on the part of the vendors, the deed, while duly conveying lot 130, omitted to mention the easterly 20.20 feet of lot 131. Judgment passed for cross-complainant accordingly and plaintiff appeals.

Appellant's principal points are: (1) That the cross-complaint does not state a cause of action for reformation based on fraud; (2) that, because cross-complainant alleged that the cross-defendants sold to her all of the easterly 25 feet of lot 131, the finding that it was the easterly 20.20 feet of that lot which was sold to her was tantamount to making a new contract for the parties. We find no merit in either point.

The material allegations of the cross-complaint are substantially as follows:

On January 4, 1919, cross-complainant "bought" from cross-defendants and the latter "sold" to cross-complainant lot 130 and the easterly 25 feet of lot 131 of Holson Heights, for a total consideration of $3,300, which was paid by cross-complainant to cross-defendants. Thereafter, but on the same day, cross-defendants, by a deed executed by them as grantors, conveyed to cross-complainant lot 130 of Holson Heights. The property conveyed by said deed does not include all of the property "sold" by cross-defendants to cross-complainant, in that the easterly 25 feet of lot 131 of Holson Heights was not included therein. The omission from the deed of this easterly 25 feet "was intentionally and purposely made by the plaintiff, with the express purpose and intention of defrauding the said defendant and cross-complainant, * * * and the said plaintiff knew at said time that said deed did not include all of the property sold by him, * * * to wit, lot 130 of the Holson Heights and the said easterly 25 feet of lot 131." Cross-complainant at the time believed that the description in the deed did in truth and in fact contain the easterly 25 feet of lot 131, as well as all of lot 130. She did not discover the omission until April 20, 1920, which was 43 days before the action was commenced. She would not have purchased any part of the land nor have paid her money for the same had she not believed that the easterly 25 feet of lot 131 was included in the property described in the deed. The land omitted from the deed is reasonably worth the sum of $1,000. Had she known that the deed did not convey to her the entire property purchased by her, she would not have accepted the deed or have paid the consideration of $3,300.

[1-3] A complaint for reformation of the description in a deed on the ground of fraud, to be good as against a demurrer, must show the original agreement, in so far, at least, as it relates to the description of the property to be conveyed, and should point out wherein the description in the deed differs from the description of the property agreed to be conveyed, and that such difference was caused by defendant's fraud. The cross-complaint before us sufficiently shows what was the real antecedent agreement between the parties respecting the property to be conveyed, and points out the difference between the description as agreed upon and the description of the property as actually conveyed. This that pleading does by alleging that the cross-defendants "sold" to the cross-complainant, for a consideration of $3,300, all of lot 130 and the easterly 25 feet of lot 131, but that only lot 130 was actually conveyed. The allegation that the cross-defendants "sold" to the cross-complainant the easterly 25 feet of lot 131, as well as all of lot 130, is sufficient to convey to the mind of a person of common understanding the idea that the pleader intended to charge that the cross-defendants had contracted, for a valuable consideration, to transfer to cross-complainant their title and interest in and to all of the property so "sold" by them. Radebaugh v. Scanlan, 41 Ind. App. 109, 82 N. E. 544. Equity will reform the description in a deed whenever, through fraud on the part of the grantor, it does not convey all of the property which the parties intended should be conveyed. Civ. Code, § 3399. Here the cross-complaint, by sufficient averment, shows that the discrepancy between the agreement to convey and the actual conveyance was due to cross-defendants' fraud, it being alleged that the omission of the easterly 25 feet of lot 131 from the description in the deed was done "intentionally and purposely," and "with the express purpose and intention of defrauding" cross-complainant, who believed that the description in the deed did in truth contain the omitted property.

[4, 5] It cannot be said that the court's findings and decree made a new contract for the parties. True, the trial court found that the cross-defendants sold to cross-complainant the easterly 20.20 feet of lot 131, and not, as cross-complainant alleged, the easterly 25 feet of that lot. The evidence is not before us, the record on appeal consisting of the judgment roll alone. We must assume, therefore, that the court's finding was supported by the evidence; that is, we must assume that the evidence showed that the cross-defendants "sold," i. e., that the parties contracted for the conveyance of, lot 130 and the easterly 20.20 feet of lot 131. The decree reforming the deed follows this description. Therefore, so far from making a contract for the parties, the decree follows the terms of their contract as disclosed by the evidence. What seems to be the situation is that there was a variance between the cross-complaint and the evidence; that is, it is quite probable that the evidence, if it were before us, would show that the land which the parties contracted to convey was of an area somewhat less than that alleged in the cross-complaint. Such variance, however, was not a material one. We do not see how it could have actually misled the cross-defendants in maintaining their defense on the merits to Mrs. Butler's cross-action for reformation.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Tender ⇐15(3)—Insufficiency of tender by check as not lawful money waived by refusal on other grounds.

One refusing a tender by check on grounds other than that it does not constitute an offer of lawful money will be held to have waived such objection. Civ. Code, § 1501.

2. Tender ⇐11—Tender by check dated before due date not insufficient because received before date of check.

A check dated August 30 for principal and interest due August 31 on a note held not an insufficient tender because received by mail on August 22, especially where the same practice had been followed on other occasions without objection, and several of such checks had been cashed when received, though by payee's attorney, who had no authority to accept and cash postdated checks; they being antedated with respect to the obligation.

3. Tender ⇐14(1)—Tender by telegraph not insufficient because of telegraph company's demand that payee identify himself.

A tender by telegraph held not conditional, and hence not insufficient, because of the telegraph company's refusal to pay the money unless payee identified himself as required by the party making the tender.

4. Costs ⇐260(4)—Judgment enjoining sale of realty under deed of trust securing note and directing reconveyance to maker on payment of amount due only affirmed with damages for frivolous appeal.

A judgment enjoining a sale of realty worth $15,000 under a deed of trust securing a note on which $2,500 was due, and directing reconveyance to plaintiff by defendant, as trustee, on payment of such sum only, without expenses of advertising the sale, trustee's and attorneys' fees, etc., affirmed, with damages for a frivolous appeal, in view of evidence that plaintiff did all she could to make a payment, on which she was alleged to be in default, in time, and that defendant obstructed her in so doing.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Suit by C. B. Stevens and wife against Gabriel Hines and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed, with damages for frivolous appeal.

Joseph E. Bien and Werner Olschewski, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment enjoining them from selling under a deed of trust certain real property owned by plaintiffs, and situated in the county of Sacramento, and also decreeing that the plaintiffs deposit in court the sum due to defendants upon a certain promissory note secured by said deed of trust, which sum was to be paid to defendants upon the reconveyance to the plaintiffs by defendant G. Hines, as trustee under said deed of trust, of said real property. The following facts appear from the record:

On December 5, 1915, respondents executed a note to the defendant P. C. Company for the principal sum of $3,750, payable in gold coin on December 31, 1917. This note bore interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable in gold coin on the last day of each month, in advance. Said promissory note was secured by a deed of trust of certain real property in Sacramento county. The defendant Gabriel Hines, an officer of the P. C. Company, was named as a trustee under said deed of trust. On October 23, 1917, the time for the payment of said promissory note was extended to and including October 31, 1921. Interest was to be payable monthly, in advance, at the rate of 8 per cent., and with each interest payment a payment of $25 was to be made upon the principal. All payments due upon the promissory note up to and including the payment due on July 31, 1921, were admitted by the defendants, and found by the court to have been made by plaintiffs, and accepted by the defendant P. C. Company. It is with reference to the payment of $41.50, due on August 31, 1921, including interest for one month in advance and $25 upon the principal, that the trouble arose.

On August 11, 1921, the plaintiff Bessie Stevens, acting for herself and for C. B. Stevens, wrote the defendant Hines from Saratoga Springs, New York, as follows:

"Enclosed find check for $41.50, and would like you to change my post office address from box 79 to P. O. box 966, S. F. Calif., which I have changed for a larger box, and oblige."

In this letter was inclosed a check payable to G. Hines for $41.50. The check was dated August 30, 1921, a day before the payment upon the note was due. This letter and check were delivered to Hines in due course of mail. Evidently he retained the same for a few days, for it was not until August 22, 1921, that he returned the check to Mrs. Stevens with the following letter:

"I return your check on the Crocker National Bank, dated August 30th, for $41.50, as post-dated checks for interest are not acceptable."

Upon the receipt of this letter by Mrs. Stevens on August 29, 1921, she went immediately to the Western Union Telegraph Company, and paid into that company $41.50 for transmission to Hines by telegraph. The Western Union Company issued its receipt to Mrs. Stevens as follows:

"August 29, 1921. Received from Bessie R. Stevens $41.50 to be paid to Gabriel Hines at P. C. Company, 718 Howard Building, Post and Grant St., subject to terms and conditions of money transfer of this date. Charges paid $2.50. R. McTerry, Transfer Agent."

The money was regularly transmitted, and, in response to notice from the Western Union Company, Gabriel Hines, on August 30, 1921, appeared at the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company with a written notice of transfer of money, and presented the same to the clerk. The clerk testified that she asked him for personal identification. The clerk's testimony as to the incident follows:

"The transfer required 'personal identification,' and I asked him from where it was coming. He said he did not know, and I asked him from whom he thought it was coming. He said he didn't know that. I said, 'Well, this is sent "Require personal identification," positive evidence that you are Gabriel Hines.' He says, 'I don't know how you are going to get it.' I says, 'Are you a stranger here,' and he says, 'I am not.' I says, 'Can you not get some business person to identify you,' and he did not say. He simply pulled out a check. He says, 'You can accept this or not, pay it on this identification or not,' and walked out. * * * I could not have paid him without identification. I would have paid him gold if requested. There was gold in the drawer at the time—something like $300."

Since Mr. Hines had declined to identify himself and receive the money, the same was returned to Mrs. Stevens in New York. She, in the meantime, had wired her father, James S. Morrow, who was in San Francisco, to go in and see Hines and pay the money if it had not been paid by the telegraph company. About September 2d or 3d Mr. Morrow called upon Hines. Morrow told Hines that he had received a wire to pay the amount due, and he offered to do so, but Hines replied that he would not receive the money. Mr. Morrow then stated to Hines that he understood Mrs. Stevens had wired the money, to which Hines replied that he had not received it. On September 6, 1921, Mrs. Stevens, upon learning that Hines had not received the money sent by telegraph, wired to him as follows:

"Just received canceled money order. Returning check. Please wire collect if satisfactory Western Union 16 Dey street."

In response, Mr. Hines sent the following message to Mrs. Stevens:

"I do not understand your telegram dated September sixth."

At the time Mr. Hines sent the foregoing illuminating telegram, Mrs. Stevens' property was being advertised for sale by him, but he evidently thought it unnecessary to mention that fact to Mrs. Stevens. On September 3, 1921, notice was published of a sale under the deed of trust for failure to pay the interest and principal due on August 31, 1921. The sale was advertised to take place on September 24, 1921, but before that time Mrs. Stevens, fortunately, arrived upon the scene, and by injunction of the superior court stopped the sale of the property.

The only issue upon the trial was whether or not the plaintiffs were in default under the deed of trust. They contended that they had made a valid tender of the amount due, and were not in default. The trial court found that on or about August 22, 1921, the plaintiffs tendered the amount due to the P. C. Company, and that upon August 30, 1921, plaintiffs again tendered the amount due to said defendant, and that on August 31, 1921, the tender was again made, and that the said defendant refused to accept the same; that the plaintiffs at the time of said tender and ever since have been ready, willing, and able to pay the amount due the defendant P. C. Company, and have deposited the said sum with the clerk of the court.

The finding as to the tender of August 22, 1921, was based upon the facts heretofore set out with relation to the check of Bessie Stevens. Appellants contend that a check is not legal tender of a debt payable in gold coin; that, even though the objection to the form of payment had been waived by the course of dealing between the parties and by the failure to object to the form of the tender, nevertheless the fact that the check was sent prior to August 22d and dated August 30th would destroy its efficacy as a tender of the amount due.

[1] The record contained evidence that all payments had been made by Mrs. Stevens by checks similar to the one sent for the last payment; that these checks had been received by Hines without objection, and promptly paid by the bank; that there were sufficient funds in the bank to pay the check in question; that no objection was made to the form of the tender. It is well settled as a general proposition that, where a tender by check is made and refused on grounds other than that it does not constitute an offer of lawful money, the person so refusing will be held to have waived the objection as to the form of the tender. 26 R. C. L. 628; McGrath v. Gegner, 77 Md. 331, 26 Atl. 502, 39 Am. St. Rep. 415; Moulton v. Kolodzik, 97 Minn. 423, 107 N. W. 154, 7 Ann. Cas. 1090; Bundy v. Wills, 88 Neb. 554, 130 N. W. 273, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 900; Schaeffer v. Coldren, 237 Pa. 77, 85 Atl. 98, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 175; Gunby v. Ingram, 57 Wash. 97, 106 Pac. 495, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 232; Moore v. Twin City Ice, etc., Co., 92 Wash. 608, 159 Pac. 779, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 540. The rule is statutory in this state. Civ. Code, § 1501.

[2] The statement of the facts herein made discloses that the tender was refused by Hines because the check was, as he states,

"postdated," and not because it was a check. This brings us to the next point. The trial court pointed out what seems obvious to any one except appellants, that the check offered was not postdated with respect to the obligation. The obligation accrued on August 31st; the check was dated August 30th. With respect to the obligation, the check was antedated. If appellants have anything to give them aid and comfort in the circumstances surrounding the tender of this check, it must arise from the fact that the check, payable on August 30th, was physically in the hands of Mr. Hines by August 22d, but by its terms was not applicable by him upon the debt until August 30th. Appellants are then reduced to the position of contending that Mrs. Stevens must, at her peril, determine accurately just when she should deposit her letter in the mails at New York in order to have it arrive at the office of the P. C. Company in San Francisco on August 31, 1921. Under such a condition Mrs. Stevens must suffer from an excess of caution. She stated that, due to the irregularity of the mails, she always sent her check in time to reach Hines before its date, although it was dated a day earlier than the obligation. But, says Hines, the check must be in my hands on the 31st, neither a day earlier nor later. The plaintiff must not protect herself against delays in the mail. On that matter she must take her chance. A mere statement of this position is sufficient to demonstrate its absurdity. Appellants seek to bolster it up by saying that the payment due on August 31st was composed of principal and interest; that, while a borrower might possibly send interest in advance of the due date, he might not force a creditor to accept a payment of principal a day before it was due. Conceding this to be true, Hines was not forced to cash the check on August 22d. He was not entitled to cash it before August 30th by its very terms. It would be a distressing state of affairs, indeed, if the effort of Mrs. Stevens to insure the arrival of the check in ample time, resulting in its coming into the possession of Hines before it was actually due and before it could properly be cashed by him, should be fraught with such serious consequences to her property rights as the appellant is here contending for.

Furthermore, there is also ample evidence in the record that in the instance under consideration Mrs. Stevens followed exactly the same practice as she had on numerous other occasions without objection from Hines. She testified that she had always sent her checks a week or so in advance of the time when they were due, and had dated them the day before the money was due and payable; that no objection had ever been made to this practice until the last payment was sought to be made. The evidence of the canceled checks in the record is that such checks were, on several occasions, cashed when they were received, and before their actual date, and before the date when they were due. True, appellants make the point that, as to such checks, the indorsement thereon was not by Hines, personally, but by his attorney, and that, while the attorney had authority to endorse checks for Hines, he did not have authority to accept and cash postdated checks. This contention, however, is of no significance whatever, even though we concede it to be based upon facts, for the reason that the checks are not postdated with respect to the obligation. If they had been, there might have been a different question presented.

[3] We are of the opinion that the finding of the trial court that a valid tender was made on or about August 22, 1921, is proper because all objections which might have been urged to such tender had been waived by the course of dealing between the parties, and by the failure of the defendant Hines to object to the form of the tender. But, even if every possible technical objection of the appellants were sustained to said tender of August 22, 1921, the judgment is warranted by the finding that a tender was made on August 30, 1921, and refused by P. C. Company. The ingenious attack of appellants upon this finding is that, because the Western Union Telegraph Company asked Mr. Hines to identify himself as a condition of paying the money over to him, this made the offer a conditional tender, insufficient under our Code. It would follow from this contention that the Western Union Telegraph Company would be forced to pay Mrs. Stevens' money to any one who presented himself, without any identification whatsoever, in order not to invalidate the tender. Mrs. Stevens would be in rather a difficult situation under this theory. Her money might be paid to an imposter, and she, relying upon such payment, would allow the due date to pass, and find, to her sorrow, that the P. C. Company had not actually been paid. Had she sent gold coin by the American Express Company, by the same reasoning, that company, if it did not wish to invalidate the tender, must not ask for identification before paying the money over, but must take a chance of paying the gold coin to the wrong person, thus, again, putting Mrs. Stevens in default. Indeed, if we adopt appellants' reasoning, there was no possible way for Mrs. Stevens to save her property by anything she might do in the way of payment of her obligations after she left the state. She might not send a check payable to the company early enough to insure its arrival in ample time despite delays in mail; she might not send money by telegraph, nor gold by express, and require identification, but she must order her money to be paid at random, relying upon chance that it be paid to the proper party, and, if chance failed her, she forfeited her property.

[4] That this position should be taken by appellants is not so surprising after a review of the entire record. "Out of the fullness of the heart, the mouth speaketh," and it is obvious that the desire and effort of Hines was to place Mrs. Stevens in a position where she must have her property sold regardless of how she acted. Out of such a desire and effort grows the contention that the effort has been successful. Two things are clear from the record before us: First, that Mrs. Stevens did everything she could possibly do to make this payment in time, that she desired to make the payment, and was able to do so, and was diligent about doing so; second, that Hines was equally diligent to obstruct her in accomplishing her object.

We had occasion to remark at the oral argument of this cause that no more reprehensible conduct than that of the defendant Hines has ever come to the attention of this court in a civil case. The evidence shows that the property involved was of the value of $15,000. There was $2,500 due upon the promissory note secured by the deed of trust. Appellants were forced to admit that plaintiffs were entitled to redeem their property by paying the full amount due under the deed of trust, but, they contend that, because of the resourcefulness of Mr. Hines, there has become due and payable under said deed of trust, in addition to the interest and principal upon the note, expenses of advertising the sale, trustee's fees, attorney's fees, etc., all of which they ask this court to award to them against Mrs. Stevens. The principle invoked, we suppose, is that those who are extremely diligent upon their own behalf, regardless of the nature of their activities, should reap a reward.

Our reply to this contention of the appellants is: The plaintiffs appealed to a court of equity for a distinctly equitable remedy against the bad faith of the defendants. The defendants came into that court to present a most technical defense with most unclean hands. The trial court promptly and properly decided against the defendants. They have now brought this appeal to this court without justification of either law or equity. The record in this case is one to bring the law into disrepute among fair-minded citizens. The plaintiffs have been subjected to the delay and annoyance of an appeal, the title to their property has been clouded, and its merchantability destroyed for a considerable period of time. They have incurred attorney's fees and costs for printing brief, etc., upon this appeal. Mildly characterized, the appeal is frivolous. We affirm the judgment, with the addition of $250 to be recovered by the plaintiffs against Gabriel Hines and P. C. Company as damages for a frivolous appeal.

Petition of FURNESS et al. (Civ. 4058.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 3, 1923.)

1. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 485—Decree may be attacked collaterally only when it appears void on its face.

A decree may be successfully attacked collaterally only when it appears to be void upon its face.

2. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 485—Court may look to judgment roll only to determine whether decree is void on face.

To decide whether a decree is void upon its face, the court may consider the judgment roll only, which, when defendant has defaulted, ordinarily includes, under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, the complaint, summons, affidavit of service, memorandum of defendant's default indorsed on the complaint, and the judgment.

3. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 489—May be attacked and vacated any time lack of jurisdiction appears upon face of record.

Where lack of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the record, the judgment may be attacked collaterally, and it may be vacated at any time.

4. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 485 — Petitioner attacking decree void on face need not excuse himself for negligence in not asserting his claim.

In attacking a decree based upon an application to have land registered under the Torrens Title Act, and void upon its face, petitioner held not required to excuse himself for negligence in not asserting his claim; the fact that he failed to answer the application, in the absence of other facts creating an estoppel, being immaterial.

5. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 485—Description in application to have land registered and in supplemental decree held to refer to different property and decree void on face.

Description in application to have land registered and in supplemental decree held to differ so materially as to indicate they referred substantially to different pieces of property, and hence decree was void on its face and subject to collateral attack.

6. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 252(5)—Prayer for general relief does not confer jurisdiction beyond issues stated in complaint.

The prayer for general relief does not confer jurisdiction to determine matters beyond the issues stated in the complaint.

7. Records $\Leftrightarrow$ 9(10½)—Decree under Torrens Act, adjudicating title to land other than that presented by application, is void.

The purpose of a proceeding under the Torrens Title Act is to adjudicate title to specific land, and one of the essential issues is the identity and description of the property; hence, where the descriptions in the application and decree are so dissimilar as to establish a marked difference, it cannot be said that the decree adjudicating title to the land described in it has passed upon an issue presented by the application.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Proceeding by Frank Furness and others, for registration of land under the Torrens Title Act, in which proceeding Edgar J. Sharpless filed a petition to have a supplemental decree vacated. From an order granting a motion to dismiss, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Frederick W. Smith and D. L. Di Vecchio, both of Los Angeles, and G. Randolph Miller, of Whittier, for appellant.

W. T. Craig and Ronald H. Loenholm, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This appeal is taken under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is from an order of the superior court dismissing the amended petition of Edgar J. Sharpless to set aside the supplemental decree rendered by that court in this proceeding. The original petition of Frank Furness et al. for registration of their lands under the Torrens Title Act (St. 1915, p. 1932) was filed June 26, 1919. It contained a number of applications, among which was that of Sylvester W. Barton and Lelia Adelaid Barton, his wife, which sets forth that they have had actual, adverse, exclusive possession of certain land, and prays for a decree determining the title thereto to be in themselves. The premises therein described are as follows:

"One separate parcel of land described as commencing at the northeasterly corner of lot 1 of the subdivision of lot 19 of Gunn and Hazard's plat of the Cullen tract, in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, as per map recorded in book 42, p. 28, of Miscellaneous Records, in the office of the recorder of said county; thence north 39° 41' east 181.2 feet; thence south 55° 30' east 556.2 feet; thence south 39° 41' west 623.8 feet; thence north 51° 40' west 556.9 feet; thence north 39° 41' east 393.2 feet to the point of beginning. Reserving therefrom those portions within the bounds of public roads."

The application also makes the following representations concerning the adjoining landowners:

"A. Northerly: County of Los Angeles for public road purposes. Southerly: B. Sharpless, Whittier, Cal. Easterly: E. J. Sharpless, Whittier, Cal. Westerly: County of Los Angeles for public road purposes."

A copy of this application was served personally upon Edgar J. Sharpless. Subsequently, and on June 30, 1920, the trial court rendered a supplemental decree adjudging Sylvester W. Barton and Lelia Adelaid Barton to be the owners of land described as follows:

"A. One separate parcel of land being that portion of lot 19 and of that tract marked '17

40/100' as both are shown on map of resurvey of Gunn and Hazzard's plat of the Cullen tract, county of Los Angeles, state of California, in book 34, p. 64, of Miscellaneous Records, in the office of the recorder of said county, described as commencing at the intersection of the center line of the Los Angeles and Santa Ana road, as said road is shown on county surveyor's map No. 7239 (on file in the office of the county surveyor Los Angeles county) with the northeasterly prolongation of the northwesterly line of said lot 19; thence south 55° 05' east along the center line of said Los Angeles and Santa Ana Road, 298.00 feet; thence south 57° 13' 45" east along the center line of said road, 261.03 feet; thence south 39° 09' west 623.57 feet; thence north 52° 12' west 556.90 feet to a point in the northwesterly line of said lot 19; thence north 39° 09' east along the said northwesterly line of lot 19 and the northeasterly prolongation of said line 585.55 feet to the point of beginning. Reserving therefrom a strip of land 30 feet in width along the northwesterly side thereof and a strip of land 20 feet in width along the northwesterly side thereof for public road purposes."

July 1, 1921, Edgar J. Sharpless filed a petition asking that the supplemental decree be vacated and set aside. A demurrer interposed by Sylvester W. and Lelia Adelaïd Barton was sustained. After this, an amended petition was filed by Sharpless which alleged:

"That the land described in said supplemental decree is not capable of being identified as the land described in said application No. 13a, and in fact and in truth is not the land described in said application; that the description as given in said supplemental decree does not conform to the county surveyor's report made and filed in said action; that in the description given in said supplemental decree two distances exceed those in the petition; that the said land described in said supplemental decree includes and covers land belonging to the petitioner herein."

The petition then asked that the supplemental decree be set aside upon the legal grounds of lack of jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the premises described and of the person of the petitioner. Thereupon the respondents moved to dismiss the amended petition. The trial court granted the motion, and from the order so made Sharpless appeals.

[1, 2] It is said that the petition to vacate the supplemental decree is collateral in its nature. If so, such an attack will be successful only where the decree appears to be void upon its face. To decide whether or not the decree is so void upon its face, the court may consider the judgment roll only. Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301. Where the defendant has defaulted, the judgment roll ordinarily includes the complaint, summons, affidavit of service, memorandum of default of defendant indorsed on the complaint, and the judgment. Section 670, Code Civ. Proc.

[3, 4] Where lack of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the record the judgment may be attacked collaterally (Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732), and it may be vacated at any time (Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 422¹). Respondent argues that for the petition to set aside the supplemental decree to state a cause of action in favor of Sharpless it must not only allege that he is the owner of land included in said decree, but it must further be made to appear that the land described by the decree and so belonging to petitioner was not described in the application. Where the decree is void upon its face, no reason is suggested for holding that it must be shown that the land of the petitioner described in the decree was not also included in the application. In attacking a decree void upon its face, the petitioner is not required to excuse himself for negligence in not asserting his claim. The fact that he failed to answer the application, where no other facts are involved creating an estoppel, is immaterial.

[5] But, without considering the maps, we think the description in the application and supplemental decree differ so clearly and materially as to indicate that they refer to substantially different pieces of property. The descriptions begin at different points. They do not agree as to a single call; the directions are not always the same; in only one instance do they coincide as to distances; the calculation of the distances, calls, and directions shows the lines of the two lots to be more than 1,100 feet apart. To uphold a decree under such circumstances would be equivalent to ruling that it may affirm the applicant's title to any land, whether described in the application or not.

[6, 7] Respondent claims that the prayer for general relief contained in the application gave the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit; hence, that, under the rule stated in Fox v. Hall and other cases cited, the supplemental decree is not void upon its face or susceptible to collateral attack. The cases mentioned only hold that a prayer for general relief authorizes the court to grant any relief within the issues presented by the allegations of the complaint; it does not confer jurisdiction to determine matters beyond the issues stated in the complaint. This is especially true where, as in the instant proceeding, there is no answer. Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 57 Pac. 1012. The purpose of the proceeding under the Torrens Title Act is to adjudicate title to specific land. One of the essential issues is the identity and description of the property. Where the descriptions in the application and decree not only do not so correspond as to indicate that they refer to the same premises, but are so dissimilar as to establish a marked difference, it cannot be said that the decree adjudicating title to land described in it has passed upon an issue presented by the application. In such an instance, which is the case here, the decree, having adjudicated title to property by a different description than that named in the application, is void. The appellant had no notice that the court would hear evidence concerning any other property than that described in the application. It cannot be said that a prayer for general relief authorizes the adjudication by the court of the title to property other than that mentioned and described by the applicant merely because it appears to be owned by the same person who petitioned for a decree under the Torrens Title Act, or perhaps includes some of the land named in the application. In re Sackett, 53 Cal. App. 592, 200 Pac. 742, is pointed to by respondent as a case almost exactly similar to the one under consideration. The following excerpt from the opinion in the decision cited is sufficient to point out the utter dissimilarity of the issues involved in the two cases: "The description contained in the decree and certificate were the same as in the petition and notice."

We conclude that the trial court should have granted a petition to vacate the supplemental decree. In order that this may be done the order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE, by WEBB, Atty. Gen., v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 4173.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 7, 1923. Rehearing Denied Aug. 1, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 5, 1923.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞657(6) — City council's determination of public interest or convenience in vacating street held conclusive in absence of fraud.

In passing an ordinance vacating part of a public city street on petition by an abutting owner, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the city council's decision of what constitutes public interest or convenience within St. 1889, p. 70, is legislative in character, and is generally conclusive.

2. Municipal corporations ☞657(6) — Facts held to constitute legal fraud by city council in vacating a portion of a city street to a motion picture corporation, permitting judicial review of the ordinance.

Where a city council, on petition of a motion picture corporation owning all abutting property, passed an ordinance vacating part of a city street in a well built-up and improved location, and disregarding the city engineer's adverse report placing the value at $7,000, demanded payment in advance of $1,000 as an exaction from the corporation for the vacation, the gross abuse of discretion disclosed amounts to a legal fraud, notwithstanding recitals in the ordinance, and the council's action is not conclusive on the courts, in view of St. 1889, p. 70, requiring such ordinances to be passed for the public benefit and convenience.

3. Injunction ☞114(2)—Attorney General can sue in name of people to enjoin enforcement of void ordinance vacating city street.

The Attorney General has authority to maintain an action in the name of the people to enjoin the enforcement of a void ordinance vacating a portion of a city street.

On Rehearing.

4. Municipal corporations ☞657(4)—Protests against ordinance vacating street must be filed after passage of ordinance of intention.

Under St. 1889, p. 70, protest must be filed after passage of ordinance of intention to vacate street and notice of public work is posted by the superintendent of streets.

5. Municipal corporations ☞657(5)—Adoption of ordinance vacating street is determination that public interest requires vacation.

Although a final ordinance vacating a street contains no declaration that the public interest or convenience requires that the street be closed, yet the adoption of the ordinance is itself a determination by the council that the public interest or convenience requires the vacation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the People, by U. S. Webb, Attorney General, against the City of Los Angeles and another. From a judgment of the superior court declaring void an ordinance, and from an order denying defendant's motion to strike certain portions of the complaint and to dismiss the complaint, defendants appeal, and, from an order denying its application for a preliminary injunction plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Albert J. Sherer and Robert Young, both of Los Angeles, for plaintiff, respondent and appellant.

James, Pace & Smith, of Los Angeles, for defendant and appellant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation.

HOUSER, J. In the main this is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment declaring void an ordinance adopted by the city council of the city of Los Angeles which ordered the vacation of that part of Argyle avenue lying between Sunset boulevard and Selma avenue, a distance of 573.3 feet. This appeal further involves an order by the trial court denying defendant's motion to strike certain portions of the complaint as well as to dismiss the complaint because improperly authorized by the Attorney General; also an appeal by the plaintiff from the order denying plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction.

Argyle avenue is 60 feet in width and 1,210 feet long. It extends from Hollywood boulevard on the north to Sunset boulevard on the south. At a distance of 573.3 feet northerly from Sunset boulevard Argyle avenue is intersected by Selma avenue, running east and west. At about 375 feet to the west and parallel to Argyle avenue is located a through street, and the same condition prevails as to another street at about the same distance to the east of Argyle avenue. The defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation owns all the property fronting on either side of that part of Argyle avenue which was ordered vacated by the ordinance in question. The street was originally acquired by condemnation proceedings in 1906, since which time it has been improved by grading and surfacing the roadway, by cement gutters, curbs, and sidewalks, and by shade trees planted and maintained on the parkways adjoining the sidewalks. The evidence taken at the trial showed that at the time the ordinance of vacation was adopted the lots fronting on Argyle avenue, as well as the neighborhood immediately adjacent thereto, were closely built up with residences and other structures, and that the street, although not a "main artery" of traffic, was continuously used by the public for general travel on the sidewalks and the roadway in the same manner as similar streets are ordinarily used in a thickly populated suburban district, excepting, perhaps, that the street was used for parking automobiles to a considerably greater extent than is the ordinary short street in a residence district.

On November 6, 1919, the defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation presented its petition to the city council of the city of Los Angeles, praying that a part of the street be vacated. The body of the petition is as follows:

"The undersigned, being the owner of all of the abutting property, petition your honorable body to vacate that portion of Argyle avenue in that portion of Los Angeles formerly known as Hollywood extending from Selma street to Sunset boulevard. The undersigned represent that this is not a thoroughfare in any sense, and that they are willing to compensate the city for this land on a fair and equitable basis."

The petition was first referred to the city engineer of the city of Los Angeles, who reported adversely to the proposed vacation, on the ground that the street was extensively used by the general public. He further reported that the area proposed to be vacated was reasonably worth the sum of $7,839.30, and recommended that, if the street should be vacated, the petitioner be compelled to pay into the city treasury "such compensation as it deemed just." Thereafter the city council referred the petition to its committee on public works, which committee reported and recommended, among other things, as follows:

"We have been informed that there is very little traffic on Argyle (avenue) between Sunset boulevard and Selma avenue, the portion proposed to be vacated, and most of this traffic is due to the Lasky Motion Picture Corporation. We therefore recommend, subject to your approval, that the prayer of the petitioners be granted and the street vacated, providing petitioners comply with the provisions of Ordinance No. 17801, N. S., and the public service department is compensated for the expense of connecting two fire hydrants, and the petitioners furnish easements for such public utilities as are affected, particularly gas mains and poles for the Southern California Edison Company and the Telephone Company, and with the further understanding that the petitioners shall pay into the city treasury before the publication of the final ordinance the sum of $1,000 for the street vacated."

In other words, the city's demand was that, before the final ordinance of vacation would be enacted, the petitioner must pay all actual expenses in connection with the closing of the street, and in addition thereto must pay into the city treasury the sum of $1,000 "for the street vacated."

With the exception of two motion picture concerns, protests against the proposed vacation of the street were filed with the city council by the owners of all the lots within a district provided by order of the city council as appears in its ordinance of intention to vacate the street, which protests the said council denied, and, two days after the $1,000 compensation for the street had been paid into the city treasury, proceeded to adopt the necessary ordinance of vacation of the street as prayed for in the petition of the defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. The final ordinance of vacation of the street contained no declaration or provision, either in substance or effect, that the public interest or convenience of the city of Los Angeles, or of the inhabitants thereof, either required or justified the vacation of the street; but the ordinance did contain a provision that "there are no damages, costs, or expenses arising out of said work, and that no assessment is necessary for said work, and therefore no commissioners are appointed to assess benefits and damages for said work and to have general supervision thereof." The ordinance of intention, however, did state, among other things, that the public interest, necessity, and convenience required the closing of the said street. There is nothing in the act (St. 1889, p. 70), under which the city of Los Angeles acquired power in the premises, which requires any declaration by the ordinance of intention that the vacation or abandonment of a street is required by the public interest or convenience. Besides, such declaration and determination by the city council in the instant case was made before any protest was even filed, and, of necessity, before any hearing was had thereon. In other words, the city council determined the case without having first heard the evidence, and, after hearing the evidence, so far as any record or official action discloses, failed to determine that "the public interest or convenience" required the "closing up" of the street in accordance with the provisions of the first section of the statute.

Among the findings of the trial court the following appears, to wit:

"That in passing said Ordinance No. 40671, New Series [the final ordinance], the city council was moved thereto by the payment and receipt from the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation of the aforesaid sum of $1,000 for the land vacated, which said sum of $1,000 was paid into the city treasury of the city of Los Angeles by the said Famous Players-Lasky Corporation on the 10th day of August, 1920, and prior to the passage and publication of said ordinance."

The court also found:

"That the said Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, in the payment of said money, understood that the same was paid and received as an exaction which the city council required for the street vacated and for the land occupied by such vacated street; and * * * with respect to the payment of said $1,000, the said Famous Players-Lasky Corporation understood that the said portion of Argyle avenue would not be vacated unless it paid the said sum into the treasury of the city of Los Angeles; and, in that particular, the said Famous Players-Lasky Corporation had no free choice or means of avoiding said payment in obtaining the vacation of said portion of Argyle avenue," and that "neither the public necessity nor interest nor convenience required the abandonment of said portion of Argyle avenue, and that the public derived no benefit therefrom."

To put the matter bluntly, on the evidence adduced the finding of the court was to the effect that, without the interest or convenience of the public being considered in any way, the city council sold a public street to the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation for a consideration of $1,000. While the actual intention of the parties to the transaction was probably not as broad as indicated, the substance of the negotiations was that the defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation offered "to compensate the city for this land on a fair and equitable basis," and the city, through its council, fixed the compensation at $1,000, and required the payment of that sum before it would pass the necessary ordinance. Casting aside any consideration of public interest, the city demanded the sum of $1,000 for the passage of the final ordinance, and required that the money be paid in advance. The moving picture concern had offered "to compensate the city for this land on a fair and equitable basis," and the city engineer had appraised the property as being of the reasonable value of $7,839.30. Why not demand what it was worth, or $10,000, or $20,000? As appears by the final ordinance, the city incurred no expense in connection with the closing of the street. If the closing of the street was for the public benefit, why require $1,000 as "compensation" when the city actually had nothing to sell? If the demand for $1,000 was not a "holdup," it was so closely akin thereto as not to disclose any substantial difference between ordinary "transactions" of that nature and the circumstances here involved. It is perfectly apparent that the street would not have been vacated, public interest, or not, if the $1,000 had not been paid. The transaction bears all the indicia of a bargain and sale. If the payment of the $1,000 was not the entire "moving cause" for the abandonment of the street, it was at least part and parcel of it.

[1] The statute to which reference has heretofore been made authorizes the vacation of a public street only "whenever the public interest or convenience may require." It appears to be conceded by counsel for the respective parties herein, and the authorities are quite uniform, that, as a general legal proposition, in the absense of fraud or collusion, the decision by the city council of what constitutes public interest or convenience in a matter of the sort here in question is legislative in character, and that a determination by the city council of such a question is conclusive. Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224; Wulzen v. Board, 101 Cal. 15, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; Symons v. San Francisco, 115 Cal. 555, 42 Pac. 913, 47 Pac. 453; Brown v. Board, 124 Cal. 274, 57 Pac. 82; Pool v. Simmons, 134 Cal. 624, 66 Pac. 872. According to the evidence and the findings by the court in this case, there was no such thing as the public interest or convenience of the public taken into consideration by the city council. So far as the record discloses, the only concern of the city council was the $1,000 compensation and the benefit and advantage of a private motion picture corporation. There are many cases bearing on the right of the courts to inquire into the motives of the legislative body in a case of this nature. In Albes v. Southern Ry. Co. (1909) 164 Ala. 356, 51 South. 327, where a street was vacated on condition that the railroad company which received the benefit thereof would construct a depot on a part of the land which it received; in People v. Wieboldt, 233 Ill. 572, 84 N. E. 646, where an alley was vacated on the payment to the city by the beneficiary of the sum of $100 annually and the performance by the beneficiary of certain other acts, including the paving of a certain portion of a street and the dedication of certain other property for public use; in Island Co. v. Babcock, 17 Wash. 438, 50 Pac. 54, where a county board located and built a county courthouse on certain property under an agreement with certain persons that, if so built, the land upon which the courthouse was constructed would be paid for by such persons; and in each of the following cited cases where similar legislative acts were adopted for the benefit of private persons, to wit: Tilly v. Mitchell & Lewis Co., 121 Wis. 1, 98 N. W. 969, 105 Am. St. Rep. 1007; Knapp Stout & Co. Company v. St. Louis, 156 Mo. 343, 56 S. W. 1102; Glasgow v. St. Louis, 107 Mo. 198, 17 S. W. 743; Spitzer v. Runyan, 113 Iowa, 619, 85 N. W. 782; Windle v. City of Valparaiso, 62 Ind. App. 342, 113 N. E. 429; Ponishil v. Hoquiam Sash & Door Co., 41 Wash. 303, 83 Pac. 316; City of Marshalltown v. Forney, 61 Iowa, 578, 16 N. W. 740—it was held that the courts had no power to inquire into the motives which induced the enactment of the questioned ordinance. As distinguished from the "motive," and depending entirely upon the "purpose," or the "result" of a legislative act, where the intent of the legislative body, as shown by the evidence, was to disregard the public interest or convenience and to confer a benefit upon a private individual or a corporate body, the following cases are to the effect that the court has authority to review the matter and determine the validity of the ordinance: Kansas City v. Hyde, 196 Mo. 498, 96 S. W. 201, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 639, 113 Am. St. Rep. 766; Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 35 N. E. 141, 22 L. R. A. 393; Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46, 28 N. E. 934, 32 Am. St. Rep. 179; Corcoran v. Railway Co., 149 Ill. 291, 37 N. E. 68; DeLand v. Dixon Power & Lighting Co., 225 Ill. 212, 80 N. E. 125; Horton v. Williams, 99 Mich. 423, 58 N. W. 369; Van Witsen v. Gutman, 79 Md. 405, 29 Atl. 608, 24 L. R. A. 403; Louisville v. Ban-non, 99 Ky. 74, 35 S. W. 120.

The case of Kansas City v. Hyde, 196 Mo. 498, 96 S. W. 201, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 639, 113 Am. St. Rep. 766, was one where it appeared, not on the face of the proceedings, but by evidence entirely outside the record of the legislative act, that the purpose was to condemn a street for the use of the railroad company. Among other things, the court said:

"The law deals with results and not with mere forms in such matters. * * * The purpose for which a thing is done is very different from the motives which may have actuated those by whom it is done, and is * * * a legitimate subject of judicial investigation, for the right to exercise the power of eminent domain is in all cases limited by the purpose for which it shall be exercised—as thus, private property may be condemned for public use, but it may be shown that the use in fact is not public, but private."

Later in the opinion the court said:

"But suppose the council, intending the condemnation to be really for the sole benefit of the individual, in order to give it validity, should say in the ordinance that the property was to be condemned for a public street; would such a false recital in the ordinance be conclusive? Would it put the man whose property was to be taken, and the people in the district who were to be taxed to pay for it, beyond the protection of the constitutional guaranty that their property should not be taken for private use? Could the city council, by a false recital in the ordinance, give it a validity which it would not have if it recited the truth? And when the city comes to ask the aid of the court to carry the ordinance into effect, is it possible that the court must be a mere tool to do the will of the council, with no power to inquire into the truth of the matter? What protection has a citizen for his constitutional rights if the courts cannot look through a sham and see the truth? And how can the courts learn the truth if they must take the recitals in the ordinance as conclusive and reject all evidence to show their untruth? What a reproach it would be to our system of jurisprudence and how humiliating would be the attitude of our courts if they were so powerless! But our law is not so lame, and our courts not so impotent. The courts in such case will hear the evidence and find the facts. If the truth lies only in an unwritten agreement or understanding, it can be proven only by oral testimony, and that being the best evidence of which the fact is susceptible the court must receive it and weigh it."

It is said in Horton v. Williams, 99 Mich. 423, 58 N. W. 369, that—

"The advantage which the public derives from the discontinuance of a way must arise from the vacation itself, rather than from the use to which the property is put, or from the fact that the city, through a deal with the individual specially interested, is to have an interest in the property acquired by such vacation. A city cannot barter away streets and alleys, nor can it do indirectly, by invoking its power of vacating ways, what it cannot do directly. Streets and alleys are not to be vacated at the instance of individuals interested only in the acquisition of the vacated property, and the exercise of legislative discretion in such matters must, at least upon the face of the record, be free from affirmative evidence that such discretion was invoked for individual gain, and its exercise influenced by an offer to divide the property acquired."

Treating of the subject having to do with supervision by the courts of legislative acts by city councils, McQuillan, in his work on Municipal Ordinances (volume 1, § 378, p. 881) says:

"While the rule of non judicial interference in the respects mentioned is well established, certain limitations are recognized. Municipal corporations are not completely beyond judicial review and control, even in the exercise of the jurisdiction and discretion delegated to them by the Legislature. True, that discretion must and will be accorded broad scope and great deference. The honest judgment of municipal authorities as to what is promotive of the public welfare must ordinarily control, although not in accord with the views of the courts. Nevertheless the delegation of legislative power to subordinate political divisions of the state is solely for public purposes, and must be exercised with reference to them. If the act be so remote from every such purpose that no relation thereto can within human reason be discovered, such act must be deemed excluded from the delegation. To that extent, then, courts will inquire into the purpose and policy of municipal conduct, and will hold unauthorized and invalid acts which are wholly unreasonable."

In volume 3, § 1403, on page 2985, the same author says:

"There are three rules often declared in the decisions in regard to the purpose and motive for vacating a street and the power of the courts to investigate the motives or interfere with the discretion of municipal authorities in regard thereto. The first rule is that a street or alley cannot be vacated for a private use, that is, for the purpose of devoting it to the exclusive use and benefit of a private person or corporation, but it may only be vacated to promote the public welfare. Thus, there is no power, it is generally held, to vacate a street or alley on payment of a cash consideration by an abutter."

Further dealing with the subject, Mr. McQuillan, after stating the general rule that the motives of the municipal authorities cannot be inquired into by the courts, says the courts "may consider the purpose accomplished and, if the purpose effected thereby is illegal, as where a street is vacated for the sole purpose of benefiting abutters, may set it aside." And on page 2989 he adds:

"Other courts proceed on the theory that while the common council has discretion to determine when private property shall be taken for public use and such discretion is final and exempt from the control of the courts, yet it is the duty of the judiciary to decide whether the use for which the property is taken by vacating a street or alley is public or private, and, if the use is a private one, to declare the ordinance invalid."

The case of Van Witsen v. Gutman, 79 Md. 405, 29 Atl. 608, 24 L. R. A. 403, contains the statement that—

"Whether the use is public or private is a question for the judiciary to decide. * * * Where * * * ordinances are drawn in question, it is the duty of the judiciary to decide whether the use for which private property is taken is public or private, in the same manner and on the same principles as it would decide in the case of an act of the state Legislature."

Based on the evidence on this particular point, the court found:

"That neither the public necessity nor interest nor convenience required the abandonment of such portion of Argyle avenue, and that the public derived no benefit therefrom."

[2] The defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, in its petition to the city council praying for the vacation of the street, offered "to compensate the city for this land on a fair and equitable basis." The recommendation to the city council by its committee on public works was, among other things, "that the petitioner shall pay into the city treasury before the publication of the final ordinance the sum of $1,000 for the street vacated." The affidavits of the several councilmen who voted for the passage of the ordinance which effected the vacation of the street, and which affidavits were used only on the motion by plaintiff for a preliminary injunction (and which can be considered here only in connection with the appeal from the order denying the preliminary injunction), show that the purpose of vacating the street was "to foster and promote the motion picture industry in the city of Los Angeles as a whole, and not this defendant in particular, and to encourage the maintenance and building up of said industry by its co-operation through said action as a precedent to maintain the said industries in the city of Los Angeles, and thereby to enable the city to retain its prestige as the motion picture center of the world, and also for the mutual benefit and advantage of the city and its inhabitants and the said motion-picture industries," and "because all of the 375-foot blocks fronting on Sunset boulevard must eventually, to accommodate the growth and expansion of the motion picture industries upon said boulevard, be made into 800-foot blocks by the vacation of intersecting streets between Sunset boulevard and Selma avenue"; furthermore, that "the vacation of said portion of said Argyle avenue would not work any injury or any inconvenience to them (protestants) but would, on the other hand, tend to induce the motion picture industries in Hollywood and elsewhere to expand their business, enlarge their establishments, and thus enable the city not only to hold these establishments as a permanent asset of the city, but benefit the inhabitants of the city in many business ways and at the same time help make the city a great as it is a growing city of industry and commerce." The statute (1889, p. 70) which is the basic authority for the vacation of public streets contains a provision for the ascertainment of expenses, damages, etc., in connection with the vacation of a given street, and the levying of an assessment for the payment thereof; but in the instant case it appears by the final ordinance of vacation "that there are no damages, costs, or expenses arising out of said work, and that no assessment is necessary for said work"—again supplying the inference, at least, that the entire scheme was one for the sole benefit of the defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. The evidence showed that no public benefit whatsoever accrued or was expected to accrue, from the closing of the street. So far as the record discloses, nothing was contemplated by the city council in the way of a systematic rearrangement of public streets, or the construction of any public improvement, or the platting of any public park, or anything of a similar character, which would either necessitate, or render advisable, the vacation of the street. The effect of the abandonment of the street was to take from the public whatever advantage or convenience the use of a well-kept street afforded, and to substitute nothing of a public nature in its place.

Negating the provisions of the statute, neither the public interest nor public convenience required or in any manner necessitated or suggested the closing of the street; on the contrary, every reasonable consideration would indicate that it was altogether to the advantage and benefit of the general public that the street should remain open to public use. It follows that the only interest or convenience subserved by the act of the city council in ordering the vacation of the street was the private interest of the defendant Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. In such circumstances the precedents heretofore cited are ample authority for the action of the lower court not only in maintaining its right to inquire into the real purpose and the result of the ordinance, but in declaring such ordinance invalid. Any other rule would permit the city council to legally close any or even all the principal streets of a city. For instance, if we were to assume the true rule to be that, upon the mere recital in the ordinance of abandonment that the public interest or convenience so required, the decision by the city council, as expressed in its ordinance becomes final and conclusive, and beyond the reach of judicial inquiry, nothing would prevent the city council of the city of Los Angeles from effectually closing Broadway in its entire length, nor a similar body in the city of New York from closing Wall street. It cannot be that in such circumstances, coupled with a showing, such as here, that the whole scheme was simply one in the proposed aid of a private concern, and against real public interest and convenience, the courts would be powerless to render adequate relief and substantial justice. The rights of the public cannot be overwhelmed and defeated by any such subterfuge; they cannot be made to depend upon the exercise of either individual whims or fancies of members of the city council expressed through the medium of a legislative body. It is essentially a judicial question whether the vacation of a street be for a public or for a private benefit. Otherwise the will of the city council as expressed in its ordinance of vacation, through the simple expedient of declaring such vacation to be a public benefit, would become supreme, no matter how arbitrary such action nor how great the abuse of discretion so exercised. New Central Coal Co. v. George's C., C. & I. Co., 37 Md. 560. Legal fraud may consist in a gross abuse of discretion, and the facts in the instant case indicate at least such gross abuse. That in such circumstances the act of the city council in vacating the street in question is not conclusive upon the courts, see Ellis v.

Commissioners, 38 Cal. 629; and the same principle of law is announced in the following cases: Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 24, 148 Pac. 217, L. R. A. 1918E, 197; La Grange, etc., Co. v. Carter, 142 Cal. 560, 76 Pac. 241.

By far the greater part of that portion of the appeal herein which involves the order by the trial court denying defendant's motion to strike certain portions of the complaint is disposed of by what has been said heretofore upon the question of the right of the court to inquire into the power of the city council in passing the ordinance of abandonment of the street in question. Such portions of the motion to strike as are not so covered, while possibly not necessary allegations of the complaint, were harmless as affecting the main issue.

[3] That appellant's motion to dismiss the complaint for the alleged reason that the plaintiff was improperly and unlawfully authorized by the attorney general was not well taken is settled by the rulings in the following cases: People v. Beaudry, 91 Cal. 213, 27 Pac. 610; People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 388; People v. Gold Run D. & M. Co., 66 Cal. 152, 4 Pac. 1152, 56 Am. Rep. 80; People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 437; People v. Blake, 60 Cal. 497; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. 474, 15 Am. St. Rep. 22; People v. Hibernia Savings, etc., Society, 84 Cal. 634, 24 Pac. 295; People v. Oakland, etc., Co., 118 Cal. 234, 50 Pac. 305.

By reason of the decision herein that plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded in the complaint, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon plaintiff's appeal from the order of the trial court denying the application for a preliminary injunction.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

PER CURIAM. [4, 5] In the petition for rehearing herein it appears that objection is taken by appellants to the statement contained in the opinion to the effect that the determination by the city council as to the question of public interest and convenience requiring the closing of the street was made before any protest was filed, and necessarily before any hearing was had thereon. The facts are that, after the petition for vacating the street was presented, and before the ordinance of intention was passed, a protest was filed, but it is only after the ordinance of intention has been passed and notice of public work has been posted by the street superintendent, protests are authorized to be filed. Section 4, Stats. 1889, p. 70. It was regardless of such protests that the city council made its determination, as expressed in its ordinance of intention, "that the public interest, necessity and convenience" required that the street be closed. Other protests, which were subsequently filed, were overruled by the city council. The final ordinance contains no declaration to the effect that the public interest or convenience requires that the street be closed; but it must be conceded that the case of Brown v. Board of Supervisors, 124 Cal. 278, 57 Pac. 82, is authority for the rule that "the adoption of the order is a determination by the board that the public interest or convenience requires the improvement." After such modification of the original opinion herein, we are satisfied with the views of the court as therein expressed.

The petition for rehearing is denied

63 Cal. App. 54

SALLEE v. SALLEE. (Civ. 4038.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 13, 1923.)

1. Divorce ☞37(22)—"Cruelty" must cause grievous bodily injury or grievous mental suffering.

While proof of extreme cruelty, as defined in Civ. Code, § 94, is not necessarily the same as cruelty sufficient to justify the spouse upon which it is practiced leaving the one practicing it, within section 98, the acts of cruelty in either case must be such as to cause the same result, namely, grievous bodily injury or grievous mental suffering upon the other party by the one party to the marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cruelty.]

2. Divorce ☞93(4)—Complaint held defective in not alleging wife's charges of improper conduct were not true.

Complaint in divorce action, based upon desertion, under Civ. Code, § 98, held defective in failing to allege that charges made by wife of improper conduct were not true, since, if they were true, it was not cruelty to make them.

3. Divorce ☞93(4)—To justify leaving spouse because of false accusations, essential that they caused grievous mental suffering.

An allegation essential to a complete cause of action under Civ. Code, § 98, based upon the wife's charge of improper conduct with other women, is that the making of the accusations caused plaintiff mental suffering of a grievous character, for, in order that the conduct of the offending party be a justification for the other leaving, such conduct must meet the requirements of the statutory definition of extreme cruelty as defined by section 94.

4. Divorce ☞27(7)—To show "extreme cruelty," vile language must have produced grievous mental suffering.

In making out a case of extreme cruelty, under Civ. Code, § 94, it is not sufficient to allege the application of vile names, but it must be made to appear further that such language produced grievous mental suffering upon the injured party.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Extreme Cruelty.]

5. Divorce ☞37(22)—Decree for cruelty reversed, where no allegation or finding that charges of improper conduct caused mental suffering.

Interlocutory decree for plaintiff in divorce proceedings, based on desertion following alleged cruelty, under Civ. Code, § 98, held to require reversal in the absence of an allegation in the complaint or some finding that the making of the accusations alleged to have constituted extreme cruelty produced mental suffering on the part of plaintiff.

6. Divorce ☞37(19)—Offers of reconciliation to be available must be made within one year from date of unjustified leaving.

Where plaintiff left his wife without legally sufficient cause, held that, in order that offers of reconciliation by him could be availing, they must have been made within one year from date of the leaving.

7. Divorce ☞119—Laying of foundation for reception in evidence of letters, to show truth of charge of improper conduct were true, stated.

Where plaintiff's action for divorce under Civ. Code, § 98, was based upon constructive desertion, in that plaintiff was driven to leave home by alleged false charges by wife of improper conduct with other women, foundation for admission in evidence by defendant of letters to plaintiff, written by Miss E. would be laid by showing E. wrote them, that she was a close friend and associate of plaintiff, and that the letters came into defendant's possession before defendant's accusations against plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Summerfield, Judge.

Action by D. D. Sallee against Florence V. Sallee. From an interlocutory decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ray E. Nimmo, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Grant Jackson, Bert Woodard, W. T. Kendrick, Jr., and Hal Hughes, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an action for divorce, and the appeal is from an interlocutory decree rendered in favor of the plaintiff.

The complaint contains four alleged causes of action, but they repeatedly cover the same ground, and, if at all, justify a decree in favor of the plaintiff upon but two theories. These are: Extreme cruelty, under section 94 of the Civil Code; or desertion, under section 98 of the Civil Code.

The cruelty charged is purely mental in character, and consists of accusations made by the defendant to the plaintiff directly, and to a third person, charging him with improper attentions to other women. The complaint includes much redundant matter. The material incidents related are but two, the first occurring on the 25th and 26th of February, 1915, and the second on April 22, 1921; but in the last analysis the plaintiff's right of action depends upon what took place on the first of these occasions. Concerning this, the complaint alleges that on the 25th day of February, 1915, the defendant accused the plaintiff of "fooling around with other women," that she persisted in this until the plaintiff finally "went to sleep with his wife still talking about 'other women.'" It is stated that on the morning of the 26th Mrs. Sallee resumed the talk about other women, and again charged him with "running around with them." He thereupon got his effects together, and left the defendant's bed and board in the family residence. The court finds that:

"On February 26, 1915, nor at any other time did plaintiff leave the bed and board of defendant by reason of her extreme cruelty practiced upon him, but that on said day the plaintiff did depart from the bed and board and family residence of the parties hereto by reason of the following stated facts, to wit:"

[1] The finding then goes on to cover the facts which we have related above, and concludes that the plaintiff was justified in leaving the defendant "by reason of the fact that the language used to him by the defendant was cruel." It may be said here that on account of the finding first quoted, that the plaintiff did not leave the defendant by reason of her extreme cruelty practiced upon him, the issue is narrowed down to one of desertion based upon cruelty, under Civil Code, § 98. Appellant argues that the finding that plaintiff did not leave the defendant because of her extreme cruelty practiced upon him is inconsistent with the other findings to the effect that the defendant was guilty of cruelty and that the plaintiff departed from the family residence on account of it. While proof of extreme cruelty, as defined in section 94 of the Civil Code, is not necessarily the same as cruelty sufficient to justify the spouse upon which it is practiced leaving the one practicing it. (White v. White, 86 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 996), the acts of cruelty in either case must be such as to cause the same result, to wit, grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, upon the other party by one party to the marriage (Brandt v. Brandt, 178 Cal. 548, 174 Pac. 55).

[2-4] There are two respects in which the complaint is clearly defective. It is nowhere alleged that the charges of improper conduct made by Mrs. Sallee against her husband were untrue. Of course, if they were true, and justified, it was not cruelty to make them. Brandt v. Brandt, 178 Cal. 548, 174 Pac. 55; Kuhl v. Kuhl, 124 Cal. 57, 56 Pac. 629. Another allegation essential to a complete cause of action under section 98 of the Civil Code is that the making of the accusations caused the plaintiff mental suffering of a grievous character, for, in order that the conduct of the offending party be a justification for the other leaving, such conduct must meet the requirements of the statutory definition of extreme cruelty. Brandt v. Brandt, supra. And it is settled law that in making out a case of extreme cruelty under section 94, Civil Code, it is not sufficient to allege the application of vile names, but it must be made to appear further that such language produced grievous mental suffering upon the injured party. This is true, because the grievous mental suffering is the ultimate fact, and the application of the vile language is merely probative. Smith v. Smith, 124 Cal. 651, 57 Pac. 573; Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660.

[5] But no demurrer was interposed to the complaint; the case was tried, and the court made its findings. Evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, without objection from the defendant, to show that the accusations of improper conduct against the husband were untrue, and, under the familiar rule that where parties join issue during the trial of a case as though the pleadings presented the issues in question they will be held to have waived the right to object to a deficiency in the pleadings, it may be that the defendant is precluded from raising the point here that the complaint is defective in failing to allege that the charges made by her were false. However, this rule cannot be invoked by the plaintiff to sustain the decree, in so far as the second insufficiency of the complaint above pointed out is concerned. The question of the husband's grief and mental distress seems to have been entirely disregarded, not only in the pleadings, but in the evidence and findings, as well. There is nothing in the record before us to indicate that the making of the charges of improper conduct against the plaintiff caused him any mental uneasiness. It is related in the complaint that the plaintiff went to sleep while the wife was still talking of his attentions to other women. If such remarks served as a beneficial sedative, inducing rest and quiet, it is apparently inconsistent to assume that they also constituted cruelty toward him. Without some allegation in the complaint, or some finding, that the making of the accusations produced mental suffering on the part of the plaintiff, no cause of action was or could be stated on the ground of desertion following alleged cruelty under section 98 of the Civil Code. Maloof v. Maloof, 175 Cal. 571, 166 Pac. 330; Kuhl v. Kuhl, supra; Nelson v. Nelson, 18 Cal. App. 602, 123 Pac. 1099; Cargnani v. Cargnani, 16 Cal. App. 96, 116 Pac. 306.

We conclude that a reversal must be granted, hence it is not necessary to decide several of the points raised by the appellant.

[6] If upon another trial the court should conclude that the statements made by the defendant to and concerning her husband of familiarity with other women were both untrue and unjustified, and that the making of the charges in question resulted in such mental suffering upon the part of the plaintiff as to justify him in leaving the defendant, it would be unnecessary to go into the subsequent events alleged to have taken place, for the plaintiff would be entitled to a decree. On the other hand, if the court should find that the accusations were true or justified, or that, being untrue or unjustified, no mental suffering resulted to the plaintiff, it would follow from such finding that he had no right to leave the defendant following the occurrences of February 25 and 26, 1915; his departure at that time would necessarily be desertion upon his part. In order that the offers of reconciliation which the court found were made by him should be availing, they must have been made within one year from the 26th of February, 1915. There is no finding to that effect in the record before us. But, if the offers by the plaintiff to return to the defendant were made within the period we have indicated, it would then become necessary to consider the circumstances surrounding the episode found by the court to have occurred in the office of Gesner Williams on the 22d of April, 1921. The issue thus presented would be governed by the general principles already discussed herein.

[7] But, in view of the expectancy of another trial, one other point requires notice. Certain letters asserted to have been written by one Edna Fowler to the plaintiff were offered in evidence by the defendant, but denied admission by the court on the ground that they were irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. Without stating in detail the contents of these letters, it is sufficient to say that they at least showed sufficient intimacy between the writer of them and the plaintiff to render them relevant to the issue of Mrs. Sallee's good faith and justification in charging her husband with improper relations with Miss Fowler. If all the circumstances were such as to have justified the defendant in making the charges which she did, it was not cruelty upon her part to make them, and a considerable latitude must necessarily be allowed in such instances to establish justification. It appears to us that a sufficient foundation would be laid for the introduction of the letters, if it should be shown that Miss Fowler wrote them, that she was a close friend and associate of the plaintiff, and that they came into possession of Mrs. Sallee before she made the accusations against her husband.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to allow an amendment of the complaint to conform to the legal principles herein announced.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. AMALGAMATED OIL CO. (Civ. 3938.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 16, 1923.)

1. Mines and minerals ⇨77—Acts of lessee held to effect valid forfeiture of lease.

Where an oil lease reserved to the lessee the right to forfeit the lease, at any time, by the payment of $10 as liquidated damages, held, that by depositing a written notice, quitclaim deed, and the sum of $10 in legal tender in the mail box of the lessor he had thereby effected a valid forfeiture.

2. Time ⇨11—Rent due first minute of due date, and lessee may not declare a forfeit in afternoon.

Rent becomes due the first minute of the due date, and a cancellation or forfeiture by the lessee later on that day will not relieve him from paying the rental previously accruing.

3. Mines and minerals ⇨79(1)—Lessee under oil lease held to have obligated himself to pay rent during life of lease.

Under an oil lease providing "in the event lessee has not begun the operations of drilling the first well within one year from date hereof, lessor agrees to extend the time thereof one year for the additional consideration of" various graduated monthly payments, "said consideration shall be paid monthly in advance and shall cease at * * * forfeiture of this lease," and providing that the lease might be terminated by the lessee by the payment of $10 as liquidated damages, or by the lessor upon 30 days' notice after a breach of the lease by the lessee, held, that the lessee was obligated to make the monthly payments provided for during the life of the lease, and that his mere failure to do so prior to a termination of the lease did not operate to relieve him from the liability, though it might have been grounds for forfeiture by the lessor.

4. Payment ⇨17—Check held not given and accepted as absolute payment of debt.

Statements and indorsements on a check held insufficient to constitute or establish an agreement that the check was given and accepted as an absolute payment of a debt contrary to the general rule.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as executor of the estate of C. C. Conroy, deceased, against the Amalgamated Oil Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Frank M. Gunter and Janeway, Beach & Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and H. F. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. On April 10, 1919, plaintiff's testator, C. C. Conroy, executed and delivered to one Thomas H. T. Purman a lease of certain land situated in the county of Los Angeles. The lease gave to the lessee the exclusive right to enter upon the lands described therein, and to drill for, produce, extract, and take oil, gas, asphaltum, and other hydrocarbon substances from said land, and is what is commonly known and referred to as an oil lease. On May 9, 1919, said Thomas H. T. Purman and his wife, Jessie Purman, assigned said lease to the defendant herein, the Amalgamated Oil Company.

The portions of the lease material to a decision of this case are as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 10th day of April, 1919, by and between C. C. Conroy, a single man, hereinafter called the lessor, and Thomas H. T. Purman, hereinafter called the lessee, both of the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California.

"Witneseth: For and in consideration of the sum of ten ($10.00) dollars, in hand to the lessor paid, and of other valuable considerations, the receipt of all of which is hereby acknowledged, the lessor has leased, let and demised, and by these presents does lease, let and demise, unto the lessee the land hereinafter described.
* * *

"The lessee shall hold said lands for the period of twenty years from the date hereof, unless otherwise forfeited by the lessee in accordance with the terms of this lease; and the lessee hereby leases from the lessor the above described lands for the purposes aforesaid and upon the conditions and for the considerations herein set forth.

"The lessee agrees that within one (1) year from the date hereof he will commence to drill a first well on the demised property and continue said operation of drilling with due diligence unless prevented by causes beyond his control, till oil is found therein in paying quantities or the lease abandoned. * * *

"Upon the violation by lessee of any of the provisions, terms or conditions of this lease, lessor may, by notice to lessee as provided, cancel and set aside this lease, and said cancellation shall take effect thirty (30) days after giving such notice, and then only in the event that said provision, term or condition, or provisions, terms and conditions, has or have not in the interim been complied with by lessee.

"In the event lessee has not begun the operation of drilling the first well within one year from date hereof, lessor agrees to extend the time therefor one year for the additional considerations of six hundred ($600) dollars for the first month, seven hundred ($700.00) dollars for the second month, eight hundred ($800) dollars for the third month, nine hundred ($900) dollars for the fourth month, one thousand ($1,000) dollars for the fifth month, eleven hundred ($1,100) dollars for the sixth month, twelve hundred ($1,200) dollars for the seventh month, thirteen hundred ($1,300) dollars for the eighth month, fourteen hundred ($1,400) dollars for the ninth month, fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars for the tenth month, sixteen hundred ($1,600) dollars for the eleventh month, and seventeen hundred ($1,700) dollars for the twelfth month thereof. Said considerations shall be paid monthly in advance and shall cease at the beginning of drilling operations or the abandonment or forfeiture of this lease.

"Lessee reserves the right to forfeit this lease, in whole or in part, at any time he may elect, by the payment of ten dollars, as liquidated damages in full, to lessor for so doing."

It does not appear that the lessee, or his assignee, the defendant herein, ever entered into possession of the lands described in said lease, or ever commenced the drilling of any well thereon. We assume that no such entry was made, and that no well was ever drilled, for it was stipulated at the trial that the defendant, by virtue of the right given it under the assignment, had elected to keep said lease alive, by the payment of the monthly payments as provided in said lease, and had paid to the said C. C. Conroy the monthly payments provided for in said lease up to and including the payment of $1,500 for the month of January, 1921.

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, and among other stipulations were the following:

"That, during the month of February and prior to February 9, 1921, the defendant, by its officers authorized therefor, issued its voucher check in the sum of $1,600.00, payable at and drawn upon the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, Cal., in payment of the monthly rental for the month of February, 1921, and sent said check to the said C. C. Conroy through the United States mail. That thereafter and in due course said check was received and accepted by said C. C. Conroy. That thereafter and on the 9th day of February, 1921, the defendant telegraphed to the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank at Los Angeles, Cal., instructing said bank to refuse payment on said check.

"That thereafter and on the 10th day of February, 1921, during the regular banking hours, said check duly indorsed was presented by said C. C. Conroy to said Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank for payment, and payment was refused. Said voucher check with its indorsements and duly marked, 'Payment refused,' is in words and figures as follows:
"66636

"Feb. 5, 1921

"Approved: F. T. Wilkinson.

"Approved for payment R. F. Henley, for the Auditor.

"When signed by the treasurer or his duly authorized representative and properly indorsed by Payee, this voucher becomes a sight draft on this company for one thousand six hundred dollars ($1,600) in full settlement of above account and is payable through Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank, Los Angeles, Cal.

"B. J. Rose, for the Treasurer."

"Indorsed with rubber stamp on the face of said check, 'Payment stopped,' also Clearing Hse. stamp.

"Reverse or back of said check: 'Indorse here: This voucher is indorsed as an acknowledgement of the receipt of payment in full of account as stated within. C. C. Conroy, Payee.'

"It was further stipulated that on said 10th day of February, 1921, and at or about the hour of 4:00 o'clock p. m., the defendant deposited in a receptacle provided for the deposit of delivered mail at the residence of said C. C. Conroy, 1819 Montrose street, Los Angeles, Cal., a written notice, quitclaim deed and $10.00 in legal tender, said notice, deed and tender being inclosed in an unstamped envelope addressed to said C. C. Conroy. * * *

But said C. C. Conroy never accepted said tender or deed.

The action was instituted on said voucher check to recover the sum of sixteen hundred dollars, the amount alleged to be due thereon. The court rendered judgment in defendant's favor and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

By reference to those portions of the lease above quoted it will be seen that the term of said lease was for the period of 20 years from the date thereof, unless otherwise forfeited by the lessee in accordance with the terms of the lease. Two methods of terminating said lease are provided therein, one of which may be exercised by the lessor, and the other by the lessee. Upon the violation by the lessee of any of the provisions, terms, or conditions of said lease, the lessor might, by notice to the lessee, cancel and set aside the lease, but said cancellation could not take effect until 30 days after the giving of said notice, and then only upon the failure of the lessee to comply with the terms, conditions, or provisions, the violation of which furnished the lessor the right to cancel the lease. On the other hand, the lessee might forfeit or terminate the lease, in whole or in part, at any time he might elect, by the payment of the sum of $10 to the lessor as liquidated damages.

[1] It is not contended that the lessor ever made any attempt to cancel the lease, so that, if the lease was ever terminated or forfeited, it was so terminated or forfeited by the act of the lessee, or rather by the act of his assignee, the defendant herein. The defendant attempted to do this on February 10, 1921, by depositing, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of said day, a written notice, quitclaim deed, and the sum of $10 in legal tender, in the mail box of the lessor, said C. C. Conroy. It is not seriously contended by the appellant that these acts of the defendant did not work a forfeiture of the lease. We are of the opinion that they did, and that the lease became forfeited at the time of the deposit of said sum of $10 for the lessor. We are further of the opinion that up to the time of said deposit the lease was a valid and subsisting contract between the parties.

[2, 3] It was provided in the lease that the lessee should commence the drilling of a well upon the real property described in said lease within one year from the date thereof, and that upon his failure so to do the lessor agreed to extend the time of the commencement of said drilling for a period of one year upon the payment of certain sums of money, monthly in advance, on the 10th day of each month. As we have already seen, no drilling was ever commenced, and the defendant, who in the meantime had succeeded to the rights of the original lessee, began the making of said monthly payments and paid the same up to and including the 10th day of January, 1921. The next payment became due on February 10, 1921, and it is the contention of appellant that this payment became due the first minute of the day of February 10th, and that a cancellation or forfeiture of the lease by the defendant in the afternoon of said day could not relieve defendant from its obligation, if any such obligation existed, to pay said rent which accrued and became due at the very beginning of said 10th day of February. In this contention we agree with appellant. The law is well settled that rent payable on a day certain accrues and becomes due at the very beginning of said day, and that by no act of the tenant thereafter, even though performed on the same day, can the owner of the premises be divested of his right to said rent. We do not understand that respondent seriously controverts this proposition of law. Respondent does contend, however, that by the terms of the lease there is no covenant on the part of the lessee to pay any rent whatever, and that conceding the lease was not terminated by it until the afternoon of the 10th day of February, and that such termination could not affect the payment of any rent accruing or falling due on said day, still plaintiff cannot recover in this action for the reason that the lease contains no covenant on the part of the lessee whereby he expressly or impliedly agreed to pay any rent. Respondent's contention being that the terms or provisions in the lease respecting the payment of rent amount simply to a condition under which the life of the lease may be prolonged, and by the performance of which, by the respondent, it may continue its rights thereunder; that said provisions do not in any sense amount to a covenant on the part of the lessee to pay the rent, and that any failure to perform said condition, on the part of respondent, gave to the lessor the right to cancel the lease, but no right to maintain any suit to collect said rental. It must be conceded that there is not in the lease any direct promise on the part of the lessee in precise terms to pay the rent. Nowhere in the lease can there be found the words "the lessee agrees" or "the lessee promises," in so far as the payment of the rent is concerned. Appellant has called the attention of the court to the following provision of the lease:

"In the event lessee has not begun the operation of drilling the first well within one year from date hereof, lessor agrees to extend the time therefore one year for the additional consideration of * * * [then follow the graduated monthly rentals] said considerations shall be paid monthly in advance and shall cease at the beginning of drilling operations or the abandonment or forfeiture of this lease."

Appellant claims that the lessee, having signed the lease containing the above provision, made himself personally responsible for the payment of the rent until the lease was terminated by one of the parties, and that such words amount to an express agreement on his part to pay said rent, and that an action will lie on this agreement to recover the amount of rent due. The question, therefore, as to defendant's liability must be determined by a construction of this provision of the lease last above quoted.

In the case of Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 26 Pac. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301, the parties had entered into a contract whereby the plaintiffs agreed to sell to the defendant, for $125 per acre, 40 acres of land, and upon the payment of said sum plaintiffs would execute and deliver to defendant a deed to said land. The court held that the agreement "obligated the defendant as strongly to buy and pay the price specified for the land as it did the plaintiffs to sell it for that price." This case has been approved in King-Keystone Oil Co. v. S. F. Brick Co., 148 Cal. 87, 82 Pac. 849, and Samuel v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, 146 Pac. 638, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 830.

In King-Keystone Oil Co. v. S. F. Brick Co., supra, the plaintiff agreed by written contract to sell to defendant all the petroleum to be used by the latter during a certain year. Action was brought to recover damage for the breach of this contract. The only point made on appeal was that the case failed to show that the defendant agreed to buy the oil in controversy. In deciding the case in plaintiff's favor, the court said:

"The contract in this respect is precisely the same in legal effect as that construed in Preble v. Abrahams. * * * In that case, as in this, the contract was signed by both parties, but there was no language expressing an agreement on the part of Abrahams, the purchaser, to buy the property which the other party agreed to sell."

After quoting from Preble v. Abrahams, the court continued as follows:

"So in the case at bar, in which the contract is much more complete and certain in this respect than the one considered in Preble v. Abrahams, there is a clearly implied agreement on the part of the defendant to buy the oil which the plaintiff thereby agreed to sell."

In Samuels v. Ottinger, supra, the plaintiff leased to the defendant certain premises. During the term of the lease, the defendant assigned it to a third party who paid the rent for one month and then defaulted. Plaintiff thereafter instituted three actions against the defendant to recover installments of rent accruing during three different periods of time under the lease. In deciding that the defendant was liable under the terms of the lease, the court said:

"The lease in question was executed by the lessees, as well as by the lessor. It begins by stating that the lessor leases the premises to the lessees, for the term of ten years, at the monthly rental above stated, 'payable in advance on the twentieth day of each and every month.' By subsequent clauses the lessees agree to pay all bills for water, gas, and electricity furnished to the premises, and all taxes on improvements to be erected by said lessees. The privilege of subleasing is expressly given, as is permission to erect buildings, which, if they comply with certain conditions, are to be purchased by the lessor at the expiration of the term. The lessees agree to insure the improvements, 'and said insurance shall be made payable to the lessor and the lessees jointly, for the purpose of securing the said lessor in the payment of the rents herein stipulated. * * *' By another clause it is agreed that the improvements to be erected 'shall be security for the rent herein stipulated to be paid. * * *' Finally, it is agreed that if the lessees hold over beyond the term provided in the lease, such holding over shall be deemed merely a tenancy from month to month, 'and at the same monthly rental that shall have been payable hereunder by said lessees immediately prior to such holding over.'

"If it is possible to express a contractual obligation to pay rent by any form of words other than a direct promise, in exact terms, to pay such rent, the language we have quoted from the lease before us imposes that obligation on the lessees. The lessor agrees to lease the premises to the lessees at a given rental, 'payable' at stated times. The writing is signed by the lessees as well as by the lessor."

The court then proceeds to refer to other terms of the lease in support of its conclusion that it contained an express agreement on the part of the lessee to pay the rent, but none of the terms, to which the court subsequently referred, were in our opinion any stronger against the lessee than those contained in the above quotation from the opinion in said case. It also reviewed a number of cases from other jurisdictions, pointing out that the decisions were not entirely in harmony upon this question, and concluded its review by adopting the reasoning of those which held that provisions, similar to those in the lease in this action, constituted a covenant to pay the rent provided therein.

Among the cases cited in Samuels v. Ottinger, supra, with approval by the court, were Bussman v. Ganster, 72 Pa. 285, and Linn v. Ross, 10 Ohio, 412, 36 Am. Dec. 95. The former case was one for the recovery of rent, the lease having been signed by both parties, and the only provision contained therein which could possibly be construed as a covenant on the part of the lessee to pay the rent were the words "the rent to be paid monthly," and in holding the lessee liable, under such a lease, the court said:

"It is expressly said in this lease, the rent to be paid monthly. To be paid by whom? Surely by the lessees, the parties of the second part executing the instrument. When therefore they as such parties accept the demise of the premises at a certain annual rent, the rent to be paid monthly, it is an express covenant by them to pay the rent. * * *

The present action cannot, in our opinion, be distinguished from the foregoing cases, and we think that the same rule invoked therein should be applied by this court. The lease in the present case provides that the lessor agrees to extend the time, within which the operation of the well may be begun, one year, for certain additional considerations, and that "said considerations shall be paid monthly in advance." To be paid to whom and by whom? Unquestionably they are to be paid to the lessor, and we think with equal clearness the lease provides that they are to be paid by the lessee. In further support of this conclusion, we would call attention to the following provision in said lease:

"The lessee shall hold said land for the period of twenty years from the date hereof unless otherwise forfeited by the lessee in accordance with the terms of this lease and the lessee hereby leases from the lessor the above described land for the purposes aforesaid and for the considerations herein set forth."

This provision, read in connection with that which provides that "said considerations shall be paid monthly in advance," seems, in our opinion, to present an additional reason for holding that the lessee has bound himself by the lease to pay the rent. By these provisions of the lease, he has leased the lands upon the considerations therein set forth, and among these considerations is the payment of said sums, monthly in advance. We are therefore unable to arrive at any different conclusion than that the lessee, upon the execution of the lease, made himself personally responsible for the payment of the rent provided for therein. The defendant received a written assignment of said lease, "together with all rights and privileges, burdens and benefits in said lease set forth." It thus became liable for the performance of all the obligations agreed to by the original lessee. Civ. Code, §§ 1589, 3521.

In support of the respondent's contention that the terms of the lease contain no covenant on the part of the lessee to pay the rent, respondent's counsel have cited the following cases: Glasgow v. Chartiers Gas Co., 152 Pa. 48, 25 Atl. 232; Van Etten v. Kelly, 66 Ohio St. 605, 64 N. E. 560; Snodgrass v. So.

Penn. Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 509, 35 S. E. 820; Butcher v. Greene, 50 Ind. App. 692, 98 N. E. 876; Eastern Oil Co. v. Smith, 80 Okl. 207, 195 Pac. 773; Frank Oil Co. v. Belleview Gas & Oil Co., 29 Okl. 719, 119 Pac. 260, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 487; Ohio Oil Co. v. Detamore, 165 Ind. 243, 73 N. E. 906; U. S. v. Comet Oil & Gas Co. (C. C.) 187 Fed. 674; Hickernell v. Gregory (Tex. Civ. App.) 224 S. W. 691; Texas Co. v. Curry (Tex. Civ. App.) 229 S. W. 643. These cases all involved the construction of so-called oil leases. The leases under consideration in the first seven of these cases, if we have read them correctly, all contained provisos that the lease should become null and void upon the failure of the lessees to make certain designated payments, and in the case of United States v. Comet Oil & Gas Co., supra, being the eighth case mentioned above, the lease provided that the failure to make the payments required shall subject the lease to forfeiture without further notice to the lessees. In all these cases the courts held that these provisos were mere conditions and were not covenants which would support an action on the part of the lessor to recover the rent. They further held that, by a failure of the lessee to make the payments provided in his lease, his rights thereunder were forfeited immediately, and without any act on the part of the lessor or any other person. It would necessarily follow that after a lease is forfeited no rent could accrue thereunder. It would be the height of injustice to permit the lessor to enjoy the forfeited estate, and at the same time to permit him to recover rent for the estate during the period that he is enjoying the same. As we have already seen, the lease in the present case contains no such forfeiture clause, but on the other hand, the lease remained a binding contract between the parties after default in the payment of the installment falling due February 10, 1921, and until the lessee terminated the same by making payment of said sum of $10 in the afternoon of said day.

The other two cases, cited by respondents, and being the two last enumerated above, were not actions for the recovery of rent at all, but were instituted for the purpose of declaring the leases forfeited, and whatever language might have been used therein by the courts in arriving at their conclusions would not, in our opinion, be applicable to the questions involved in the present case. We are of the further opinion that none of the cases cited by respondent and enumerated above sustain its contention, and particularly so, in the face of the decisions from our own Supreme Court, which all seem to be favorable to the contention of the appellant.

It is suggested by counsel for the respondent that there should possibly be a different rule in the construction of these so-called oil leases than ordinary leases of real property, and especially should this be so when, as in the present case, the defendant did not go into possession of the leased property, but the only right it had under said lease was to enter upon said real property and explore for oil and other mineral substances. We fail to see the force of this suggestion. The lessee under the present lease was given certain rights in the leased property, and so long as he enjoyed them the lessor was deprived of the privilege either to exercise these rights personally or to dispose of them to others, and so long as the defendant, as assignee of the lessee, owned and exercised these rights under the lease, just so long was it obligated to pay for the same as provided in the lease.

[4] Appellant also contends that by the giving of the check by the defendant, and the acceptance thereof by the plaintiff, the obligation created by the lease became extinguished, and the obligation to pay the checks substituted therefor, and that no act thereafter by the defendant, even if defendant was not liable under the lease, could affect his obligation created under the check. In other words, appellant contends that the check was given and accepted in absolute payment and extinguishment of the obligation under the lease. The rule is well settled that the giving of a check for an antecedent debt is not an absolute payment and extinguishment of the debt in the absence of an agreement giving it that effect. Comptoir D'Escompte v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28; Dingley v. McDonald, 124 Cal. 90, 56 Pac. 790. There is not in this case, in our opinion, any evidence of any agreement between the parties that the check was either given or accepted with the understanding that the debt for which it is given should thereby be extinguished. The check was received in the ordinary course of business, and if paid, the original debt, or the debt for which it was given, would be extinguished, but if, for any reason, the check was unpaid, plaintiff's testator would still have had his action upon the original indebtedness. The check bore certain statements and indorsements of the parties, but these would not, we think, constitute an agreement that the check itself was given and accepted as an absolute payment of the debt.

The check, however, having been given in payment of rent due plaintiff from the defendant, was based upon a valuable consideration, and defendant is liable for the payment of the amount thereof.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint.

In an action to recover money paid on a contract of subscription for stock of a proposed corporation, on the ground that the consideration had failed, where it was not shown that defendants were in any way injured or with respect to their rights or obligations to plaintiff by reason of delay in filing the complaint, the defense of laches cannot prevail.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Will J. Reid against C. E. Holcomb and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. A. Knight, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Earle M. Daniels and Julius V. Patrosso, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover a sum of money paid by plaintiff on a contract of subscription for stock of a proposed corporation; plaintiff alleging, in substance, that the consideration for said payment has failed. The second count of the complaint is the common count for money had and received. Both counts relate to the same transaction. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment in favor of the defendants.

The findings, in conformity with the first two paragraphs of the complaint, state that on or about November 5, 1919, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendants wherein and whereby the plaintiff agreed to buy from the defendants, and the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiff, 500 shares of the par value of $10 each, of the common capital stock of a proposed corporation to be organized under the laws of the state of California, and the plaintiff then paid to the defendants the sum of $1,000 for said stock; that a copy of said contract is attached to the complaint and marked "Exhibit A." Said Exhibit A, under the title "Subscription Contract," is a document addressed to the defendants as "Syndicate Managers, Paul Getty Oil Corporation, 1004-S Garland Building, Los Angeles, California." It bore the signature of "Will J. Reid, Subscriber," and was "Countersigned by W. M. Strickler, Syndicate Manager." The material parts of it read as follows:

"I hereby subscribe for one unit, or share of the preorganization syndicate being organized by you to underwrite a block of 150,000 shares of the capital stock of the proposed Paul Getty Oil Corporation, to be incorporated under the laws of the state of California, and agree to pay to C. E. Holcomb, fiscal agent of the syndicate, therefor, the sum of $1,000 per unit, or share, or a total of $1,000 payable as follows:

"Cash upon the signing of this subscription contract and upon the following terms and conditions; receipt of the above described payments being hereby acknowledged.

"I. That all payments made on this subscription and on similar subscriptions, shall be held by C. E. Holcomb, to be used as directed by the aforesaid syndicate managers.

"2. Each syndicate unit, or share, shall be exchangeable, upon demand for 500 shares of a par value of $10 each of the common capital stock of the Paul Getty Oil Corporation, the total par value of said shares being $5,000. Delivery of said shares shall be made as soon as the proposed company is duly incorporated and organized according to law, which it is hereby understood and agreed shall be about the 1st day of December, 1919, certificate or certificates of stock to be issued in my name, or to my order without transfer charges.

"I hereby authorize and instruct the abovenamed syndicate managers to make payments to J. Paul Getty, the Paul Getty Oil Corporation, or the Getty Oil Company, in such amounts and at such times as they deem fit.

"This subscription contract is not valid or binding unless accepted and countersigned by one of the syndicate managers. Dated the 5th day of November, 1919."

Appellant contends that there is no evidence to sustain certain of the findings, which, as to the matters here in controversy, are, in substance, as follows: The court found that the plaintiff did not, on the 1st day of December, 1919, and on the 17th day of May, 1920, and at other times between said dates, demand of the defendants the said stock; that the defendants have not failed and refused to deliver to plaintiff the said shares of stock of said corporation provided to be delivered in said agreement or any stock; that it is not true that the plaintiff has not received certificates for said shares of stock or any part thereof; that it is not true that on or about the 17th day of May, 1920, the plaintiff had received nothing for his money, and demanded of the defendants the return of the $1,000 paid to them; that it is not true that thereafter, on the 31st day of July, 1920, the plaintiff demanded of the defendants, and each of them, the return of said $1,000; that the plaintiff did demand the return of said sum or or about the 1st day of February, 1921; that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches and unreasonable delay in bringing this action; that the plaintiff is precluded or estopped from suing on the cause of action set forth in the complaint for the reason that, on or about the 12th day of May, 1920, 2,500 shares, of the par value of $1 per share, of the Getty Oil Company, a corporation organized in pursuance to the terms and conditions set forth in the contract attached to the complaint, were issued and tendered to the plaintiff; and that said Getty Oil Company was organized according to law on or about April 17, 1920.

It is conceded that the defendants never organized a corporation under the laws of California. It does appear from the evidence that on the 17th day of April, 1920, "the Getty Oil Company" was incorporated in Arizona under the laws of that state, with an authorized capital stock of $5,000,000 in $1 shares. According to the stock ledger of that corporation, on May 6, 1920, a stock certificate of 2,500 shares was "drawn" in favor of Will J. Reid. At the time of the trial that certificate was in possession of the secretary of the corporation, who had received it from his predecessor in office, who, in turn, had received it from defendant W. M. Strickler with a letter of Strickler to the company, dated July 28, 1920, wherein he stated that he was returning the certificate in accordance with his understanding with J. Paul Getty. It appears that said certificate of stock within two or three days after its date was taken by Mr. Strickler to the office of the plaintiff at Long Beach. The plaintiff was not there at that time, and Strickler took it back to Los Angeles and thereafter returned it to the Getty Oil Company. The fact that Strickler, while at plaintiff's office in Long Beach, told Mr. Hancock, "a business associate" of defendant, that he had brought down to the plaintiff the stock from the Getty Oil Company, and that Mr. Hancock said that the plaintiff was not going to take it, does not tend to prove either a tender of the certificate or an excuse for nondelivery, and there is no evidence that Hancock was authorized to represent plaintiff.

Mr. Strickler represented the syndicate in obtaining the plaintiff's subscription. Strickler testified:

That in February, 1920, the plaintiff asked him about the progress of the incorporation, to which he replied that the delay had occurred because "Mr. Getty and Mr. Gesell, the principals in the case, had not been able to decide upon a capitalization." That again in March, 1920, the plaintiff said that if he did not get his stock, he would want his money back, to which Strickler replied that he would see that the plaintiff got either his money or the stock. That he had a third conversation with the plaintiff in April, 1920. That he then told the plaintiff that Mr. Getty had either gone or was contemplating a trip to Europe. "That I told him that I thought it was impossible to do anything at that time with Mr. Getty until his return. But I suggested that he get in touch with Mr. Gesell, and that I would also see Mr. Gesell and see if something couldn't be done to either get him his money or his stock. * * * I told him that I would get him either his money or his stock." That his next conversation with the plaintiff was in July, 1920. "Of course at that time Mr. Reid had—I mean the company had been incorporated, and I knew that Mr. Reid was not going to accept his stock. So then I told him I would try to get him his money back, when I knew he didn't want to accept the stock."

[1, 2] It thus appears that the findings are correct to this extent, that the plaintiff did not, on or before the 17th day of May, 1920, in any of said conversations, demand the shares of stock, or demand the return of his money, except in the alternative terms stated. On the other hand, however, he did make that alternative demand, and the replies which he received from Strickler evidently caused the plaintiff to postpone a more positive and specific demand, at least until May 17, 1920. There is no evidence to sustain the finding that the defendants have not failed to deliver the said shares of stock, or the finding that it is not true that the plaintiff has not received certificates for said shares of stock. In fact, the corporation provided for in the agreement, to wit, a California corporation, never has existed. The plaintiff did not know that an Arizona corporation was being substituted for the proposed California corporation, and he cannot be held to have waived his right to object to such substitution. The evidence leaves no doubt whatever that on May 17, 1920, the plaintiff addressed to the defendants a letter in which he referred to the agreement of November 5th, and said, referring to the proposed corporation:

"This corporation has not been formed, and I hereby demand the immediate return of the $1,000 paid to you by me last November."

This letter was sent as a registered letter to the office of the defendants, where, on May 18, 1920, receipt for it was given in their name by the office boy of the defendants. Three of the defendants testified, each for himself, that he never received said letter. The other defendant, Mr. Gesell, being asked if he had seen the letter before, replied thus:

"If I have I don't remember it; I don't remember ever seeing it; so many papers flying around in connection with that oil business."

[3] We think that reasonably it may be assumed to be within the scope of the duties of an "office boy" to receive for his employers the letters delivered at their office for them, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that letters properly stamped and addressed have been delivered. Subject to contradiction, if any there be, it is to be presumed "that the ordinary course of business has been followed," and "that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 20 and 24. The mere fact that Mr. Gesell, under the circumstances stated by him, did not remember receiving the letter is no evidence that he did not receive it. His answer, as quoted above, is not a denial, but it is in effect that, for the reason stated by him, if he had received it, he would not remember the fact. Our conclusion is that the letter of May 17, 1920, was delivered to the defendants in due course of mail, and that the evidence does not sustain the finding that the plaintiff did not, on the 17th day of May, 1920, demand of defendants the return of said sum of $1,000. It is also clear that he has never received the consideration, or any part of the consideration, for said money.

[4] This action was commenced by complaint filed on the 17th day of March, 1921. We are satisfied that the judgment should be reversed, unless the defense of laches is applicable to the case, and unless it be true, as found by the court, that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches and unreasonable delay in bringing the action. Upon the facts as they appear in the record, we are of the opinion that this defense cannot prevail. This is so because there are not any "acts or circumstances attending the delay which have operated to the injury of the defendants. Meigs v. Pinkham, 159 Cal. 104, 111, 112 Pac. 883; McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 74, 155 Pac. 460. The defense of laches was not pleaded except as follows: Defendants alleged "that plaintiff has been guilty of laches and unreasonable delay in bringing this action." It was not alleged, and it is not established by any of the proven facts, that the defendants were in any way injured or at all affected with respect to their rights or with respect to their obligations to the plaintiff by reason of such delay as there was in the matter of filing a complaint in the action. If the plaintiff had known that the corporation organized by the defendants in purported compliance with his contract was in fact an Arizona corporation, and not a corporation organized under the laws of California, and if, with knowledge of those facts and with knowledge that shares of stock had been placed in his name on the books of the company, he had exercised rights of ownership thereof and had postponed his rescission of the contract, or his demand for the return of the money, in view of a possible increase in value of the stock, there might be some substance to a defense based upon those facts. But the situation thus assumed does not exist in this case.

The judgment is reversed.

(63 Cal. App. 63)

PEOPLE v. KNIGHT. (Cr. 968.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 18, 1923.)

1. Criminal law §1130(3)—Appellant should separate under distinct heads points relied upon.

A review of the case in narrative form by appellant in his brief without properly separating under distinct heads the points relied upon is improper.

2. Criminal law §1031(1)—Objection that defendant was not legally committed by magistrate before filing of information cannot be first made on appeal.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 995, 996, the objection that defendant has not been legally committed by a magistrate before filing of the information against him cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

3. Criminal law §1144(1)—Defendant presumed legally committed by magistrate prior to filing of information.

In the absence of any showing in the record that a commitment preceding the filing of an information was issued by city recorder rather than a magistrate, as contended by defendant, it will be presumed that defendant was legally committed by a magistrate.

4. Criminal law §655(4)—Statement by court during impanelling of jury held not error.

A statement by the court while the jury was being selected, "When juries are impaneled it is for the purpose of securing verdicts, and, while a juror should not surrender his individual opinion, it would be the duty of every juror to consult freely with other jurors and see if there is evidence to change it," held not erroneous.

5. Criminal law §1166½(6)—Excusing of jurors before all prospective jurors had been examined held not error.

The action of the court in excusing a juror before all the prospective jurors then in the jury box had been examined held a mere matter of procedure, and not prejudicial to defendant.

6. Criminal law §825(4)—Instruction as to corroboration of prosecutrix held not erroneous in absence of request for further instruction.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct, an instruction that it is not essential to a conviction that the prosecutrix be corroborated in the testimony of other witnesses as to the particular acts constituting the offense held not erroneous for failure to include instruction that testimony of the prosecutrix, a child of tender years, should be viewed with great caution, in the absence of a request for an instruction on that point.

7. Criminal law §1172(6)—Giving of instruction relating to impeachment of witness not prejudicial, though instruction inapplicable to any evidence in case.

The giving of an instruction as to the manner in which a witness may be impeached, which conformed to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847, 2051, held not prejudicial, though there was no impeaching testimony in the case to which it was applicable.

8. Criminal law §823(15)—Denial of instruction as to reasonable doubt held not reversible error.

Denial of instruction that defendant was "entitled to the individual opinion of each member of this jury, and that no member should vote for a conviction * * * because of the opinion of other members of the jury so long as he had a reasonable doubt as to guilt or innocence of defendant," held not reversible error, in view of other instructions.

9. Criminal law §829(1)—Denial of instruction covered by others given is not error.

Denial of an instruction covered by others given is not error.

10. Criminal law §1174(4)—Permitting separation of jurors held not prejudicial.

A separation of the jury, during which some of the jurors conversed in a hallway where other persons were present, held not prejudicial where there was nothing in the affidavits relating thereto tending to show a discussion of the case or any fact prejudicial to defendant.

11. Lewdness §10—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence tending to establish the date of and the commission of alleged lewd and lascivious conduct with a 7 year old girl held to sustain conviction therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

G. H. Knight was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct, and he appeals. Affirmed. See, also, 216 Pac. 89.

J. W. Wright, of Tulare, and D. M. Edwards and J. C. Thomas, both of Visalia, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial in an action wherein he was convicted of the crime of felony, to wit, lewd and lascivious conduct committed upon the body of a female person under the age of 14 years.

[1] The brief on behalf of appellant reviews the case in narrative form without properly separating under distinct heads the points relied upon. This is a too common fault. It should not be made necessary for the court to exhumate, parcel out, and number, in order to identify the propositions upon which an appellant relies. If we have successfully discovered the grounds of appeal herein, the points relied upon are those hereinafter considered.

[2, 3] It is claimed that the trial court had no jurisdiction of the case for the reason that the preliminary examination was held before the city recorder of the city of Porterville, and that said city recorder "had not jurisdiction to issue a criminal complaint or warrant of arrest on a charge of felony." The city of Porterville is a city of the fifth class. The recorder of such a city has the powers of a magistrate. Municipal Corporations Act (St. 1883, p. 265) §§ 806, 807. As a magistrate he would have authority to conduct examinations on criminal complaints. Pen. Code, §§ 811 and 872; Const. art. 1, § 8. Since it does not appear that the defendant moved to set aside the information on the ground that before the filing thereof he had not been legally committed by a magistrate, the defendant cannot now make that objection. Pen. Code, §§ 996 and 995. Moreover, the record does not show that the commitment preceding the filing of the information was a commitment issued by said city recorder. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that the defendant had been legally committed by a magistrate.

[4, 5] It is suggested that while the jury was being selected the court erroneously made a statement to the effect that "when juries are impaneled it is for the purpose of securing verdicts, and, while a juror should not surrender his individual opinion, it would be the duty of every juror to consult freely with other jurors, and see if there is evidence to change it"; that at the same time the court erroneously refused to allow counsel for defendant to further interrogate the juror then under examination; and that the court erred in peremptorily excusing said juror at the instance of the district attorney before all of the prospective jurors then in the jury box had been examined. The quoted statement contains no error. The court did not refuse to allow further questioning of the juror. The excusing of the juror at the time stated was a mere matter of procedure, and there is nothing to show that the procedure adopted was in any way injurious to the rights of the defendant.

[6] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"The Court further instructs the jury that it is not essential to a conviction in this case that the prosecutrix * * * should be corroborated in the testimony of other witnesses as to the particular acts constituting the offense; it is sufficient if you believe from her evidence and all of the other testimony and circumstances in proof in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the crime charged has been committed."

Appellant claims that this instruction was erroneous because it did not instruct the jury that the testimony of a child of tender years ought to be viewed with great care and caution, and without bias and prejudice, and that such a charge as that against the defendant in this case is one easily made, but hard to disprove. The instruction as given is a correct statement of the law. If the defendant desired to have an instruction given on the point suggested he might have asked for it; but his counsel does not claim that he made any such request.

[7] The court gave an instruction concerning the presumptions attending the testimony of a witness, and the manner in which such presumptions may be repelled, and the manner in which a witness may be impeached. Substantially, this instruction conforms to the provisions of sections 1847 and 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant claims that the giving of this instruction was erroneous for the reason that there was no testimony before the jury to warrant such instruction, and for the further reason that it was an instruction upon the weight of the testimony. We find nothing in the instruction that can be construed as an instruction upon the weight of testimony or upon the facts of the case. Even if, as claimed by counsel, there was no impeaching testimony in the case, appellant could not have been prejudiced by a general instruction of this kind which included a reference to the lawful methods by which witnesses may be impeached.

[8] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction requested by him:

"You are instructed that the defendant in this case is entitled to the individual opinion of each member of this jury, and that no member of this jury should vote for a conviction of the defendant because of the opinion of the other members of the jury, so long as he has a reasonable doubt as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant."

In view of the other instructions given, the refusal of this instruction, although it is correct as a statement of law, is not a suf-sufficient reason for reversal of the judgment. People v. Kiser, 24 Cal. App. 540, 548, 141 Pac. 1078; People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 748, 756, 78 Pac. 284. The court did instruct the jury that the presumption of innocence exists, and continues until the defendant's guilt is established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, and that this presumption attaches at every stage of the case and to every fact essential to a conviction.

[9] Appellant's claim that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by him on the subject of reasonable doubt, and concerning the necessity of proving the defendant's guilt by more than a preponderance of the evidence, before the defendant can be convicted, is sufficiently answered by the fact that the court gave an adequate instruction on that subject in what might be called the common form of such instruction, which many times has been sustained.

[10] Appellant claims that he is entitled to a new trial upon the ground that, after the case was submitted to the jury, the officer in charge of the jury was guilty of misconduct in that he allowed the jury to separate, and himself entered the jury room and was with the jury on four different occasions during the time of its deliberations. The separation of the jury consisted in the fact that the officer allowed the jury to leave the jury room and go down the hall to the toilet, during which time a portion of them were talking in the hallway, where a number of other persons were present. There is nothing in the affidavits tending to show that any of these occurrences of which complaint is made included any discussion of the case or any fact prejudicial to the defendant. While it may properly be said that the officer did not strictly conform to the proprieties pertaining to his duty in caring for the jury, we are satisfied that there is nothing in the facts shown which would furnish a sufficient cause for granting a new trial.

[11] Finally, it is contended that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the conviction of the defendant; particularly that the testimony of the witnesses does not show that any of them knew the date of the alleged offense, and that there is no testimony denying the testimony of the defendant to the effect that he was not present between 1 o'clock and 5 o'clock of the 16th day of August, 1922, at the place where the prosecution claims the offense was committed. The prosecuting witness fixed the time as the afternoon of a day when her father "went to Coalinga," and the place as the Southern Pacific Depot, where defendant was employed, and near which the prosecuting witness lived. The mother of the child testified to the fact that on said 16th day of August, her little girl, Vivian, with a companion named Mary, was out playing that afternoon, at or after half past 2, and came back at about a quarter of 4. That evening she told her mother about "this affair." The girl Mary testified that at about 3 o'clock on the day of the affair in question she and Vivian visited the depot, and that the defendant was there, but that the witness went away, and left Vivian with Mr. Knight at the depot. The testimony of Vivian, describing the conduct of the defendant, is sufficient to establish the commission of the offense as charged. While the child was only 7 years old, yet the court determined, as it was authorized to do, that she had sufficient intelligence and maturity to be accepted as a witness. The jury believed her statements. They are legally sufficient to prove the facts which establish the commission of the crime. The judgment and order are affirmed.

CARTER v. SILL et al. (Civ. 3878.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 20, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 694(1)—Appeals on judgment roll alone present sole question whether findings of fact support the judgment.

Where an appeal is brought upon the judgment roll alone, the sole question is whether the findings of fact support the conclusions of law adduced therefrom and the judgment entered thereon.

2. Mortgages $\hookrightarrow$ 302—Tender held not in effect refused by unreasonable delay in acceptance.

Mortgaged property was redeemed from purchaser at foreclosure sale by the mortgagee, who held an additional lien on the property, and mortgagor offered to redeem, but offered only the amount of the mortgage with interest, without including the amount of the additional lien under which the mortgagee had redeemed. The mortgagee referred the matter to his counsel, who stated that he would give mortgagor an answer next day, Saturday, but it was mutually agreed, because of expected absence on Saturday of mortgagor's counsel, that answer should be given the following Monday, and on Monday mortgagee notified mortgagor's counsel that the offer was accepted, but mortgagor did not make good his offer. Held that, even if the agreement to postpone decision on the offer be disregarded, the delay from Friday until Monday before accepting the offer was not such unreasonable delay in acceptance as to amount to a refusal of the offer, so as to render the tender effectual to discharge the lien without payment of the debt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by William Carter against Ben H. Sill and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Fred E. Borton, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal on the judgment roll alone from a judgment in favor of the defendants in a suit to quiet title to certain real property situated at Bakersfield, in the county of Kern. The plaintiff claims as grantee of L. L. Bateman.

The complaint is in the usual form. The answer and supplemental answer allege, and upon a trial of the issues the court found, that the plaintiff was not the owner of an interest in, nor entitled to possession of, the property in suit, but that defendant Sill had legally acquired the title, was the lawfully constituted owner, and entitled to possession.

The facts as set forth by the defendant's pleadings and in the findings are, substantially, that on May 8, 1911, one L. L. Bateman was the owner and in possession of the property; that Bateman and wife on that date mortgaged the same to the Producers' Savings Bank, which said mortgage the bank subsequently assigned to Ben H. Sill; that Sill thereafter foreclosed this mortgage on October 24, 1918.

It is further alleged, and found by the court, that, previous to such foreclosure, and on October 24, 1913, Bateman was the owner of the property, subject to said mortgage and that on the latter date Sill signed as accommodation maker with Bateman a note to the Security Trust Company for $2,000, the Batemans in turn executing to Sill and the bank a grant deed, conveying the same property as security; that on May 8, 1914, Sill paid the bank in full its interest on account of this obligation; that pursuant to the decree of foreclosure under the mortgage of May 8, 1911, one A. T. Lightner as commissioner named in the decree sold the property to one Fred Gunther for $2,401.21, which Gunther paid, and received the commissioner's certificate of sale, a duplicate of which was duly recorded, and that subsequently Sill redeemed from Gunther.

The findings of fact further state: That on December 5, 1919, the plaintiff and Bateman met the commissioner in the courthouse, displaying certain money to him, and stating that Bateman desired to redeem the property from the effect of the sale under foreclosure of May 8, 1911, and that the money offered was the amount for which the property had been sold to Gunther, with interest at 1 per cent. per month from date of sale, but that it did not include the lien of Sill under which he had redeemed. Lightner informed them that before he could act he would have to confer with Sill's attorneys. That thereupon the plaintiff, Carter, and Bateman went to Carter's attorneys, where they met Sill and his attorney. That plaintiff's attorney accompanied them, and there offered Sill 2,800, stating that it was offered to redeem, but that it did not include Sill's lien, for the reason that the latter was barred by limitation. Sill thereupon referred the matter to his counsel, who replied that he would give them an answer the next day at 10 o'clock. After some discussion it was mutually agreed that an answer should be given on the 8th, which was Monday. That Bateman thereupon took the money from Allen, and offered it to Sill and to his counsel, demanding a reply "then and there," but defendant's attorney stated that he should have his answer on the 8th, as agreed. On said 8th day of December Sill's counsel notified counsel for the plaintiff in writing that the offer was accepted, and that Sill would receive the money and convey at any time before the 15th, when the right of redemption would expire.

The court then finds that such so-called tender was not made in good faith; that neither Carter, Bateman, nor their counsel offered to pay the amount due; that the period of time between December 5th and December 8th was a reasonable one, and that none of the parties, or any one in their behalf, ever returned or availed themselves of the agreement, or of defendant's offer.

The judgment provides that the plaintiff take nothing, that the defendant Sill recover his costs, and that said Sill is the owner and entitled to possession of the lands and premises described.

The appellant contends that the tender effected a discharge of the lien, though it did not constitute a payment of the debt, whereas the respondent's position is that the law allowed him a reasonable time to ascertain the correct amount due and to consult counsel, and that a tender of redemption alone will not discharge a lien, but a tender followed by an unqualified refusal to accept, or by unreasonable delay in acceptance, is essential to such discharge.

[1] Since this appeal is brought up on the judgment roll alone, the sole question here is whether or not the findings of fact support the conclusions of law adduced therefrom and the judgment subsequently rendered and entered thereon. O'Connell v. Behan, 19 Cal. App. 111, 124 Pac. 1038; Archer v. Harvey, 164 Cal. 274, 128 Pac. 410, 412.

[2] Appellant argues that the refusal of the tender instantaneously worked a forfeiture or dissolution of the lien. But respondent contends that he did not refuse to accept; that he merely asked one day in which to decide; that appellant's counsel demurred, stating that he would be out of town next day, and that the 8th of December was mutually agreed upon between them as the date upon which Sill should accept or reject the tender; that on Monday, the 8th, respondent offered to accept, and advised appellant in writing that he did accept, but that the latter remained silent, and did not make good his offer. The trial court found these facts to be true, and they amply support the judgment. Following the acquisition by Sill of the interests of Gunther and the bank, which constituted, so far as appears, the complete title, it would seem that defendant Ben H. Sill is the owner and entitled to possession of the lands and premises described, and that the judgment should be upheld.

There was argument by counsel, and much is indulged in the briefs, upon the question of sufficiency as a legal tender of the offer made December 5th. We are satisfied that it was not sufficient. It is further true that the findings reveal an express understanding that respondent should have until the 8th to accept or reject such offer, and that appellant then by his inaction prevented acceptance. This at least constituted a waiver by appellant of any semblance of claim to an immediate reply. Of course, the obligor was at liberty to consent to a postponement, and having done so, he is precluded from complaining that the initial offer was not instantly accepted. In Vance v. Dingley, 14 Cal. 53, it is said that the plaintiff agreed upon a subsequent meeting, and the Supreme Court held that no question of tender on the first occasion was presented.

Assuming, however, either alternative—the offer of December 5th and postponement to the 8th, or the offer to accept on the 8th and appellant's failure to comply as agreed—the essential features of a lawful tender of redemption, as they have been ruled upon by courts of various jurisdictions, are absent.

"To constitute a tender, there must be a definite offer to pay on the one hand and an unqualified refusal to accept on the other." Supreme Tent. K. of M. of W. v. Fisher, 45 Ind. App. 419, 90 N. E. 1044, 1046.

In Cape Fear Lumber Co. v. Small, 84 S. C. 434, 66 S. E. 880, the defendant gave plaintiff an option to purchase timber, and within the stipulated time the plaintiff undertook to perform, but defendant refused on the ground that the deed tendered for execution did not contain certain provisions. Plaintiff notified defendant of its willingness that such conditions be included in the deed, whereupon she agreed to execute it, but failed to do so. The court said there was nothing to show that if she had done so she would not have received the purchase money on delivery of the deed.

Waldron v. Murphy, 40 Mich. 668, is a case in which the legal principles here involved are well exemplified. There, one Ashbaugh mortgaged certain property to Waldron, and when considerably in arrears tendered payment to the latter's bank, which had no authority to collect, the cashier declining to accept the money, and requesting that he await Waldron's return. On learning that Waldron was in town they went in search for him, and—

"they met Waldron in the street not far from his house, going with a sister to visit a neighbor. The witnesses do not agree precisely on what took place, but in most respects concur. St. John somewhat abruptly referred to the two mortgages held by Mr. Waldron and told him there was the money to pay them. Mr. Waldron intimated that he might take it on one of the mortgages, but that he had told Mr. Ashbaugh, the owner of the land, that the other might run if he wanted it to. On the tender being pressed he objected that his house was not the place where he did business and that he did it at the bank. He said he could not see to count money in the street. On their proposing to go to the bank he objected it was past bank hours and it would be closed. They told him Stewart had agreed to keep the bank open, and Mr. St. John asked him, 'Will you take the money?' and he refused, and said he would be at the bank in the morning, and if they had any business with him he would attend to it then. They then returned and made a tender to Stewart, and, on his declining for want of authority, deposited the money, not in his bank, but in another bank, to the credit of Mr. Armstrong, but designated as Ashbaugh money. The next morning Mr. Waldron sent for and had an interview with St. John and offered to receive the money, but it was never paid, and the parties saw fit to rely on their tender. It has been held in this state that a willful and absolute refusal to accept a lawful tender discharges a lien. But there is no equity in attempting to avoid both lien and debt, and the security should not be discharged by any action in which the conduct of the creditor is not unjustifiable. If the refusal of a tender is not unreasonable or absolute, we do not think a mortgage is cut off by it. [Citing many cases.] In the present case, upon a review of the facts, we think the tender was not made under circumstances entitling it to be enforced in this way, if at all."

In the instant case, even though the agreement of the parties to delay the final decision by the respondent until the 8th be disregarded, such a delay under the circumstances was not unreasonable upon his part. The tendor was entitled to a limited but sufficient period in which to investigate any question involved, whether of law or of fact, and to each a conclusion concerning his rights.

It is important to note that on the 5th, when the offer was made, counsel for respondent expressed willingness to give an answer on the following day, but appellant's counsel stated that this would be inconvenient for him, and suggested that the determination of the matter be delayed until the 8th. The 7th being Sunday, only one day intervened which respondent and his counsel might be expected to devote to consideration of the matter.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re GRAHAM'S ESTATE. (Civ. 4221.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 13, 1923.)

1. Charities ☞1—"Charitable trusts" defined.

A charitable trust is constituted by a donation in trust for establishing or carrying on an institution dedicated to the welfare of the public or of some definite class or part of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Charitable Trust.]

2. Charities ☞7—Detailed description of particular beneficiary and manner of application of funds held not necessary to creation of trust.

In the creation of a charitable trust, it is not necessary that the particular beneficiary be named, or the manner of the application of the trust funds be described in detail by the donor.

3. Wills ☞685—Devise to church providing that income only be used in maintaining property, held devise for charitable purpose.

A devise to a church of property in trust, the income only of which is to be used in keeping the church property in good condition, held devise for charitable purpose only.

4. Constitutional law ☞205(1)—Statutes ☞74(1), 82—Statute relating to validation of charitable devises by waiver of heirs held not unconstitutional.

Civ. Code, § 1313, as amended by St. 1919, p. 324, permitting, by waiver in writing, parent, husband, wife, child, or grandchild to validate a charitable devise of more than one-third of an estate, where, before its amendment, such devise was prohibited, held not to violate Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring uniform operation of laws of a general nature, section 21, relating to granting of privileges or immunities, and article 4, § 25, subd. 12, relating to passage of local or special laws, and subdivision 19, prohibiting granting of exclusive privileges, as against the contention that it selects certain classes of heirs and grants to them a privilege not accorded to other heirs, the privilege consisting of the right to say whether or not they will be bound by the terms of the amendment.

5. Statutes ☞74(1)—Statute relating to restrictions on testamentary disposition with reference to charities held not void as not operating uniformly.

Civ. Code, § 1313, as amended by St. 1919, p. 324, relating to restrictions on testamentary disposition of property to charities, is not unconstitutional merely because it permits testators with no nearer relatives than nephews or nieces to devise one-third of their estate to charities, if they make their wills 30 days prior to death, when it denies to testators of the same class the right to leave any of their property to charities, if they happen to have made their wills 6 months prior thereto, since the statute operates no differently upon one testator who has relatives other than parents, a husband, or wife, children or grandchildren, than upon any other testator similarly situated as to the possession of relatives.

6. Wills ☞3—Designation of charities permitted to receive bequests and restrictions affecting devises to them held within legislative discretion.

In enacting Civ. Code, § 1313, as amended by St. 1919, p. 324, it was within the province of the Legislature to permit charities other than those mentioned in section 1275 to receive bequests and to provide other restrictions as the Legislature considered proper upon charitable societies affected receiving bequests.

7. Wills ☞1—Right of testamentary disposition rests in legislative discretion.

The right of testamentary disposition is not one granted by the Constitution, but rests in the legislative will.

8. Constitutional law ☞70(3)—Court may not consider wisdom of statute when its purpose is valid.

The purpose of Civ. Code, § 1313, as amended by St. 1919, p. 324, relating to testamentary disposition of property to charitable institutions, being to safeguard those who might naturally become the objects of a testator's bounty from inadvertance or undue zeal upon his part for a charity, and such a purpose being valid, courts may not consider the wisdom of this or any other measure within the jurisdiction of the Legislature to enact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Contest proceedings in the matter of the estate of Sarah J. Graham, deceased. From an order of distribution, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank C. Sherrer, of Independence, for appellants.

M. F. Mitchell, of Los Angeles, amicus curiae.

Kimball Fletcher and A. P. Thomson, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Big Pine.

W. A. Lamar, of Independence, for administrator.

CRAIG, J. While the estate of Sarah J. Graham, deceased, was in process of probate, and within the time allowed by law, the appellants made written objections and contested the distribution of the residue thereof. Upon a hearing of the objections and contest, the court denied the same, and ordered the distribution of the residue of the estate under the terms of the will. From this order the contestants take this appeal, and especially except to that part of the order distributing the residue under the terms of the will to the trustees of the Big Pine Methodist Episcopal Church.

The second paragraph of the will reads as follows:

"I, believing that I have no lawful heirs, give, devise and bequeath unto the trustees of the Big Pine Methodist Episcopal Church, of the Town of Big Pine, County of Inyo, State of California, to be held in trust by them and from which, the income only, is to be used in keeping the property, of the aforesaid church in good condition, and also in making any necessary improvements, the principal being kept intact, the following: * * *

It is urged that this part of the will is invalid for two reasons: First, that it empowers the trustees of the church to devote the trust funds to other than charitable purposes; second, that it establishes a perpetuity for purposes other than charitable, and therefore violates the statute against perpetuities. The appellants insist that in providing that the income from the trust estate is to be used "in keeping the property of the aforesaid church in good condition, and also in making any necessary improvements," the will permits and provides for other than charitable uses.

[1] Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, the law in this state is settled without conflict that a charitable trust is constituted by a donation in trust for establishing or carrying on an institution dedicated to the welfare of the public or of some definite class or part of it. Such an institution we must assume the Big Pine Methodist Episcopal Church to be. People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 45 Pac. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269. For contestants have not questioned the validity of the will by denial of the church's capacity to take as a charitable institution.

[2] In the creation of a charitable trust it is not necessary nor usually possible that the particular beneficiary be named or the manner of the application of the trust funds be described in detail by the donor.

[3] We think the purpose of keeping up the property of the church is sufficiently definite in these respects. As we construe the will, the devise is one for charitable purposes only, and therefore not subject to the objection that it permits the trust funds to be applied to uses contrary to law.

Since it must be conceded that the church itself is a charity within the definition of that term, surely "keeping the property of the aforesaid church in good condition" is a use of the funds devised for charitable purposes. This proposition seems self-evident. In a quotation from 5 R. C. L. 327, par. 50, contained in appellant's brief, it is said:

"A gift to a church is a charitable one, for it is settled law that a Christian church, lawfully existing, is a charity within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth. The very term 'church' imports an organization for religious purposes, and the property given to it eo nomine in the absence of all declaration of trust or use must, by necessary implication, be intended to be given to promote the purposes for which a church is instituted, the most prominent of which is the public worship of God. It follows that the legitimate use by a church of property so given must result in its application for the benefit of those who attend upon, or are within the sphere of the influence of, the services of the church, by bringing them under the influence of religion. * * * It is therefore clear that gifts for the erection, maintenance, and repair of the church buildings create charitable uses." (Italics ours.)

If it is judicially determined that the "legitimate use" by a church of property given to it must result in a charity, it seems certain that the keeping up of that same church property is a charitable use of the funds so employed. It is said by Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, § 1023, par. 3:

"Gifts, devises and bequests in trust for educational purposes are valid, since they are all clearly within the spirit of the statute. This class embraces all trusts for the founding, endowing, and supporting schools and other similar institutions, which are not strictly private."

The following gifts were held to be for charitable purposes, and valid: For the erection and maintenance of a church (Appeal of Mack, 71 Conn. 122, 41 Atl. 242); for the erection of a chapel and maintenance of mission (Appeal of Eliot, 74 Conn. 586, 51 Atl. 558); to a church for improvements (French v. Calkins, 252 Ill. 243, 96 N. E. 877).

Again, in section 1021 of Pomeroy on Equity Jurisprudence, par. 1, the author says: "The support and propagation of religion is clearly a 'charitable use.' This includes gifts for the erection, maintenance, and repair of church edifices," etc. Churches, like other institutions, are legally dependent upon funds to accomplish their charitable purposes, and require property to function as charitable organizations. Appellant is entirely correct in his contention, which is amply sustained by numerous authorities cited by him, and not contested by any cases that have been called to our attention, that in order to create a valid charitable trust in perpetuity, the language employed must require the fund to be expended for charitable purposes only. On the other hand, none of those authorities go so far as to say that the keeping up of property, which is itself necessarily involved in charitable work, is not also exclusively for a charitable purpose. We conclude that although it be conceded that the gift in question would permit the use of the fund devised to keep up property other than the church edifice and grounds, as for instance a rooming house, or an office building, it would still be valid as for a charitable purpose, for the income of the property thus sustained would inevitably, and because of its belonging to a charitable institution, functioning for charitable purposes, be a charitable use.

[4] Appellant further insists that the amendment to section 1313 of the Civil Code enacted by the Legislature in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 324), is unconstitutional and void. The devise here in question would have been prohibited by the law as it stood prior to this amendment, because it gives more than one-third of the residue of the estate for charitable purposes. Section 1313 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1919, reads as follows:

"Provided, however, that nothing in this section contained shall apply to bequests or devises made by will executed at least six months prior to the death of a testator who leaves no parent, husband, wife, child or grandchild, or when all of such heirs shall have by writing, executed at least six months prior to his death, waived the restriction contained herein."

Appellant concedes that the testatrix did not leave any parent, child or grandchild, and that the will was made more than six months prior to her death, hence, that if the amendment of 1919 is constitutional the devise is valid. The appellant's contention that the amendment is unconstitutional is based upon the claim that it violates section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, which provides that "all laws of a general nature have a uniform operation," and also that it is contrary to section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution, which reads, "nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens." And further, it conflicts with the provision of subdivision 12, § 25, of art. 4 of the Constitution, which provides: "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: Affecting the estates of deceased persons, minors, or other persons under legal disabilities." And, lastly, that said amendment is contrary to subdivision 19 of the last-named section and article of the Constitution, which prohibits "granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity."

Appellant's principal contention, as expressed in the brief, is, that the statute selects certain classes of heirs, to wit, parents husbands, wives, children and grandchildren, and grants to them a privilege not accorded to other heirs. It is said that this privilege consists of the right to say whether or not they will be bound by the terms of the amendment. It is obvious that this argument is unsound, because in exercising the right to waive in writing the prohibition against the devise of more than one-third of an estate for charitable purposes, the parents or other heirs designated are acting, not opposed to, but in accord with, and pursuant to, the amendment.

[5] But it is further insisted that there is no apparent reason why all heirs, as well as parents, husbands, wives, children, and grandchildren, should not be extended the privilege of consenting to the devise of the whole of the estate for charitable purposes. The classes of heirs which the Legislature has selected as recipients of this authority are those whom experience teaches might reasonably be regarded as the most natural objects of the testator's bounty. The distinction between them and other relatives in this regard, as well as the matter of nearness in consanguinity, is sufficiently marked to make the matter one for the exercise of legislative discretion. This being so, the courts have no right to question the wisdom of the statute.

Amicus curiæ presents a different theory for contesting the constitutionality of section 1313, Civil Code. He agrees with respondent that this section may be regarded as one classifying testators and not heirs; he claims that the section divides testators into three classes, as follows:

"(1) Testators who leave no heirs; (2) testators who leave a parent, husband, wife, child, or grandchild; and (3) testators who leave heirs no nearer than nephews or nieces."

And, further, that it is not uniform in its operation upon these belonging to the third class; therefore that it is unconstitutional because:

"It permits testators with no nearer relatives than nephews or nieces to devise one-third of their estates to charity if they make their wills thirty (30) days prior to death when it denies to testators of the same class the right to leave any of their property to charity if they happen to have made their wills six months prior thereto."

We are unable to follow this reasoning. The statute operates no differently upon one testator, who has relatives other than parents, a husband or wife, children, or grandchildren, than upon any other testator similarly situated as to the possession of relatives. If the argument advanced by amicus curiæ is valid, it would apply to all statutes placing a time limit upon the performance of any act. For instance, the law requiring a creditor to present his claim against the estate of a deceased person, within a certain period after notice, would be subject to the charge that it does not operate uniformly; this would be the case, according to the contention urged, because one creditor who presents his claim in time will have it allowed, and another who is late in filing it with the executor, must be refused and fail to be paid, perhaps a just debt, and yet both may be creditors of the same class.

No one has ever doubted the right of the Legislature to say that, to be valid, a nuncupative will must be made during the last illness of the testator, or on the day of his death. Yet such provisions necessarily result in some attempted oral directions as to the disposition of personal property being regarded as valid and others as void, although differing only in point of time when made. In such cases also the contingency upon which the difference depends is death, and, like that resulting in the instances supposed by the brief of amicus curiae, the happening of the event is entirely beyond the control of the testator.

[6-8] Section 1313 of the Civil Code permits charities other than those named in section 1275, Civil Code, to receive bequests. At the same time it has provided such restrictions as the Legislature considered proper upon the charitable corporations or societies affected receiving gifts. This is a matter wholly within its province. Bennalack v. Richards, 116 Cal. 405, 48 Pac. 622; Estate of Comassi, 107 Cal. 1, 40 Pac. 15, 28 L. R. A. 414. Nor is this an instance where the Legislature has enacted a regulation without conceivable reason and in derogation of substantial rights. The right of testamentary disposition is not one granted by the Constitution, but rests in the legislative will. Estate of Walker, 110 Cal. 387, 42 Pac. 815, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104. It is plain that the purpose of section 1313 of the Civil Code was to safeguard those who might naturally become the objects of a testator's bounty from inadvertence or undue zeal upon his part for a charity. This is a reason consistent with the policy of the trend of statutory enactments in this state and elsewhere. Courts may not consider the wisdom of this or any measure within the jurisdiction of the Legislature to enact. We perceive no valid ground for questioning its constitutionality.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC FEED CO. v. KENNEL.
(Civ. 4335.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 23, 1923.)

1. Sales ⇨441(3)—Finding that seller delivered pulp inferior to that agreed on and that it injured cattle held supported by evidence.

Finding that seller agreed to deliver beet pulp of good quality and in good condition, but that the buyer received pulp of an inferior quality and unfit for feeding purposes, and that injury and death of cattle were due thereto, held supported by the evidence.

2. Sales ⇨261(6)—Representation that beet pulp was "number 1" and "first class" meant it was of good quality.

Representation by seller of beet pulp that it was "number 1" and "first class" was representation that it was of good quality and in good condition, and was not of inferior quality, damaged, off grade, in bad condition, injurious, unsafe, or unfit for feeding purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First Class.]

3. Sales ⇨260—Knowledge of truth or falsity of seller making representation immaterial.

A seller, representing that beet pulp was of good quality, must make good his representation, irrespective of his knowledge of the truth or falsity of his statement.

4. Witnesses ⇨271(1)—Witness having no relation to writing cannot be cross-examined regarding its contents.

A witness, being neither the author of nor having produced a paper purporting to be a chemical analysis, and having no relation thereto, cannot be cross-examined regarding its contents.

5. Sales ⇨440(3)—Tags showing chemical elements of pulp not admissible in evidence, when no issue supported thereby.

Tags on each bag of pulp sold and used for feeding purposes, showing the quantity of the several chemical elements as required by statute, are not admissible in evidence, where the issue is whether it contained harmful ingredients, when the tags do not show the absence of other elements deleterious to animal life, and when no issue involves the question of the chemical elements.

6. Evidence ⇨137—That seller told others that beet pulp was off grade admissible on question of knowledge.

Where plaintiff, suing for price of beet pulp, denied knowledge that it was unfit for feeding purposes, evidence that persons from whom he purchased were told the pulp was off grade was properly admitted, though perhaps subject to motion to strike, if not connected.

7. Trial ⇨90—Evidence admitted over objection when no motion made to strike held not error.

Where testimony as to transaction between third persons was properly admitted over objection, but on completion of the testimony it was not connected, but no motion to strike was made, there was no error.

8. Trial ⇨66—Showing of due diligence necessary to reopen case for further evidence.

A showing of due diligence must be made to reopen a case for the purpose of offering further testimony of a witness who has testified.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Feed Company against Mrs. Joseph Kennel. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

I. M. Peckham, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John D. Willard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover a judgment for the purchase price of beet pulp sold and delivered. Judgment was awarded the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The plaintiff's complaint alleged that the plaintiff "sold and delivered to defendant goods, wares, and merchandise," etc. In her answer the defendant pleaded as follows:

"Admits that on the 15th day of December, 1920, defendant ordered from plaintiff three hundred (300) sacks of beet pulp at the agreed price of forty and ⁵⁰/₁₀₀ ($40.50) dollars per ton, but denies that the beet pulp delivered by plaintiff to the defendant was the same as ordered by defendant; that the beet pulp delivered to her was damaged and of an inferior quality and unfit for use. Defendant further avers that on the said 15th day of December, 1920, said plaintiff agreed to furnish and supply defendant from the Salinas Mills beet pulp of good quality, in good condition and fit for use; that on the contrary plaintiff delivered to defendant, not from the Salinas Mills, but from a firm in South San Francisco, who had sold the same to plaintiff as damaged pulp, an inferior quality, and unfit and unsafe to be fed to cows; that some of said pulp was fed by defendant to her cows, and seventeen (17) of them became sick, and four (4) of which number died. Denies that the defendant purchased or agreed to purchase from the plaintiff the beet pulp described and set forth in plaintiff's complaint herein, and delivered by plaintiff to defendant."

The defendant also pleaded a counterclaim, in which she alleged the same defective and bad condition of the beet pulp, her injuries by reason of the use thereof, and asked damages in the sum of $2,000. The trial court made findings which included, among others, paragraph 2, which is as follows:

"(2) That on or about the 15th day of December, 1920, at Visitation, in the county of San Mateo, state of California, plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant at her place of business at Visitation, in the county of San Mateo, state of California, three hundred (300) sacks of beet pulp from the Salinas Mills of good quality and in good condition, at the agreed price of forty and $\frac{50}{100}$ (\$40.50) dollars per ton; that thereafter, and on or about said last-mentioned date, said plaintiff delivered to said defendant at her place of business three hundred (300) sacks of beet pulp, weighing 37,500 pounds, as alleged in said plaintiff's complaint; that the beet pulp so delivered by plaintiff to defendant was not, and is not, the kind or quality ordered by defendant or of the quality or kind which plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to defendant; that it was, and is, of an inferior and different quality, was damaged, and was not from, nor the product of, the Salinas Mills; that the same was off grade, in bad condition, injurious, unsafe and unfit to be fed to defendant's cows, or to be used for feeding purposes."

[1] In its brief the appellant attacks said finding as not being supported by the evidence. Points 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7 attack the findings, one phrase or clause at a time. We think that no one of the points is well founded. Mrs. Kennel testified that she made the purchase by talking over the telephone to Mr. Code, an agent of the plaintiff. She said that she generally used the best beet pulp she could buy for milk cows; that she generally used beet pulp from the Larowe beet pulp factory, which has a place at Salinas and one at Los Angeles. Code told her that the beet pulp in question was from the Salinas factory and was number 1 quality. At another place in her testimony she testified that when she bought this beet pulp she bought it for first-class pulp; that Code told her that over the phone. In contradiction of Mrs. Kennel, the plaintiff called Mr. Code to the stand. On his direct examination he testified:

"I rang her up on the telephone and said I had a car of beet pulp that I could deliver down there—I think it was $41.50 or $40.50; I forget just what it was—in molasses. She said, 'It is all right; send it along.' I said, 'It came from Salinas.' I know now that it did not. Q. Was there anything said about the quality or grade of the beet pulp? A. Well, there is no quality on that. It is either plain or it is in molasses. * * * Mr. Riley stated it was the salvage pulp from the fire in Salinas. Q. That is the only conversation you had with Mr. Riley, what you have related here? A. You see, you specify beet pulp as beet pulp. It is either plain or in molasses. You cannot state as to the quality. There is no quality to it. It is either one thing or the other. Q. But it can be good or bad, can't it? A. Yes, sir; sure. Q. And you know, if it went through the fire, the chemicals would affect it? A. Not according to the analysis. Q. Do you know whether or not this was beet pulp that was rescued from the fire? A. That I did not know."

[2] In the first place, it will be noted that Mr. Code does not directly contradict Mrs. Kennel. Instead of stating the words she used and the words he used, he lapses into a generalization regarding trade descriptions of beet pulp. Mrs. Kennel testified that Code had represented the beet pulp as "number 1" and as "first class." Those expressions are synonymous with, and include, "good quality" and "good condition." Roget's Thesaurus, par. 648. Those same expressions negative "inferior quality," "damaged," "off grade," "bad condition," "injurious," and "unsafe," and "unfit for feeding purposes." Roget's Thesaurus, par. 649. The defendant fed beet pulp to her cows, both before and after feeding the carload which is the subject-matter of this suit, and in so doing she had no trouble about the cows getting sick. Mr. Allen, a witness called by the plaintiff, on cross-examination stated:

"I have been in the stock business since I was a little child, and I have fed all kinds of feed, and I have never found beet pulp injurious to any animal, if fed in moderation."

Almost immediately after the carload was received from the plaintiff, the servants of the defendant commenced to feed the same to the defendant's cows, and almost immediately thereafter the cows commenced to sicken. Seventeen in all became sick, their udders commenced to swell, and during the period of the sickness many of the cows dried up and had to be replaced. Four of the cows, of the reasonable value of $125, did not recover from the sickness, but died. The defendant continued to feed the beet pulp purchased from the plaintiff for a period of 8 or 10 days; then that beet pulp was not fed any more. On the other hand, the defendant purchased from another party a different lot of beet pulp, and proceeded to feed to the cows the same classes of feeds in the same quantity at the same time and in the same manner ordinarily followed by her. Immediately the sick cows commenced to recover, and no other cows sickened or died, and the defendant had no further trouble.

[3] In the meantime the defendant notified the plaintiff of the troubles she was encountering, and advised the plaintiff that the rest of the beet pulp was at her place, subject to the order of the plaintiff. At the time of the trial the defendant testified that the remaining portion of the carload was still in her shed, and was still subject to the order of the plaintiff. Under these circumstances we think it is immaterial whether the carload of pulp came from the Salinas Mills, or did not come from those mills, and that the finding on that subject is immaterial. Furthermore, that the findings "that the pulp delivered is of inferior quality and damaged," "that the pulp delivered was in bad condition, injurious, unsafe, and unfit to be used for feed for cows," are sustained by the evidence which we have delineated. It may be that the finding "that plaintiff well knew the pulp delivered was damaged and unfit to be fed and used by cows or cattle" was not supported by the evidence. But, as we have recited above, there was testimony that the plaintiff's agent represented the beet pulp as number one. The plaintiff was bound to make good the representation. It is immaterial that the warranter did not know whether his statement was true or false. 35 Cyc. 378. The finding "that the injury and death of defendant's cattle was from eating and feeding on the pulp" is supported by the evidence which we have recited above.

[4] During the trial the plaintiff produced a paper purporting to be a chemical analysis of the pulp. The individual who signed the paper did not appear as a witness. The plaintiff complains because the trial court did not permit the plaintiff to cross-examine Mr. Riley on the contents of that paper. He was not the author of it, had not produced it, and bore no relation to it. The ruling was clearly correct.

[5] Pursuant to a state statute, each bag of pulp had attached to it a tag showing that the pulp contained in the bag was composed of a certain quantity of each of several chemical elements. The plaintiff sought to introduce the tags in evidence. An objection was sustained. The ruling was correct; the evidence was clearly immaterial. No issue in the case involved the question whether the pulp contained those elements, and the tags did not even purport to show that the pulp did not contain certain other elements which would be deleterious to animal life.

[6, 7] The plaintiff presented the whole case as though it was wholly uninformed regarding any fact which would tend to put the plaintiff on notice that the pulp might not be fit to feed to dairy cows. Mr. Riley, acting for a former owner of the pulp, had sold it to Allen & Pyle, from whom the plaintiff purchased it. The defendant called him as a witness, and asked him if he had informed Allen & Pyle that the pulp was off grade. The plaintiff objected; the objection was overruled. The ruling in itself was not erroneous. However, it may be that the testimony was not connected, and that a motion to strike out should have been granted; but no such motion was made.

[8] As we have shown above, Mr. Riley was in court as a witness, and was examined to some extent by the plaintiff and by the defendant. After the case had been tried and submitted, the plaintiff learned that Mr. Riley had some information which the plaintiff desired to introduce in evidence. The plaintiff thereafter made a motion to reopen the case for the purpose of calling Mr. Riley as a witness. The motion was denied. The court did not err in denying the motion. The plaintiff had made no showing of due diligence.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

DAY v. LAUGHLIN et al. (Civ. 4040.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1923.)

1. Brokers ⇨37—Evidence held to sustain finding as to inability of principal represented by confidential agent to act for himself.

In an action to recover profits made by a confidential agent, evidence held to sustain a finding that plaintiff, at the time of entering into the transaction and continuously for more than 10 years past, had been afflicted with palsy, which disease, together with old age, had rendered him incapable of attending to his business or managing his property.

2. Brokers ⇨8(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding as to existence of agency.

In an action to recover profits made by a confidential agent out of a real estate transaction, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendant at the time of transaction was the general agent and trusted confidential adviser of plaintiff in all matters pertaining to plaintiff's property and business affairs.

3. Brokers ⇨8(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that defendant negotiating sale of land, acted for plaintiff and not for himself under an option to purchase.

In an action to recover secret profits made by a confidential agent in a real estate transaction, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendant was agent for plaintiff and not a purchaser under his option.

4. Brokers ⇨37—Letters written by agent held admissible to show confidential nature of agency, though written after transaction complained of.

In an action to recover secret profits made by a confidential agent in negotiating a sale of real property, the admission in evidence of letters written by the agent after the date of the transaction involved, as tending to establish the confidence reposed in defendant by plaintiff at the time of the transaction, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Alfred Day against William T. Laughlin, Deane Laughlin, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. B. Bigler, of Santa Maria, for appellants.
F. J. Feeney, of Santa Maria, and E. W. Squier, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The evidence showed without dispute that plaintiff gave to defendant William T. Laughlin an option to purchase certain real property for a consideration of $10,000, deed to be made to Laughlin or to such person as he might designate, and that Laughlin sold the property to defendant Filippini for $21,612, paid to plaintiff $10,000, and kept the excess. The action was instituted to recover the amount retained by Laughlin, upon the theory that he was the confidential agent and adviser of plaintiff, and plaintiff's special agent for the sale upon commission of the property described in the option. Deane Laughlin was made a party defendant, for the reason that William T. Laughlin, his relative, had conveyed to him a part of the avails of the transaction with Filipponi. The latter was made a defendant because, at the time the complaint was filed, he had not paid the entire consideration for the purchase of the land. He later paid into court the amount yet due, and was not an active party to the litigation. Judgment went for plaintiff, and the defendants William T. and Deane Laughlin appeal. It will be understood henceforth that all references to the appellant in the singular contemplate appellant William T. Laughlin.

With two exceptions, the point made by appellants are that certain findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence. These findings, however, are so amply sustained by the record that we shall not be at pains to refer at great length to the facts developed at the trial. The evidence quoted in the briefs, a large part of it uncontradicted, and much of it coming from the lips of appellant and from letters written by him, shows that the judgment is eminently equitable and just. From the record presented we cannot doubt that appellant was guilty of a shameful and heartless breach of the confidence which respondent had reposed in him.

[1] It is first contended that the evidence does not support a finding that "continuously for more than 10 years last past the plaintiff * * * has been and still is afflicted with palsy, and on and continuously for several years preceding" the date of the option, "by reason of said disease and old age, and greatly enfeebled physically and mentally and by reason thereof, incapable of attending to his business or of managing his property." There was testimony that respondent had been palsied for 15 years, that he had been in poor health for that length of time, that "for a good many years" he had been unable to attend to his business and had attended to none of it, and that he got about at all with great difficulty. The trial judge, of course, had an opportunity to observe respondent's age and physical and mental condition. While the latter was on the witness stand he was questioned thus by the judge:

"Q. How long have you been that way? A. I have been that way for 10 years, easily. Q. As bad as you are now? A. As bad as I am now. Q. Are you not able to sit quietly at all? A. No."

We ourselves are able to determine, from some of respondent's answers on the witness stand, that he was not at the time mentally alert.

[2] Another contention of appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding that, at the time of the giving of the option, for more than one year prior thereto, and until several months after the consummation of the sale to Filipponi, appellant was the "general agent and trusted confidential adviser of the plaintiff in all matters pertaining to plaintiff's property and business affairs." There is testimony in the record that when the option was given appellant was engaged to be married to respondent's daughter; that he had for some time visited the Day home three times a week, sometimes every day, and that he frequently took meals at respondent's family table; that he sometimes collected rents for respondent; that he advised respondent "as to the value of different pieces [of property] that he had, * * * and told him which he thought would in time bring him the best income, and which would give him the best results for his money"; and that he twice went to Winnemucca, Nev., on the business of respondent. The record also shows a considerable number of letters written by appellant, signed by him in his own name, and all relating to the business of respondent.

[3] It is also claimed that the evidence fails to sustain a finding that appellant was the agent of respondent for the sale of the property described in the option. There was evidence to show that appellant asked respondent to give him the first chance at the land if he determined to sell; that there followed a conversation between them as to how much appellant could get for the land; that appellant advised respondent to sell; that respondent first offered appellant a 5 per cent. commission for making a sale, but appellant said, "No; he did not want to take it on a commission basis; he did not like to do things that way; he would rather get the commission above the sum" respondent would get; that, in a discussion as to price, appellant said he could not sell the property at $20,000, nor at $15,000, but that he thought he could sell at $10,000, and that he would try to sell it for that figure. Respondent's daughter, appellant's fiancée, testified:

"He said he couldn't sell this piece of land for him unless he gave him this option, because he said, 'If I go to a man and ask him if he will buy this certain piece of land, and tell him Mr. Day wants to sell it, he will say, "What authority have you to sell it for him?" and if I say I have an option on it he will know the contract will be binding.'"

The option was signed a few days later.

Other findings are objected to as being unsupported by the evidence, but either the contentions of respondent as to those findings are disposed of by what we have already said or they find upon immaterial matters.

Appellants contend that the pleadings present no issue as to the mental and physical condition of respondent. This claim is made because of the trial court's finding in that regard. An examination of the pleadings discloses that such an issue was sufficiently presented. Even if there were no such issue, however, the merits of the appeal would not be affected by the fact. Respondent was entitled to judgment upon the evidence and the findings of the trial court as to appellant's flagrant breach of his duty as the agent of respondent, entirely aside from any question as to the latter's age or condition of health.

[4] It is insisted that the trial court erred in receiving in evidence certain letters written by respondent. These were offered for the purpose of showing the relation of trust and confidence existing between respondent and appellant up to the time when the former discovered the fraud which had been practiced upon him, which was 8 or 9 months after the sale to Filipponi; the earliest of the letters having been written some time after the granting of the option. The contention of appellants is that letters written after that event are immaterial. The point is without merit. The letters all related to the business of respondent. One of them, evidently written to a tenant of respondent, may be taken as a sample. It runs:

"In re our conversation of yesterday. I again took up the matter of a doorway in the place you now occupy, with Mr. Day. After careful consideration of your request, we deem it necessary that permission be refused you to make the change."

Letters such as this, even if they were written after the date of the option, were properly admitted as in some degree showing the confidence reposed in appellant by respondent at the time the paper was executed. Ward v. Andrews, 44 Cal. App. 390, 186 Pac. 605. It is to be remembered that appellant was affianced to Miss Day during a continuous period running from before the date of the option to about the time of the discovery of the fraud which appellant had practiced upon her father. The actions of the parties during that entire period would surely indicate their state of mind toward each other at the time the option was granted. The trial court did not err in admitting the letters in evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

GOULD v. GOULD. (Civ. 4172.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 24, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Findings supported by substantial evidence not disturbed.

Where findings are supported by evidence of a substantial character, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment merely because there is other evidence which, if true, would have sustained a different finding of the facts.

2. Divorce §116—Evidence under cross-complaint as to cruelty by wife to husband's daughters properly stricken where not known to husband until five or six years afterwards.

In a wife's action for divorce, wherein the husband filed a cross-complaint alleging extreme cruelty, it was not error to strike out evidence as to mistreatment of defendant's daughters by plaintiff, where the incidents, if they occurred, were not known to defendant until five or six years after they occurred.

3. Divorce §252—Award to plaintiff of 70 per cent. of community property held not abuse of discretion.

An award of 70 per cent. of the community property to the wife in her suit on the ground of adultery and extreme cruelty, was not beyond the reasonable discretion of the court since Civ. Code, § 146, provides that where divorce is granted for adultery or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties as the court, from the facts and the condition of the parties, may deem just.

4. Divorce §253—Finding that certain buildings were community property held supported by evidence.

In a wife's action against her husband for divorce, a finding that certain houses constituting community property were paid for with funds earned by the parties after marriage rather than out of secreted funds kept by the husband as testified by him, held supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Summerfield, Judge.

Action by Eleanor A. Gould against Charles T. Gould for divorce with cross-complaint by defendant. From an interlocutory decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James P. Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal by defendant from an interlocutory decree entered in favor of the plaintiff. In her complaint plaintiff set out a cause of action for divorce on account of extreme cruelty of defendant towards her, and also as a separate cause of action made certain charges of adultery, which she alleged had been committed by the defendant. The defendant, in addition to his answer denying the various charges made against him in the complaint, filed a cross-complaint, whereby he demanded a divorce from the plaintiff on account of sundry acts of extreme cruelty of plaintiff towards him. By her answer the plaintiff denied the charges made against her in the cross-complaint.

Under his specification of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of fact, appellant has covered the principal findings relating to the charges of extreme cruelty set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and also those relating to the charges of adultery. Counsel for appellant concedes that the plaintiff gave testimony in support of substantially all of her allegations of extreme cruelty, and that the plaintiff's son (15 years old) testified in support of some of those allegations. We have examined this evidence. The corroboration given by the testimony of the plaintiff's son includes many facts which tend to establish the charge that defendant was guilty of extreme cruelty, as that offense is defined by law. There is other corroborative testimony besides that of those two witnesses.

It is not necessary to discuss appellant's claim that there is no evidence whatever to sustain the charges of adultery. All of the relief granted by the decree has a sufficient foundation in the facts authorizing a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty.

[1] Appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings which (omitting the details) determine that the charges of extreme cruelty of the plaintiff toward the defendant, alleged in the cross-complaint, are untrue. Cross-complainant did give testimony which, if uncontradicted and duly corroborated, would sustain the allegations of the cross-complaint. Certain corroborative testimony was given by a daughter of cross-complainant and by some other witnesses. On the other hand, the accusations made by cross-complainant against his wife were denied by her, and were opposed by other evidence. There was also very positive testimony given by a former employer of appellant impeaching the reputation of appellant for integrity and veracity. The case is thus brought completely within the common rule that where findings are supported by evidence of a substantial character, this court will not reverse the judgment merely because there is other evidence which, if true, would have sustained a different finding of the facts.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in striking out parts of the testimony of three witnesses "bearing upon the character of the plaintiff, and upon her attitude toward the defendant and his daughter." Principally, these rulings related to incidents of alleged mistreatment of these daughters by the plaintiff, which, if they occurred, were not known to cross-complainant until five or six years after they occurred. We cannot see that any prejudicial error occurred in striking out that evidence.

[3] The court, in the interlocutory decree, made a statement of the character and value of the community property of the parties, and awarded to the plaintiff 70. per cent.

thereof. Appellant claims that the court was not justified in awarding that proportion of the community property to the plaintiff. Where a divorce is granted on the ground of adultery or extreme cruelty it is provided by section 146 of the Civil Code that "the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just." We are satisfied that the division of the community property, as provided in said decree, was made in the exercise of a reasonable discretion by the court. Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 7, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107; Meyer v. Meyer, 184 Cal. 687, 195 Pac. 387.

[4] Finally, appellant contends that the evidence does not sustain the findings of the court as to the community property in this, that the court erred in determining that three houses which, after the marriage of plaintiff and defendant, were built upon a lot belonging to the defendant, and which are together worth the sum of $4,000, are community property. In this instance, as in others to which we have referred, appellant makes the mistake of insisting that findings are not sustained by the evidence, whereas the record contains evidence abundantly supporting the findings, although there is also abundant evidence which, if the court had believed it, would have sustained a contrary finding. Thus we have here testimony of appellant that he paid for these houses with money which he had at the time of his marriage, and which he had kept in a safe deposit box. On cross-examination he said that he paid for them partly by cash and partly by check; that he had several banks where he kept money. He did not remember which bank he put that money in. On the other hand, plaintiff testified that the money paid for the construction of these houses was earned between the time of the marriage and the time of the construction of the houses. "I don't know exactly what the defendant was making; he spoke of banking not less than $100 a month—sometimes more." The defendant was a baker. The plaintiff not only kept house, but assisted in earning money. She kept a large number of rabbits and chickens, from which she made some money. The plaintiff further testified that the defendant at the time of their marriage told her that he did not have considerable money on hand, and that they limited the extent of their wedding trip because "he said he didn't have money enough ahead." At the time the houses were constructed plaintiff and appellant were living next door to the lot upon which they were built. We think that the court was well warranted in believing that these houses were paid for with funds earned after the marriage, rather than out of secreted funds kept by the defendant as testified by him.

The decree is affirmed.

DERR v. BUSICK, Judge of Superior Court.
(Civ. 2658.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 23, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error — 985—Exceptions, bill of — 51—Trial judge has wide discretion in settling bill reviewable only for abuse.

The trial judge has a wide discretion as to settling bills of exception, and it is only when such discretion clearly appears to have been abused that the higher court will intervene.

2. Mandamus — 16(1)—Writ will be refused if no wrong can be remedied or right enforced thereby.

The issuance of a writ of mandate being not altogether a matter of right, but involving the consideration of its effect in promoting justice, if it should affirmatively appear that it would be an idle thing to issue it, that thereby no wrong could possibly be remedied, or no right could possibly be enforced, or promoted, the writ will be refused.

3. Exceptions, bill of — 53(7)—Evidence as to duty of trial judge to settle bill held insufficient to justify issuance of writ of mandate.

On application for a writ of mandate to compel a trial judge to settle a bill of exceptions, evidence as to the showing made before the judge held not so clearly to show his duty to settle the bill as to justify the issuance of the writ.

4. Exceptions, bill of — 53(5)—Writ of mandate to compel settlement of bill denied for unexcused delay of three months after refusal to settle bill.

Where more than three months had elapsed after the refusal of the trial judge to settle a bill of exceptions before application for a writ of mandate to compel him to do so was made, and no excuse was offered for the delay, the writ will be denied.

Application by John O. Derr for a writ of mandate to be directed to C. O. Busick, as Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Sacramento, to require the settlement of a bill of exceptions. Writ denied.

F. W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, and A. H. Carpenter and B. M. Bainbridge, both of Stockton, for petitioner.

B. F. Driver, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. An application was made to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate commanding respondent, as judge of the superior court of Sacramento county—

"to settle and certify the bill of exceptions in the said case of John O. Derr, plaintiff, v. Charles F. Silva, defendant, tried in the superior court and now pending on appeal in this court, or that said judge show cause before this honorable court on a day to be fixed therefor, why he has not settled and certified said bill of exceptions as by law provided."

An alternative writ was issued by the Supreme Court and made returnable before this court, and upon the day set for hearing respondent appeared and filed a demurrer and an answer. The demurrer was overruled and evidence was received upon the issues made by the pleadings, and the matter has been submitted for decision. Many of the material allegations of the petition were denied by respondent either positively or upon information and belief. Upon some of the issues, it may be said, that the evidence submitted herein is conflicting, and upon others the petitioner has failed to sustain his position. It will not be necessary to notice these in detail, but we may say that the allegations, which might imply that the judge acted arbitrarily, were not only not proven, but were shown to be untrue. As an example, we may mention this averment:

"That the defendant judge admitted at the time he refused to settle the bill as aforesaid, that the said proposed bill of exceptions had been on his desk in his chambers, from the time of its delivery to him by the clerk in March, 1922, until the time of such hearing, and that he had caused no notice of the settlement thereof to be given by the clerk, until shortly before his said refusal to settle the bill as hereinbefore averred."

To the contrary, the judge testified:

"I never knew there was a bill of exceptions until Mr. Gallup (a deputy county clerk) came up with a letter in his hand, and said he had received a letter from somebody who wanted to have settled the bill of exceptions, and he asked me if I had it, so we looked, and the bill of exceptions was lying on the desk. It was about a week before the date fixed for the settlement. At that time we fixed the date on which I would hear the application to settle the bill of exceptions."

In reply to the question "Why was this matter not heard until that date?" he replied: "Because there was never any application so far as I know from any of the attorneys. That was the first I ever heard of it. I say that is as far as I know why. If there was ever any other reason, I never heard of it." We may add that there is no evidence before us tending to discredit the foregoing statements.

The reasons assigned by respondent in his answer herein for declining to settle the said proposed bill of exceptions are as follows:

"The proposed bill of exceptions had not been delivered to defendant as such judge or to the clerk of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Sacramento, within the time allowed by law, and on the ground that the amendments of defendant Silva in said case were never delivered to the clerk of said court or to said judge, and on the ground that proper notice of said hearing had not been given to defendant or his counsel in said case of Derr v. Silva; and on the further ground that plaintiff Derr in said case had been dilatory and negligent in not causing said proposed bill of exceptions to be presented to the court for allowance; and on the ground that for a period of 10 months after delivering said bill of exceptions to the clerk, plaintiff Derr in said case had neglected to call the attention of the court to said proposed bill of exceptions, and had failed for said length of time to cause the settlement of said proposed bill of exceptions to be set down for hearing."

As to the first of these, respondent's position cannot be maintained. It is based upon the theory that the service of the proposed bill and amendments, as required by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if made at all, was one day too late. The tenth day, however, fell upon Sunday, a legal holiday, and the law is that in such cases service upon the following day satisfies the requirement of the statute. Section 12, Code Civ. Proc.; Frassi v. McDonald, 122 Cal. 400, 55 Pac. 139, 772; Lancel v. Postlethwaite, 172 Cal. 326, 156 Pac. 486.

It appears that the proposed bill of exceptions was received by the clerk through the mail for the judge on Monday, March 20, 1922, which, as stated, was within 11 days of the service of the proposed amendments and was therefore in time. Whether the proposed amendments were sent with the proposed bill according to the requirement of the statute and were received by the clerk is somewhat in doubt, but the question is not decisive, and we shall consider it no further.

It is apparent that appellant was dilatory and negligent in failing for such length of time to call the attention of the trial judge to the bill and to request that a time be fixed for its settlement. It is true that he made some inquiry at the clerk's office, but he is uncertain as to the time, and he took no really definite step toward bringing the matter to a hearing until he sent J. D. MacGaughey from Stockton to Sacramento to investigate the situation. He testified:

"I went to the county clerk's office and stated my purpose in coming; that Mr. Derr told me he had sent up the bill of exceptions, and that it had been here for some time and he had heard nothing from it, and for me to get it and take it to Judge Busick, who was the judge in the case. I went inside and a deputy clerk got me the filing docket and we looked it over very carefully and we could find no trace of any such paper having been received in the office, so I asked him to get me the files and we looked those over carefully. We spread them out on the desk but there was no such paper on file. I went to Judge Busick's chambers. He said Judge Busick may have them. I told him Mr. Derr said he had sent them a long time ago. So I went to Judge Busick's court room, and I went to his chambers and they were closed, and I spoke to a man coming out of one of the other departments—I think it was the bailiff—and he told me Judge Busick was away and would not be in court during the day. I think he said he was out of town. This was the 25th or 26th of November, 1922."

It is to be observed that this was more than eight months after the proposed bill was sent to the clerk's office, and nothing further in the premises seems to have been done until the judge, finding it on his desk, as before stated, set the hearing for February 12, 1923, which was by consent changed to January 30, 1923. Moreover, the judge did not have in his possession, and never saw, the proposed amendments to the bill of exceptions, and no evidence was offered before this court to show that any effort was made to supply him with it or a copy thereof. The duty of appellant to see that the proposed amendments were brought to the attention of the judge was as imperative as that relating to the proposed bill. If without negligence on the part of appellant, the draft of these amendments had been lost and an effort was made to supply a copy, the situation might be different. But no such showing has been made here, and in view of the unexplained and unexcused failure of appellant to bring such proposed amendments to the attention of the trial judge, we could hardly be expected to command him to proceed with the settlement of the bill.

It is to be remembered, of course, that in these matters the appellant is the actor, that the duty is upon him to follow up the proceedings with diligence in order that there may be a speedy hearing of the case upon its merits.

In Miller v. Queen Ins. Co., 2 Cal. App. 267, 83 Pac. 287, it is said:

"The defendant was the moving party in the proceeding for a new trial, and the burden was at all times upon it to take whatever steps were necessary to enable the court to hear its motion. * * * Its contention that, after delivering the proposed bill and amendments to the clerk for the judge, it was not required to take any further steps toward procuring its settlement until it should receive notice that the judge had fixed a day therefor, is without support. It was its duty to ascertain when the judge should return to the city, and to obtain from him an order fixing a day for the settlement of the bill."

In Re Depeaux's Estate, 118 Cal. 522, 50 Pac. 682, it is said:

"By the rules of this court an appellant is allowed 40 days within which to file the transcript on appeal after the appeal is perfected, and the bill of exceptions, if there be one, is settled. A neglect upon the part of the appellant for the period of time to take such steps as are within his power and incumbent upon him to take for the purpose of securing the settlement of the bill is equivalent to his failure to file the transcript within the time limited."

In Dorcy v. Brodis, 153 Cal. 673, 96 Pac. 278, it was held that a delay of four months in presenting a statement and amendments for settlement justified the trial court in dismissing the motion for a new trial on account of the inexcusable inactivity in reference to the settlement of the bill. Other decisions to the same effect need not be cited.

[1] In matters of this kind the trial judge has a wide discretion, and it is only when that discretion clearly appears to have been abused that a higher court will intervene. After a delay of 10 months in bringing the proceedings to an end, with no more persuasive palliative circumstance existing than herein disclosed, we would be entirely unwarranted in holding that the trial judge abused his privilege.

[2] Moreover, the issuance of the writ of mandate is not altogether a matter of right, but it involves the consideration of its effect in promoting justice. If it should affirmatively appear that it would be an idle thing to issue it, that thereby no wrong could possibly be remedied, or no right could possibly be enforced or promoted, the court would naturally refuse to issue the writ because it would answer no legitimate purpose in the scheme of the law. For instance, if the proposed bill had been submitted to the court and an inspection of it demonstrated beyond peradventure that it did not possess even the semblance of a bill of exceptions, or utterly failed to exhibit any error on the part of the trial court, it would be our duty to decline to encourage any further trouble and expense in litigation that could not possibly result in advantage to appellant.

But the Supreme Court has gone further and imposed upon appellant the duty of presenting to the court to which the application is made the proposed bill in order that it may determine whether there is at least a disputable question of error. It was so held even in a murder case in People v. Kahl, 18 Cal. 433, wherein it was said by Chief Justice Field:

"But in all such cases it must appear that there are reasonable grounds for the appeal taken, and that it is not intended merely for delay. The papers presented to us on the present application do not contain a copy of the statement proposed, and we cannot, without its inspection, determine whether any errors in the action of the court below are alleged, which are entitled to any consideration whatever."

See, also, People v. Dickson, 46 Cal. 53; Pacific Land Association v. Hunt, 105 Cal. 202, 38 Pac. 635, and Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 Pac. 540. In the last of these, authorities are cited to the effect that "a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit to the relator, will not be enforced by mandamus," and the court approved of this principle as applied in People v. Kahl and People v. Dickson. Herein we are entirely at a loss as to the contents of said proposed bill of exceptions, as it has not been brought to our attention at all.

[3] Again, in order to justify the issuance of the writ, it must appear to the court that it was clearly the duty of the trial judge to settle the bill, but we cannot so determine without knowing what evidence was submitted to him at the hearing. Petitioner did not offer any evidence of what showing was made before the judge further than to state:

"Among the various things done was subpoenaing of the county clerk to bring in his books. After having asked the county clerk a number of questions in regard to these certain documents that were presumed to have been filed with him or sent to him and presumed to be filed, my attorney then asked the judge's permission to ask him a question, which he granted. He asked him how long he had the documents in his possession. Well, he didn't know; well, for some time; yes, for some time, some considerable length of time perhaps."

Manifestly, such showing is utterly insufficient to justify the issuance of the writ.

[4] Again, more than three months elapsed after the refusal of the judge to settle the bill before this application was made. No excuse was offered herein for the delay, and the courts look with disfavor upon such lack of diligence. Depeaux's Estate, 118 Cal. 522, 50 Pac. 682; McConoughey v. Torrence, 124 Cal. 330, 57 Pac. 81. If any reason existed why the action of the reviewing court was not invoked sooner, it should have been revealed herein.

For the foregoing reasons the peremptory writ is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

not made on date laid in complaint not variance.

A failure to show that plaintiff made his oral demands for the property on the precise date laid in the complaint is not necessarily a material variance in an action for conversion.

4. Warehousemen ⚡34(5)—Demand and refusal makes prima facie case of conversion.

Where a bailor makes proof of demand and refusal of his goods, a prima facie case of conversion by a warehouseman is made out, and the burden is on the warehouseman to account for the property.

5. Warehousemen ⚡34(5)—Evidence held insufficient to place burden on plaintiff to prove negligence of defendant.

In an action against a warehouseman for conversion of 998 boxes of apples, evidence to support the contention that they were eaten by rats is insufficient to throw burden on plaintiff to prove negligence, where, according to defendant's theory, the boxes themselves were missing, as such circumstance refuted such theory of the loss.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by Leon A. Atwood against the Southern California Ice Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action of trover to recover damages for the conversion of certain boxes of apples, which plaintiff had delivered to defendant, a warehouseman, for storage in the latter's warehouse at San Bernardino. Judgment passed for plaintiff.
Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial—a nonappealable order.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner of the boxes of apples and entitled to their possession, that he demanded possession thereof from defendant, but that the latter failed and refused to deliver the same, and that defendant unlawfully converted the property to its own use. These allegations are denied by the answer. The trial court found plaintiff's averments to be true, save that the number of boxes converted by defendant is not so great as the complaint alleges.

[1] Appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that plaintiff made demand before suit, and also the finding of conversion by defendant. It must be conceded that a demand by plaintiff before suit and a refusal by defendant were necessary to the maintenance of this action for conversion, for the apples came into defendant's possession not tortiously but with plaintiff's consent. There is evidence in the record showing the following facts:

The boxes of apples in question were delivered by plaintiff to defendant for storage some time in October of 1919. Defendant stored the apples in lots, each lot bearing an appropriate number. One of these lots was designated lot No. 392, and another lot No. 433. On March 16, 1920, defendant prepared and plaintiff signed a receipt, which recited that on that day plaintiff received from defendant 864 boxes of apples from lot 392 and 134 boxes from lot 433. It is these apples which plaintiff claims were converted by defendant to its own use. The receipt contains this phrase: "Lots Nos. 392 and 433 out." Plaintiff testified that, though he signed this receipt, he never received these boxes of apples, or any part thereof—that they were only "supposedly drawn out," and that at the time when the receipt was given he gave to defendant's local superintendent an order to ship the apples to a firm at Long Beach, but that they never were received by the Long Beach firm. He further testified that he made demands on defendant for the apples upon several occasions, but that defendant's local superintendent always told him that his company did not have them—that they had been eaten by rats. As we read the record, these demands were made orally.
The complaint alleges a particular date upon which demand was made, viz. September 24, 1920. On that day plaintiff mailed to the Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company, at Los Angeles, a letter in which he set forth the amount of his damages and demanded payment thereof. The manager of the addressee was also the manager of the defendant corporation; but the corporation to which plaintiff addressed his letter, the Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company, had nothing whatever to do with the storage of these apples, nor did the letter contain a demand for the apples. At the trial defendant's local superintendent testified that the apples had been eaten by rats.

[2, 3] The evidence was sufficient to support the finding that plaintiff made demand for his property before commencing suit. True, the letter of September 24, 1920, addressed to the Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company, was not a demand on defendant, and, were there no other evidence of a demand, we would be compelled to uphold appellant's contention that the finding of a demand before suit is not sustained by the evidence. But respondent's testimony that upon several occasions he made demands of defendant, and that the latter's local superintendent always replied that his company did not have the apples, claiming that rats had eaten them, was alone sufficient to justify the finding that a proper demand was made before the commencement of the action. No particular formality in making the demand is required. 26 R. C. L. p. 1126. There was not necessarily a material variance merely because it was not shown that plaintiff made his oral demands on the precise date laid in the complaint. Bancroft Co. v. Haslett, 106 Cal. 151, 39 Pac. 602.

[4, 5] The evidence is sufficient to justify the finding of conversion. When a plaintiff who has stored his goods with a warehouseman makes proof of a demand and refusal, a prima facie case of conversion is made out. Upon such proof alone the burden is cast upon the warehouseman to account for the property; otherwise, he will be deemed to have converted it to his own use. But if it appear that the property, when demanded, has been destroyed, as, for example, where it is shown that it has been consumed by rats or by fire, then the burden of proof will be on the bailor to show that the loss of the property was the result of negligence on the part of the warehouseman. Wilson v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 62 Cal. 164, 172. There was no proof that defendant was negligent in its care of the apples, and, if the evidence had shown without substantial contradiction that plaintiff's property had been consumed by rats, as claimed by appellant's superintendent, a reversal would be necessary. But, though the superintendent testified that rats had eaten the apples, there were circumstances to refute any such theory of loss. Besides the 998 boxes of apples in question, there were several thousand of boxes of apples on storage with defendant. Not only were the contents of respondent's 998 boxes not delivered to him on demand, but, according to appellant's theory of the facts, the wooden boxes themselves were missing. It is fair inference that not even a ravenous rodent would gnaw to the point of extinction even so toothsome a dainty as hard, dry boxwood, when the cravings of hunger could be sated from the abundance of luscious, succulent apples on store in the warehouse. Rats might destroy boxes, but it is hardly conceivable that they would entirely consume them—nails and all.

Since no theory other than the untenable one that rats had eaten them was advanced by appellant to account for its inability to redeliver to respondent his boxes of apples, it must be held that the latter's demand of possession and appellant's failure to comply therewith made out a prima facie case of conversion.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed, and the judgment is affirmed.

MEYERS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(Civ. 4179.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 23, 1923.)

1. Railroads $\S$ 350(21)—Whether guest in automobile injured in collision exercised ordinary care is for jury.

Where a guest in an automobile is injured in a railroad collision at a street crossing, the question as to whether or not he exercised ordinary care for his own safety is one for the jury.

2. Negligence $\S$ 93(1)—When negligence of one using automobile in joint enterprise imputable to others stated.

Where persons used an automobile in a joint enterprise, the negligence of one of such persons is imputed to each of the others, but except in those cases in which the relation of master and servant, or that of principal and agent is shown, there can be no such thing as imputed negligence.

3. Negligence $\S$ 93(1)—Guest in automobile injured in collision held not engaged in "joint enterprise" with driver.

Where plaintiff, a guest in an automobile, was injured in a collision, and he with the driver and a third person were on their way to visit at the home of plaintiff's aunt, plaintiff was not engaged with others in a joint enterprise, since to constitute a "joint enterprise" there must be a community of interest, and an equal right to direct and govern the movements and conduct of each other in respect thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by M. H. Meyers against the Southern Pacific Company and another. From an order granting a new trial, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Rudolph & Warne and Isaac Pacht, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The matter before the court herein is an appeal by the defendant Southern Pacific Company from an order granting a new trial. The order granting the motion for a new trial, from which the appeal is taken, is in the words following:

"The motion for new trial, heretofore submitted, at this time it is ordered, that the motion for a new trial be and is hereby granted on the sole ground that the court left the question of common enterprise to the jury and did not instruct the jury that the negligence of the driver could not be imputed to the plaintiff."

On the evening of February 2, 1921, between 9 and 9:30 o'clock, plaintiff and two companions, named, respectively, Torry and Rouden, were traveling in a single-seated automobile in a southerly direction, following the car tracks on the westerly side of Alameda street in the city of Los Angeles, where the automobile collided with a train of cars operated by the defendant Southern Pacific Company that was being backed or "kicked" "against traffic" on the westerly side of Alameda street—and from which accident plaintiff received injuries of which he complains in this action.

The evidence relating to the question of joint enterprise, or whether the negligence of the driver could be imputed to plaintiff, is substantially as follows: M. H. Meyers, the plaintiff, testified on direct examination that on the 2d day of February he and Rouden were riding with Torry, in a car which was owned and which was being driven by Torry. Plaintiff was sitting on Rouden's lap, and Rouden was sitting to the right of Torry. They were traveling on the westerly side of Alameda street, between Seventh and Eighth streets, and were going out to Fifty-sixth street to the home of an aunt of plaintiff for the purpose of calling upon plaintiff's grandmother, who was celebrating a birthday anniversary on that day. Torry had been out to that house with plaintiff about a week or so previously, and at that time he was invited back to the house by plaintiff's aunt. Plaintiff and Rouden were on very friendly terms and had been together practically all that day. They were also very friendly with Torry. Plaintiff and Torry were at the aunt's house about 6 o'clock on the evening of the accident. They had gone there in Torry's automobile. Plaintiff's aunt said, "You boys come out to-night." Torry and plaintiff met Rouden later that evening at Third and Main streets and plaintiff invited Rouden to go with him and Torry. Neither Torry nor Rouden was related to plaintiff; all of which testimony was substantially corroborated by the witness Torry, who also stated that both Meyers and Rouden were riding in the automobile at Torry's request; that the party left Third and Main streets at about 9 o'clock; that plaintiff's aunt invited Torry to the party, and that it was to go to that party that the three men got into the car and started out.

The witness Rouden corroborated the testimony of the other two witnesses, and added that Torry was driving; that neither Meyers nor Rouden had anything to do with the driving, and that when Meyers invited Rouden, he said, "Come on, we are going out to my aunt's house."

The court refused an instruction, proffered by plaintiff, upon the question of imputed negligence and joint enterprise. There were, however, in the instructions two references thereto, as follows:

"As you are elsewhere instructed, the negligence of the driver is not to be imputed to the plaintiff, unless you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff and the driver were at the time of the accident engaged in a joint and common enterprise. If you find that they were, then negligence of the driver is to be imputed to the plaintiff. * * * That negligence, as I say, cannot be imputed to plaintiff, unless plaintiff and the driver were engaged in a joint and common enterprise."

No written instructions were given to the jury defining what was meant by the expression "joint and common enterprise."

After the jury had retired to deliberate on its verdict it returned to the courtroom, when the following conversation took place:

"Foreman Swain: We would like a further instruction in regard to what constitutes a joint enterprise.

"The Court: Well, that is a matter that I have got to leave to you. I don't think it is necessarily confined to business. If it is a joint enterprise of any kind, that is where they are both interested.

"Foreman Swain: Whether it is business, social or otherwise?

"The Court: Yes. You have heard the discussion, and I said I was not going to confine it to business, but as to details I could not answer your question. You have heard the evidence, and it is not confined to business. It is up to you folks to say whether there was any joint enterprise.

"Foreman Swain: I think we can cover it.

"The Court: * * * If you should find that that (defendant's negligence) did proximately contribute to the injury, then the defendant would be liable unless you should also find that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence himself or that the plaintiff and driver were in a common and joint enterprise, so that the negligence of the driver was imputed to the plaintiff."

The jury then retired, but again came into court for further instruction, as follows:

"Foreman Swain: We would like to have your honor read us the definition of 'enterprise,' and give it to us from the dictionary. (Dictionary produced.)

"The Court: 'Enterprise: 1. That which one attempts to perform; any projected task or work upon which one sets out; an undertaking; scheme; especially a bold or difficult undertaking, as the enterprise of tunneling the Alps. 2. The act of engaging, or the disposition to engage, in difficult undertakings; boldness, energy, and intention exhibited in practical affairs, especially in business; as, the railroads of the United States were built by private enterprise.'

"A Juror: That don't satisfy us so we can decide it.

"A Jurywoman: Enterprise is—

"The Court: I am afraid you will have to have your discussion with the jury.

"Foreman Swain: Just read the first part of that, please.

"The Court: (Rereading dictionary definition.)"

[1] With some exceptions, the rule of law is that under ordinary circumstances a guest in an automobile is not in anywise affected by any negligence of the owner or driver in connection with the operation of the automobile. It is only when the guest as such fails to exercise ordinary care for his own safety—that is, when he either does something, or fails to do something, which an ordinarily careful person situated as the guest was situated would either have done or would have failed to do—that any question of negligence on the part of the guest can arise; and whether or not he exercised such care is a question of fact for the jury to determine. Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460; Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 Pac. 385, 29 Cyc. 548; Bresee v. Los Angeles T. Co., 149 Cal. 136, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709.

[2] It likewise appears to be a well-settled rule of law that where persons use an automobile in a joint enterprise, the negligence of one of such persons is imputed to each of the others; but, except in those cases in which the relation of master and servant, or that of principal and agent, is shown, there can be no such thing as imputed negligence. Bryant v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 Pac. 385; Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083; Drouillard v. So. Pac. Co., 36 Cal. App. 450, 172 Pac. 405; Ilardi v. Central Cal. T. Co., 36 Cal. App. 493, 172 Pac. 763; Ellis v. Central Cal. T. Co., 37 Cal. App. 396, 174 Pac. 407.

The case of Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 Pac. 385, was an action for personal injuries caused by one of the defendant's cars colliding with an automobile in which plaintiff was riding and which was being driven by the son of plaintiff. The automobile was the property of a corporation of which plaintiff was the president and the principal stockholder, and the son was the secretary and manager. The automobile was used by the corporation in delivering goods. It was kept at a barn at the residence of plaintiff. On the day of the accident, at closing time, it became necessary to make a delivery for the corporation, which place of delivery was not in a direct line to plaintiff's place of residence. It happened that plaintiff and his wife were at the place of business and, together with the son, made the delivery, the son driving the automobile. There was evidence showing that plaintiff had no control or direction in the management of the automobile, but, on the contrary, that the full control was in the son. On the trial of the case, the jury was in effect instructed that if the driver was guilty of negligence which contributed directly to the happening of the accident, such negligence was imputable to the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict for defendant, and a new trial was granted on the ground that the court had committed error in giving such an instruction. In discussing the matter on appeal, the Supreme Court said, in part:

"It is clear, therefore, that the jury should have been permitted to pass upon the question of fact as to whether the plaintiff exercised, or had the right of exercising, control over the son in driving the automobile home at the time of the collision. Had it been properly instructed it may have found that the son, as manager of the Bryant Upholstery & Furniture Company, had full and absolute control over the movements of the machine, and recognized as his superior only the corporation, and then only such orders as might be given by its officers when acting in their official capacity. * * * It may be conceded that the plaintiff and his son were jointly interested in the conduct of the business of the corporation. But it does not necessarily follow that they possessed a joint or community interest in the matter of driving the automobile. These and other questions of similar import involve matters of fact for the jury to determine. * * *

The following is taken from the case as an expression of opinion by the court as to what constitutes a joint enterprise:

"But in order that there be such a joint undertaking it is not sufficient merely that the passenger or occupant of the machine indicate to the driver or chauffeur the route he may wish to travel, or the places to which he wishes to go, even though in this respect there exists between them a common enterprise of riding together. The circumstances must be such as to show that the occupant and the driver together had such control and direction over the automobile as to be practically in the joint or common possession of it. * * * [Citing cases.]"

In the case of Martindale v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 48 Utah, 464, 160 Pac. 275, which is a case somewhat similar in its facts to the one before this court, it is held that, if the driver of a team of horses attached to a wagon (in which plaintiff's intestate was riding) was guilty of negligence, his negligence could not be imputed to the deceased; the mere fact that she had accepted an invitation of the several young people with whom she was riding to attend a dance being insufficient to charge her with being interested in a common or joint enterprise. And in this connection see, also, Atwood v. Utah L. & R. Co., 44 Utah, 366, 140 Pac. 137; Lochhead v. Jensen, 42 Utah, 99, 129 Pac. 347.

So far as the record here discloses, plaintiff was the guest of the witness Torry in the matter of the transportation in the automobile from Third and Main streets to the home of plaintiff's aunt on Fifty-Sixth street. If driving an automobile on the westerly car tracks of the defendant Southern Pacific Company at such a time of night, or any other thing done by Torry, could be construed as a negligent act, such negligence on the part of Torry could not be imputed to plaintiff.

[3] In circumstances such as are here outlined, joint enterprise is not indicated by the fact that the guest and the driver each sought the same destination and by means of the same conveyance. There must be more than such common desire and common method of transportation. There must be:

"A community of interest in the objects or the purposes of the undertaking, and an equal right to direct and govern the movements and conduct of each other with respect thereto. Each must have some voice and right to be heard in its control and management." Cunningham v. Thief River Falls, 84 Minn. 27, 86 N. W. 765; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Bell, 58 Okl. 84, 159 Pac. 336, L. R. A. 1917A, 543; Atwood v. Utah L. & R. Co., 44 Utah, 366, 140 Pac. 137; Cotton v. Willmar, etc., Ry. Co., 99 Minn. 366, 109 N. W. 835, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 643, 116 Am. St. Rep. 422, 9 Ann. Cas. 935.

While the record discloses the fact that after the jury had returned for further instructions there was some attempt on the part of the court to define what was meant by "enterprise," as set forth in the dictionary, which was produced for that purpose, still the definition therein contained as to the word "enterprise" falls far short of that accurate information to which the jury was entitled as to the legal significance of the term "joint enterprise," as used in the course of the instructions which were given by the court; besides, a part of the statements made by the court as to the meaning of the expression was misleading, if not inaccurate, as is shown by the citations to which we have already adverted. In addition thereto, from a purely legal standpoint, the judge was in error in stating to the jury, in answer to the question, that what constituted a joint enterprise was "a matter that I have got to leave to you. * * * It is up to you folks to say whether there was any joint enterprise," as it erroneously placed with the jury the power of deciding a question of law. Had there been any conflict in the evidence produced by either side as to the relationship of master and servant, or that of principal and agent, which existed between plaintiff and Torry, or with reference to the control of the automobile in which they were riding, which was sufficient in character to indicate a probability of the proper application of the doctrine of imputed negligence, or of the existence of a joint enterprise between them, or among plaintiffs, Torry and Rouden, there might have existed reasonable legal ground for submitting to the jury, under appropriate instructions, the question either of imputed negligence or of joint enterprise. In the light of the presented evidence, any negligence of Torry could not be imputed to plaintiff. Neither was the evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion to the effect that either Torry and plaintiff, or Torry, plaintiff and Rouden, were engaged in a joint enterprise. It follows that the court was right in granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Order affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. STRUVEN. (Civ. 4512.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 23, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 20, 1923.)

1. Fixtures ⇨35(2)—Evidence held to justify finding that property was personalty and not realty.

In an action for conversion of personalty by taking a chattel mortgage and subsequent foreclosure, seizure, and sale, evidence held to justify a finding that the property in controversy was personalty as against contention that it was affixed and was real property.

2. Fixtures ⇨4—Whether property on premises was fixtures depends largely on intent.

Whether or not property consisting of machinery, implements, and appliances, some movable and some more or less permanently affixed to the buildings and real estate whereon a factory was conducted, is to be classed as real or as personal property, depends in a large measure upon the acts and intent of the parties who, from time to time, deal with the same.

3. Fixtures ⇨27(1)—Parties may fix the character of property annexed to realty.

Parties may, in their dealings with chattels annexed to, or used in connection with, real estate, fix on them whatever character as realty or personalty they desire, and the courts will give to the property the character which the parties have fixed upon it.

4. Chattel mortgages ⇨187—Conveyance absolute on face, but in fact a mortgage, assailable for fraud only by prior creditors.

A conveyance of personalty absolute on face, but in fact a chattel mortgage or a deed of trust, is good as between the parties without delivery of the property and can only be assailed by prior creditors of the grantor for fraud.

5. Trover and conversion ⇨5—Taking a chattel mortgage, and subsequent foreclosure, seizure, and sale, and purchase by mortgagee, held conversion.

Taking a chattel mortgage, and the subsequent foreclosure, seizure, and sale, and purchase of the mortgaged property by mortgagee, held such exercise of dominion as amounted to conversion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Mary Miller and another against Berthold Struven. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh K. McKevitt, of San Francisco (Joseph De Martini and Royal E. Handlos, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Aitken, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action for damages for the conversion of personal property. The amended complaint briefly alleges that the plaintiffs' predecessor, the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, at all times mentioned therein prior to October 11, 1918, was the owner and entitled to the possession of certain specific personal property, and that the defendant, on or prior to the last-named date, converted said property to his own use, to the plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $4,000. The defendant, in his amended answer to said complaint, denies each and all of these averments, and for a further defense sets up the statute of limitations and also laches and estoppel in bar of the plaintiffs' action. The trial court found the facts to be as alleged in the plaintiffs' complaint, except as to the value of the property, and also found against the defendant upon his several pleas in bar. Judgment was thereupon rendered for the sum of $1,500, with interest from October 13, 1915, and for costs.

[1] The facts out of which this litigation arose are somewhat complicated, but are in the main undisputed and would seem to be as follows: Prior to the year 1912, and for some time thereafter, the J. F. Bradley Company, a corporation, was the owner of certain real estate and the improvements thereon, situate in the city and county of San Francisco, which was in use by said corporation as a soap factory. On February 3, 1912, said corporation executed its deed of trust by the terms of which it conveyed said real estate to certain trustees to secure the payment of a promissory note of said corporation to one Morris Windt. On the 12th day of March, 1914, said Morris Windt assigned and transferred said promissory note to Hugh McCahill and at the same time, and in conjunction with said trustees, executed a document substituting Mary Miller as the trustee in said deed of trust for the prior trustees named in said trust deed. The J. F. Bradley Company having defaulted in the payment of said note, the payee thereof directed the said substituted trustee to sell the property described in said trust deed in order to the payment and satisfaction of said note, which the said trustee proceeded to do, with the effect that on April 17, 1914, she sold and conveyed the property described in said trust deed to said Hugh McCahill for the sum of $2,000. Thereafter, and on April 21, 1914, said Hugh McCahill conveyed the property by the same description to J. J. Thompson. On August 18, 1914, said J. J. Thompson and Sahra Thompson, his wife, made and executed their promissory note to Berthold Struven for the sum of $6,000, and on said date also made and executed their deed of trust conveying said real estate to certain trustees to secure said note. On August 24, 1914, said J. J. Thompson and wife conveyed said described property to the Chicago Soap Company, a corporation. On October 13, 1915, one Geo. L. Miller and the Chicago Soap Company joined in a personal property mortgage to Berthold Struven of the property described in the complaint in this action, describing the same as being personal property contained in the premises of the Chicago Soap Company theretofore described in the conveyance from J. J. Thompson and wife to the Chicago Soap Company above referred to. In this chattel mortgage Geo. L. Miller is designated as the president of the Chicago Soap Company. On February 16, 1916, said Berthold Struven commenced an action for the foreclosure of said chattel mortgage against the Chicago Soap Company and Geo. L. Miller, in which the said property set forth therein was described and designated as personal property and a sale thereof as such was prayed for. The parties defendant in said action defaulted, and thereafter, and on April 27, 1916, a judgment of foreclosure and of the sale of said property as personal property was duly given and made and the said property was thereafter sold thereunder to said Berthold Struven.

In the meantime another series of transactions affecting the title of the plaintiffs in the property for the conversion of which the present action was instituted, were being carried on. On August 22, 1912, the J. F. Bradley Company made a conveyance, absolute in form, transferring the real estate heretofore referred to, and also transferring the personal property described in the complaint in the present action, describing the same as "machinery, trade fixtures and appliances located upon said real estate," to the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. The latter corporation executed of even date with the above conveyance a declaration of trust, declaring that it held the property described in said conveyance in trust to secure any indebtedness that then was or might thereafter become due from the J. F. Bradley Company to the Mercantile National Bank of San Francisco. On August 3, 1913, the Mercantile National Bank of San Francisco assigned and transferred a lengthy list of promissory notes of the J. F. Bradley Company, aggregating several thousand dollars, to Hugh McCahill, who had been the surety of the said J. F. Bradley Company upon said notes and had been called upon to pay the same and who upon such payment had by such assignment been subrogated to the rights of the Mercantile National Bank, the original payee thereof. Thereafter, and on October 11, 1918, the Mercantile Trust Company assigned, transferred, and set over to Mary Miller all of its right, title, and interest as trustee or otherwise in and to the personal property described in the conveyance by the J. F. Bradley Company to it and above referred to, together with all rights of action which had accrued to it or to Hugh McCahill for damage to, or for the conversion of, said personal property. Thereafter the present action was commenced by said Mary Miller and Hugh McCahill against Berthold Struven for damages for the conversion of said personal property, said conversion being alleged to have occurred "within three years last past and prior to October 11, 1918." The right of the plaintiff McCahill to maintain this action springs from the fact of his subrogation to the rights of the Mercantile National Bank and of its trustee, the Mercantile Trust Company, upon his payment of the notes of the J. F. Bradley Company. As to the plaintiff Mary Miller, her right to be joined as plaintiff springs from the assignment to her of the property held in trust by the Mercantile Trust Company.

[2, 3] The appellant makes several points in urging a reversal of the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs herein, but his chief contention is that the property for the conversion of which this action was instituted was not and is not personal property, but that at all of the times covered by the transactions of the parties it consisted of property affixed to the real estate described in said transactions, and hence was real estate to which the plaintiffs herein were shown to have no title. Whether or not property of the kind and character of that enumerated in the complaint herein and consisting in machinery, implements, and appliances, some movable and some more or less permanently affixed to the buildings and real estate wherein and whereon the soap factory was conducted, is to be classed as real or as personal property, depends in a large measure upon the acts and intent of the parties who, from time to time, deal with the same. The title which the plaintiff asserts to the property in question relates back to a transaction in 1914, when the J. F. Bradley Company, then admittedly the owner, both of the said property and of the real estate upon which it was situated and used in the conduct of the business of soap making, saw fit to distinguish between these two kinds of property and to designate the former as personal property in its transfer of the title to both forms of property to the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. It had a right so to do as between itself and its then grantor and as against all the world, unless it had lost that right as a result of its transactions affecting the real estate upon which such property was located and was being used in the conduct of its soap-making business. The several conveyances and deeds of trust, from or through which the defendant's title to the real estate formerly owned by the J. F. Bradley Company was derived, nowhere expressly referred to or described the chattels affected by the present action as part of said real estate. The defendant's immediate predecessor in interest, the Chicago Soap Company, while apparently claiming to own said property, did not treat the same as real estate in its dealings with the defendant herein since it first gave him as security for its indebtedness to him a deed of trust covering said real estate and a short while after gave him a chattel mortgage upon the property affected by this action, describing the same as personal property. The defendant himself not only took and held said chattel mortgage upon the property in question as personal property, but he proceeded to foreclose said mortgage, repeatedly designating the property described therein as personal property, and proceeded to buy in the same as personal property at the foreclosure sale. It is a quite well settled rule of law that the parties themselves may, in their dealings with chattels annexed to or used in connection with real estate, fix upon them whatever character, as realty or as personalty, they desire and that the courts will give to the property the character which the parties themselves have fixed upon it. Frait v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 126, 132, 41 Am. Rep. 251. We think the foregoing evidence sufficient to justify the finding of the trial court to the effect that the property of which the defendant was charged with the conversion was personal property.

[4] The appellant's next contention is that the transfer of said property by the J. F. Bradley Company to the Mercantile Trust Company was void for the reason that there was no present delivery to it of the property so sought to be transferred. The conveyance to the Mercantile Trust Company, while absolute in form, was, in fact, a mortgage or deed of trust of the property described therein. In so far as it related to said personal property it was good as between the parties thereto and could only be assailed by prior creditors of the grantor upon the ground of fraud. The defendant herein has not brought himself within the category of those who would be entitled to assail said transfer upon that ground.

[5] The next contention of the appellant is that there is no evidence sufficient to show that the property in question was converted by the defendant at any time prior to the commencement of this action. This contention assumes that the property was at all times, prior to the commencement of this action, personal property, and leaves as the only question whether the taking of a chattel mortgage upon said property by the defendant and his foreclosure thereof and seizure and sale of said property upon the foreclosure sale and the purchase thereof by himself constituted such an assumption of control over and disposition of said property as to amount to a conversion thereof. We are satisfied that these acts on the part of the defendant would amount to such an exercise of dominion over the property in defiance of the rights of the plaintiffs therein as would suffice to justify the finding of a conversion thereof by the trial court. Horton v. Jack, 126 Cal. 526, 58 Pac. 1051.

The appellant's next and final contention is that, conceding there was a conversion, it occurred at such time prior to the commencement of this action as to constitute a bar to such action under the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations. This contention also assumes that the property in question was personal property within the contemplation of the parties at all times prior to the institution of this action. Being personal property the defendant or his predecessors herein acquired no title to nor interest in it by any transaction or conveyances prior to the making of the chattel mortgage thereon by the Chicago Soap Company to the defendant herein. The date of said mortgage was October 13, 1915, which was not only the earliest date at which the claim of interest of the defendant in said property as personal property arose, but which was also the date fixed by the trial court in its findings as the date of the defendant's conversion of the said property. This action was commenced on October 11, 1918, which date was just within the three-year period fixed by the statute for the commencement of actions for conversion. Code Civ. Proc., § 338, subd. 3. There is no merit, therefore, in this contention. Nor do we think, without discussing the subject at length, that there is any merit in the defendant's defense of laches and estoppel.

The judgment is affirmed.

REID et al. v. NORTHERN ASSUR. CO. SAME v. SUN INS. OFFICE OF LONDON. SAME v. LONDON ASSUR. CORPORATION. (No. 4389.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. July 23, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 20, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error — 1099(3) — Supreme Court statement of law of case held to govern subsequent appeal.

In an action on a fire policy, in which the defense was that goods had been removed from the place where insured, decision on appeal, in affirming grant of new trial for error in instructions, that the instructions would have been correct, if they had based liability on notice to insurer of removal of goods, together with some act which showed request to insure at new place, so as to fasten an estoppel on insured, was the law of the case on subsequent appeal, as against contention that no consent to removal was indorsed on policy.

2. Insurance — 665(8) — Evidence held to show insurer's agent consented to transfer insurance on goods to new location, estopping insurer from denying that goods were insured.

In an action on a fire policy insuring goods in a certain building which were removed to another building, evidence held sufficient to show that insurer's agent had consented to transfer the insurance to cover the new location, estopping insurer from denying that the goods were covered by the policy.

3. Insurance — 76 — Evidence held to warrant finding that insurer's agent had authority to consent to transfer insurance on goods to new location.

In an action on a fire policy insuring goods in a certain building, which were removed to another building, evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that agent of insurer had authority to consent to transfer the insurance on the goods to their new location, estopping insurer from denying that goods were not insured.

4. Insurance — 665(8) — Evidence held not to show consent to insure goods at new location, or conduct estopping insurer from denying consent.

In an action on a fire policy insuring goods in a certain building, which were removed to another building, evidence held insufficient to show that insurer agreed to transfer the insurance to the new location, or that it was estopped by its conduct, or that of a broker through whom insured purchased the policy, and who consented to such transfer, from denying that such goods were insured after removal.

5. Insurance §375(1)—Insurer not estopped by acts or conduct of independent broker representing insured.

Though an insurer may be estopped by the acts or conduct of its duly authorized local agents or representatives from denying its consent to waive requirements of the policy, such estoppel cannot be created by the acts and conduct of broker having no connection with insurer, but who throughout the whole transaction represented insured.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Actions by Lillian May Steil Reid and others against the Northern Assurance Company, against the London Assurance Corporation, and against the Sun Insurance Office of London. From judgments for plaintiffs in the first two actions, defendants appeal; and from a judgment for defendants in the last-named action, plaintiffs appeal. Judgments affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, Roland C. Foerster, and R. L. McWilliams, all of San Francisco, for plaintiffs.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for defendant Sun Insurance Office of London.

Chickering & Gregory and Winfield Dorn, all of San Francisco, for defendants Northern Assur. Co. and London Assur. Corporation.

RICHARDS, J. Prior to the month of January, 1906, one Henry Steil had taken out three policies of insurance upon certain goods then situated in the Chronicle Building in the city of San Francisco, in three insurance companies; one issued by the Sun Insurance Office of London, one by the Northern Assurance Company, and one by the London Assurance Corporation. In January, 1906, Steil removed said goods to the Shreve Building in said city, where, on April 19, 1906, they were destroyed in the great fire. The several companies refused to pay the loss, whereupon Steil commenced three actions for recovery upon these policies. In the amended complaint in each of said actions the plaintiffs, after alleging the entering into the contract of insurance with the defendant therein and describing the goods covered thereby at their original location in the Chronicle Building and after averring the removal of said goods to the Shreve Building on or about January 20, 1906, proceeds to allege that the defendant had knowledge at said time of the transfer and removal of said goods to their new location, and—

meres, tailors' trimmings, clothing manufactured and in process of manufacture, silks, furnishing goods, and other merchandise had been so removed, duly waived any and all indorsement upon said policy of insurance, setting forth said removal and the consent of said defendant thereto; that said defendant had immediate knowledge of said removal of said goods and failed to take any action, whatsoever, within a reasonable, or other, time after acquiring such knowledge, to forfeit, rescind, or determine said contract or policy of insurance, or to return to said Henry Steil the unearned portion of the premium paid thereon, and thereby waived its right to forfeit, rescind, or determine the same; that immediately after the transfer and removal of said stock of cloths, cassimeres, tailors' trimmings, clothing manufactured and in process of manufacture, silks, furnishing goods, and other merchandise, as hereinbefore alleged, and prior to the destruction of the same by fire as hereinafter alleged, said Henry Steil notified said defendant of such removal and transfer, and upon such notification requested that said policy of insurance be transferred to cover said stock of cloths, cassimeres, tailors' trimmings, clothing manufactured and in process of manufacture, silks, furnishing goods, and other merchandise while contained in said Shreve Building, and that said insurance continue notwithstanding such removal and transfer, and thereupon said defendant, knowingly and intentionally, represented to said Henry Steil, and led and induced him to understand and believe, and said Henry Steil did in fact understand and believe, because of such representations, that his said stock of cloths, cassimeres, tailors' trimmings, clothing manufactured and in process of manufacture, silks, furnishing goods, and other merchandise was insured and covered by said policy of insurance after said transfer and removal, and while the same was contained in said rooms 301 to 307 of said Shreve Building, and said Henry Steil, because of such representations of defendant and not otherwise, and relying upon the same, did not attempt to procure and did not procure other insurance upon said stock of cloths, cassimeres, tailors' trimmings, clothing manufactured and in process of manufacture, silks, furnishing goods, and other merchandise after the removal and transfer of the same, as aforesaid, or otherwise or at all protect or attempt to protect himself against the loss or destruction of the same by fire; that by reason of the premises said defendant is now estopped and precluded from in any manner claiming or asserting that said policy is forfeited, and that said stock of cloths, cassimeres, tailors' trimmings, clothing manufactured and in process of manufacture, silks, furnishing goods, and other merchandise was not insured and covered by said policy of insurance after the removal of the same, and while located at rooms 301 to 307 of the third floor of said Shreve Building.”

The defendant in each of said actions, while admitting the issuance respectively of the insurance policy sued upon, denies each and all of the matters set forth in the portion of the plaintiffs' amended complaint above quoted. The trial before a jury in each case upon the issues as thus framed resulted in a verdict and judgment in the plaintiffs' favor. The defendants respectively moved for a new trial upon the usual statutory grounds, which motion was granted by the court. The order granting a new trial in each case stated that the court found the evidence sufficient to justify the verdict, but that the new trial was granted because the court was of the opinion that it was in error in giving two certain instructions set forth in the order. The plaintiff in each case appealed to the Supreme Court from each of said orders granting a new trial, but which orders the Supreme Court affirmed in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Shaw and reported in the consolidated cases of Steil v. Sun Insurance Office of London et al., 171 Cal. 795, 155 Pac. 72. In its said opinion affirming the orders of the trial court in said cases the Supreme Court discusses the questions raised by the pleadings of the parties relative to the alleged waiver and estoppel of the defendants arising out of the facts set forth in the above quoted portion of the plaintiffs' amended complaint and adverted to in the instructions for error in giving which the new trial had been granted in each case. In so doing the court held that there being no provision in any of these policies that the removal of the goods from the place where they were described as being located would operate to annul the policy, such would not be the effect of their removal; the only effect being that the goods would not be insured in their new location until something was done to continue the insurance upon the goods in their said new location. This, of course, might be accomplished through the consent in writing through its properly authorized officials of the insurer. This condition, however, was not claimed to exist in the instant cases; but the court proceeds to consider the question as to whether the same result might not be accomplished by the existence of facts which would suffice to create an estoppel on the part of the insurer to deny that it had consented to the removal of the goods to another location. In discussing this phase of the question the Supreme Court used this language:

"In order to continue the insurance upon the goods, or, in other words, to carry it to the goods in the new location, something more was required than a mere notification by the insured to the insurer of the fact that the goods were, or were about to be, removed. That fact alone would only suspend the insurance risk. The insurer must be informed, or be given good cause to believe, that the party insured desired to have the insurance on the goods continued in the new place, that he wished a modification of the policy to make it cover the goods in the new location, and must then, by positive act, or by failure to act, cause the insured to believe that the insurer consented to such transfer or modification, and that the goods were covered by the policy. Something in the nature of a new agreement, either express, or implied from conduct or words, or created by estoppel, was necessary."

In the light of the foregoing language the Supreme Court proceeds to point out the defect in the instructions which had led to the orders granting new trials in these respective cases in the following words:

"The instructions informed the jury that a notification of removal, followed by silence and failure to cancel the policy and return the unearned premium, would operate to estop the insurer from denying that it had consented to the removal and had agreed that the policy should cover the goods, notwithstanding such removal. They should have contained the additional premise that the assured, upon such notification, requested that the policy be transferred to the new location, or that the insurance be continued, notwithstanding the removal, or something to indicate that the notification was given under circumstances which would have given the insurer reasonable cause to believe that the assured desired or expected the matter to be so adjusted. The evidence concerning the notification referred to all indicated that such desire and expectation existed and was made known to the assured, but the instructions omitted all reference thereto. In this respect they were defective, incomplete, and possibly misleading."

Having expressed the foregoing views as to what the instructions to the jury in each of said cases should have stated as the law of the case, the Supreme Court affirmed the orders of the trial court granting a new trial in each of said cases. Thereupon a new trial was had in each. Upon the second trial the jury in each case again rendered verdicts in the plaintiffs' favor but on motion for a new trial the court again vacated the judgment in each case, from which orders no appeal was taken. A third trial of the three cases resulted in a disagreement of the jury in each case, and all of the cases were again retried. Upon the fourth trial, by stipulation of the parties, the three cases were consolidated for the purpose of trial and tried before the same jury. In the two cases wherein the Northern Assurance Company and the London Assurance Corporation were defendants, respectively, the jury rendered verdicts in the plaintiffs' favor. In the case in which the Sun Assurance Office of London was the defendant the trial court granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit. In the first two cases the defendants have appealed. In the last-named case the plaintiff has appealed. These appeals, while separately taken, have been presented upon a consolidated transcript, but upon separate briefs. The original plaintiff having died in the meantime, the executrices of his last will and testament have been substituted in his place and stead in all three appeals.

[1] Dealing first with the appeals which have been prosecuted by the defendants Northern Assurance Company and the London Assurance Corporation, we find the first contention of the appellants to be that no transfer of the insurance of either appellant upon the goods in question was made or indorsed in writing upon the policies of either as required by their terms, and hence there was no insurance upon said goods at said location at the time of their destruction by fire. It is, of course, conceded that these policies were not changed by any writing between the parties agreeing or consenting to the transfer of the insurance upon the goods in their new location; but, notwithstanding this admitted fact, we are of the opinion that the insurers would still be bound if the facts relied upon by the plaintiff as the basis of his recovery in each of these cases as creating an estoppel against each defendant were sufficiently proven. In support of this view it is not necessary to look farther than to the language of the Supreme Court upon the first appeal and which is quoted above; since it is there expressly held that if the instructions which were given to the jury upon that first trial had contained the element that in the oral communications between the insured and the insurer after the change of location the insurer had been informed, or had been given good cause to believe that the party insured desired to have the insurance on the goods continued in the new place, and that he wished a modification of the policy to make it cover the goods in the new location, and if the insurer, upon being so informed, had by positive act or failure to act caused the insured to believe that the insurer consented to such transfer or modification, and that the goods were covered by the policy, these facts would suffice to create an estoppel against the insurers to deny that they had consented to the change of location, and had agreed that the policy should cover the goods notwithstanding such removal. We are of the opinion that this conclusion of the Supreme Court as to what would have constituted correct instructions touching this branch of each of these cases constitutes the law of the case, and as such was binding upon the parties during the later trials thereof, and hence that the first point urged by the said appellants is devoid of merit. Brett v. S. H. Frank & Co., 162 Cal. 735, 124 Pac. 437.

[2] This brings us to the second contention of said appellants, which is that the evidence fails to show facts sufficient to create an estoppel in each case. This involves a brief recital of the facts of each case, as testified to by the plaintiff and his witnesses upon the several trials thereof. Upon the first trial of these cases the plaintiff was still living, and he testified, in substantial effect, that on the 20th day of January, 1906, the date of the removal of the goods to the new location, he took the three policies of insurance and handed them to Mr. Paine, his bookkeeper, with certain instructions. He was not permitted to testify as to what these instructions to his bookkeeper were, but both the plaintiff and his daughter testified that the bookkeeper went out, taking the policies with him, and came back later with them, and that no change of location had been indorsed on the policies when they were returned to the plaintiff. Mr. Paine had died prior to the trial, and his testimony on the subject was lost to the plaintiff; but his son, Arthur Steil, who had been the manager of his father's business for several years while its location was in the Chronicle Building, but who was absent in Portland at the time of the change of location, testified that upon his return in the following February he rang up the London Assurance Company on the telephone and talked with Mr. F. W. Tallant, an official of the company, with whom the business of placing the policy of that company upon the goods had originally been transacted, and that he asked him if "our bookkeeper had been down at their office with their policy asking for a transfer, and Mr. Tallant replied, 'Yes; the man was down at the office; we have no objection to the transfer, and just send them down.'" "Well," I said, "Mr. Tallant, you know that fire in the Chronicle Building is still in abeyance; that has not been settled, and on the advice of our lawyers we were told not to leave the policies, and I want to ask you if we are covered in this new location; and Tallant replied, 'Yes; you are covered, but send down the policies.'" Mr. Arthur Steil further testified that he also rang up the Northern Assurance Company, and asked for the city agent of said company, and was told that it was Mr. Hunter, and when the latter came to the phone "I asked him if our bookkeeper had been there with our policies, and he said, 'Yes; he was down here;'" and I asked him if there was any objection to the transfer, and he said, "No; absolutely, there was no objection," to send the policy down; and I replied to him, the same as I did to Mr. Tallant, that on account of the fire in the Chronicle Building not being settled, and on the advice of our attorney, not to leave the policy until that settlement was made; and I asked Mr. Hunter if we were covered in the new location. He said very positively that we were covered. The same statement was made by Mr. Tallant and Mr. Hunter that we were covered in the new location." This witness further testified that he accepted and trusted these statements, and believed that they were covered, and took out no other insurance, and that they never received any further request or notice from the insurers with relation to their policies until after the fire.

In addition to the foregoing testimony, there was offered and admitted on behalf of the plaintiff the evidence of one Naughton, assistant manager of the Northern Assurance Company, to the effect that occasionally requests for approval of transfers of location were received over the telephone, and if the removal was approved the representative of the company would inform the insured that he was covered, and ask him to send down his policy for indorsement, and that in such case the insured would be covered for a reasonable time, and until the covering note or rider could be placed upon the policy; that his company had a form of covering note approving transfers of location, and that if a request was made over the phone, and the company was agreeable to the granting of the request, it would send through the mail one of these forms, to be attached to the policy, or would require the insured to bring in his policy, in order that it might be attached thereto in the office. The officials of the defendants referred to in the testimony offered on the plaintiffs' behalf denied that they had ever received any request from the plaintiffs for an approval of the change in location of the goods covered by their respective policies, or that they had any recollection of having had the telephone communications or visits from the plaintiffs' bookkeeper, as testified to by the plaintiffs' witnesses; but the jury upon the last trial of these cases evidently believed the plaintiffs' witnesses upon the subject as indicated by their verdict, and we are of the opinion that said evidence adduced on the plaintiffs' behalf, if so believed by the jury, was sufficient to constitute an estoppel on the part of these defendants to deny that the plaintiffs' goods were covered by their respective policies in the new location from the date of their transfer thereto and up to their destruction by the great fire.

[3] The appellant London Assurance Corporation makes the further and final contention that the evidence is insufficient to show that F. W. Tallant had authority from said corporation to transfer the insurance upon said goods to their new location, or to bind said corporation by any oral statements, acts, or conduct on his part sufficient otherwise to create an estoppel. We find no merit in this contention. Mr. F. W. Tallant had been connected with the local management of the London Assurance Corporation for several years prior to January, 1906, and bore the title of "Branch Secretary," indorsed upon the policies of the company and printed upon its letterheads. The business of the plaintiff in carrying insurance in this company had always been transacted with him. He had attended to the details of the settlement made by plaintiff with the corporation for the losses occasioned by the former fire in the Chronicle Building, and there was other testimony to the effect that it was the general understanding on the street that Mr. Tallant was in charge of the city department of the London Assurance Corporation. We think this evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion, which the jury necessarily arrived at in this case as a prerequisite to their verdict, that Mr. Tallant had authority to bind his principal by his statements, acts, and conduct, to the extent of creating an estoppel in this particular case. Our conclusion from the foregoing reasoning is that as to these defendants and appellants the judgment should be affirmed.

[4] We are next to consider the judgment of nonsuit rendered in the defendant's favor in the case against the Sun Insurance Office of London as presented for our review upon the plaintiffs' appeal. In the main, the facts recited with relation to the two former cases have application to this appeal. There is, however, this material difference as to the essential facts which led the trial court to grant a nonsuit in this particular case: The policy of insurance which the plaintiff Henry Reid held in the Sun Insurance Office of London had been negotiated and procured by him through a firm of insurance brokers known as J. B. F. Davis & Son, who were not the regularly constituted agents of said insurance corporation, but were independent brokers, placing such insurance as they were able to successfully solicit in such insurance companies as they might select and as would accept the risk. It cannot be seriously questioned but that ordinarily brokers doing this sort of business represent the insured and not the insurer. The appellants herein do not contend that in this particular transaction these brokers in procuring this insurance and placing it with the Sun Insurance Office of London were acting as the actual agents of the insurance company, having formal authority from it to issue policies of insurance or to bind the insurer by written consent to changes in their terms as to location of the property insured, as required by their express stipulations. The utmost which the appellants claim is that these brokers had ostensible authority to act for the respondent in consenting to the change of location of the goods insured and in assuring the insured that his goods would be covered by the policy in the new location.

This claim is founded upon the following facts, as shown by the evidence in the case, and which, according to the appellants' contention, were sufficient to avoid the motion for nonsuit: The testimony of Mr. Arthur Steil, who was the son and in charge of the business of Henry Steil, and who attended to the matter of placing his insurance, showed that he knew no one else in the matter of placing this particular insurance, except the firm of J. B. F. Davis & Son, as transacting business for and on behalf of the Sun Insurance Company, and supposed them to be the agents of said company, and that after the transfer of the goods to the new location he had a conversation with a Mr. Wm. Romaine, manager of said firm of brokers, who came to his father's new place of business in the Shreve Building, in which he was assured that there would be no objection to the transfer and that the goods were covered in the new location. Mr. Romaine requested the Sun policy, in order that he might take it down to the office and have the transfer indorsed thereon;

but both Mr. Steil and his father refused to allow the policy to go out of their hands, on account of the pending unsettled claim arising out of the former fire, but depended on Mr. Romaine's assurance that they were covered by the Sun policy in the new location. The original Sun policy was destroyed in the fire of April, 1906, but it was conceded upon the several trials that it was similar in form to a sample policy of said company offered in evidence at these trials, and that on the back of said policy a sticker was pasted over the place thereon where the name and address of the actual and regular local agent of the Sun Company was printed, which sticker completely covered said name and address and contained the words "J. B. F. Davis & Son, Insurance Brokers, 240 Sansome Street, San Francisco." It also appeared that this firm of J. B. F. Davis & Son had been accustomed for a good many years to paste similar stickers upon policies of whatever insurance companies were handled through their office. It also appeared that a rider had been attached to said original policy prior to the removal of the goods from the Chronicle Building, permitting certain alterations, additions, and repairs to be made in certain of the property covered by said policy, which rider had been signed by the regular local agent of said company, but across the face of which the stamp of "J. B. F. Davis & Son, San Francisco," had been prominently placed. There was also some evidence that the Sun Company had known of this custom of said firm of insurance brokers of placing their stickers and stamp upon policies passing through their office. The plaintiff offered no evidence whatever tending to show that any application had been made to the regular agent of the Sun Insurance Office of London for an approval of the transfer of location, or that any such approval had been given, or that the said regular representatives of said insurer had any notice or knowledge of the change of location of said insured goods until after their destruction by fire.

The plaintiffs' case rests solely upon the transactions with which the firm of brokers above referred to and upon the assurance of the members and employees of said firm that the insurance would be carried by the insurer in the changed location of the goods insured. We are satisfied that this evidence on the plaintiffs' part is entirely insufficient to establish either an agreement on the part of this particular insurer to continue its insurance upon the plaintiffs' goods in the new location, or to warrant the conclusion that the insurer, by any acts or conduct on its part, either through its actual or ostensible agents, was estopped to deny the existence of such an agreement. The policy which was issued to the plaintiffs' predecessor by the Sun Insurance Office of London was signed, executed, and issued by C. A. Henry, its only regular and duly authorized agent in the city of San Francisco. The rider to said policy permitting certain alterations and repairs in certain of the property covered by its terms was also signed and executed by its said local agent. The name and title of said agent also originally appeared upon the back of said policy, printed in the space which was later occupied by the sticker which J. B. F. Davis & Son pasted thereon, and there is no evidence in the record from which it could be found or fairly inferred that the regular agent of the said insurance company ever saw the policy which it issued to the plaintiffs' predecessor with the sticker of said firm of brokers pasted thereon, over his own printed name and title as such agent. The said sticker of said firm of brokers did not purport to state that they were the agents of the insurance company issuing said policy, but simply that they were "brokers." The representative of said firm of brokers, when upon the witness stand as a witness for the plaintiffs, stated that in handling insurance as brokers his firm represented the insured, and there is no evidence to be found in the record controverting this assertion. The policy of the Sun Insurance Office of London contained the express stipulation and agreement that the property described therein and insured thereby was covered by said insurance only while the same was located in the Chronicle Building and not elsewhere. It also contained the express provision that:

"No officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured, unless so written or attached."

[5] While we have held in an earlier portion of this opinion, with particular reference to the companion cases to this, that an estoppel may be created by the acts and conduct of the duly authorized local agents and representatives of an insurance company, notwithstanding the foregoing provisions in the policy, it is clear that such estoppel cannot be created by the acts and conduct of a firm of brokers having no pretense of any connection with the insurer in the capacity of official agents or representatives, and who throughout the entire transaction represented the insured and not the insurer. We are satisfied that the trial court was correct in holding as it did, in granting the said defendant's motion for nonsuit, that the plaintiffs in this particular action had not made out their case.

The judgment in each and all of the cases included in the consolidated record herein is affirmed.

On application for a writ of mandate by a suspended school-teacher to compel reinstatement, payment of salary might be included in the relief granted, notwithstanding that the prayer of the complaint did not specifically mention it, where the complaint did contain a prayer for general relief, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 580.

2. Appeal and error ☞781(5)—Appeal will not be dismissed, as moot, where judgment rendered thereon will be of practical benefit to appellant.

On application by a suspended school-teacher for a writ of mandate to compel the board of education to reinstate him, the trial court could legally direct the board to pay the salary for the period during which plaintiff was suspended, as well as to command his restoration to his position, and hence, on appeal from a denial of the writ, the appeal would not be dismissed as moot, although the period of suspension had terminated, where no provision had been made as to payment of salary during such period.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Application by A. L. Goldsmith against the Board of Education of Sacramento City High School District and others for a writ of mandate. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

C. F. Metteer, of Sacramento, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. On September 11, 1922, certain charges of unprofessional conduct against appellant were made to the board of education of Sacramento city high school district by Charles C. Hughes, superintendent of schools of said city. The matter came on regularly for hearing on September 22 following, and after trial before said board, appellant was found guilty as charged, and by order of the board he was suspended from his position as teacher in said high school for a term of 10 weeks without pay, beginning on said September 22 and ending on November 30. The term of suspension having expired, Mr. Goldsmith resumed his position as teacher and continued therein until January 22, 1923, when he voluntarily severed his connection with the department. While said order of suspension was in force, appellant, on October 5, 1922, brought an action of mandate in the superior court of Sacramento county, the prayer in his complaint being as follows:

"Wherefore plaintiff prays for writ of mandate commanding and requiring defendant to admit plaintiff to the use and enjoyment of the right to perform said services and duties, to reinstate plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of said right, and to allow plaintiff to perform said duties and services, and for such other or further order as is proper in the premises and for costs of this proceeding."

After issue joined, the cause was thereafter regularly tried in said superior court and a judgment rendered in favor of defendants. From this judgment the said A. L. Goldsmith on December 18, 1922, appealed to this court, and the appeal is pending herein. On May 2, 1923, respondents gave notice of motion to dismiss said appeal on the ground that the term of said suspension of appellant has expired, and "that, even if the order herein appealed from was reversed by this court, it would merely be to direct revocation of an order of the said board of education that has expired by limitation of time for which said order was made," and that said appellant, by his own election and the action of the said board in accepting his resignation as teacher, "is not and has not been, since the 22d day of January, 1923, in any wise employed by or connected with the Sacramento city high school district." The motion was regularly heard and has been submitted on the oral argument and briefs thereafter filed.

The claim of respondents is that "the only question presented to the Court in this action is now moot," and that accordingly the motion to dismiss should be granted. If the only question involved is of merely academic interest, and a reversal of the judgment can afford no practical relief to appellant, then manifestly the cause should not be retained for the purpose only of determining whether the trial court reached a correct conclusion. In Weaver v. Reddy, 135 Cal. 430, 67 Pac. 683, the plaintiff held the position of superintendent of the almshouse of the city and county of San Francisco and was removed therefrom by the board of health. He brought suit for reinstatement, and, while the case was pending, San Francisco adopted a new charter under which another board of health, a different entity, came into existence. The Supreme Court said:

"It follows, therefore, that the board of health, defendant in this case, is no longer in authority or control over the almshouse, and the questions presented upon this appeal become purely academic. No judgment that could be rendered for plaintiff upon his appeal could afford him any relief, and thus it would be futile to discuss the propositions which he presents."

Among many cases to the same effect we may refer only to Bradley v. Voorsanger, 143 Cal. 214, 76 Pac. 1031, wherein it was held, as stated in the syllabus:

"Where a taxpayer sued to enjoin the holding of an election to fill certain offices, and the expending of money therefor, and the judgment was against the plaintiff, and before the hearing of an appeal by him the election had been held and the money expended, and the officers elected were incumbents in place of others whose terms had expired, such appeal raises merely a moot question, and no judgment which could be entered thereupon could afford plaintiff any relief, and the action will be ordered dismissed."

If reinstatement was the only relief to which appellant was entitled under the pleadings, and if the superior court in said mandate proceedings could direct said board of education to do no more than to restore appellant to his position, then, of course, no practical benefit can come from a further consideration of this case. This seems so obvious as to require no comment. Indeed, besides the fact that the suspension ceased to be operative and appellant was restored to his position, he voluntarily withdrew from the school and manifestly does not desire to return. But we are satisfied that respondents have mistaken the scope of the pleadings and the extent of the relief that the superior court was authorized to award.

Two issues are embraced within the pleadings: One, the right to have the order of suspension annulled, with the incident of restoration; and the other, the right to his salary during the period of suspension. The latter is the one in dispute, but it is to be observed that, both in the complaint in the superior court for the writ of mandate and in the stipulation of facts made by the parties, it is set forth that the annual compensation of appellant at the time of his suspension was $2,820. The alternative writ, also, to which respondents made return, and on which they joined issue, provided:

"Whereas, it appears * * * that plaintiff has been wrongfully and unlawfully precluded and prevented from performing his services as teacher, * * * and that you wrongfully and unlawfully have prevented and precluded him from his right to receive and the receiving of the salary and compensation attached to such position: * * * Now, therefore, we * * * do command * * * that you immediately after receipt of this writ admit plaintiff to the use and enjoyment of the right to perform his services, * * * together with his right to compensation and salary to which plaintiff is entitled, or that you show cause to the contrary."

[1] Respondents answered the writ, setting up as justification for their conduct the order and judgment of said board of education suspending appellant as aforesaid. The right to compensation and salary was therefore as much involved as the right to perform his services as teacher, and both could be legally and regularly determined in the same action. Indeed, if the trial court had determined that the said order of suspension was void, it would necessarily follow that appellant was entitled to be restored to his position and also receive his salary for that period. Having determined that the order was legal and operative, the court's action was in effect an adjudication that appellant was not entitled to be restored to his position and that he was not entitled to any salary for that period. Indeed, at the oral argument it was admitted by respondents that the judgment of the trial court constituted res adjudicata as to salary. This admission is tantamount to a concession that the reversal of the judgment would be of practical benefit to appellant, and that therefore the question before us is not altogether moot. It is true that in the prayer of the complaint, as we have seen, the payment of salary is not specifically mentioned; but, where issue is joined, relief embraced within the pleadings may be granted, although the complaint omits the prayer altogether. Section 580, Code Civ. Proc.; Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 33 Pac. 908; Hoffman v. Pacific Coast Construction Co., 37 Cal. App. 125, 173 Pac. 776. Besides, as already noticed, there is a prayer for general relief, which would undoubtedly authorize the court to award any remedy within the purview of the pleadings.

[2] The next question of importance is whether the trial court could legally direct the board to pay the salary for the term during which appellant was suspended, as well as to command his restoration to his position. If it had no such authority in this action for mandamus, then a reversal herein would be of no avail to appellant, and the action should be dismissed. But, in view of the decisions, it cannot be doubted that the trial court could make such order. Raisch v. Board of Education, 81 Cal. 546, 22 Pac. 890; Kennedy v. Board of Education, 82 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 1042; Ross v. Board of Education, 18 Cal. App. 222, 122 Pac. 967; Brown v. White, 43 Cal. App. 363, 185 Pac. 304. In the Raisch Case it is held, quoting from the syllabus:

"Mandamus will lie to compel the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco to draw its draft upon the school fund to pay for supplies furnished to the schools under its care, in pursuance of its contract for such supplies; and the remedy against its members by action for damages for neglect of their duty is not so competent to afford relief upon the very subject-matter of the application, or so convenient, beneficial, and effective, as the proceeding by mandamus, and will not therefore supersede that remedy."

In the Kennedy Case, the plaintiff was transferred to another department of the school without her consent, and she brought an action for mandamus; the prayer of the complaint being:

"Wherefore plaintiff prays that a writ of mandate be issued, commanding and requiring defendants to admit plaintiff to the use and enjoyment of the right to perform said services and duties, to reinstate plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of said right, and to allow plaintiff to perform said duties and services, or for such other or further order as is proper in the premises, and for costs of this proceeding."

The form is thus shown to be identical with that in the case at bar, and an examination of the complaint therein shows a striking similarity to the one before us. The resemblance is so marked that the pleader herein, in drafting his complaint, must have had before him the pleadings in that case. Therein the trial court awarded the writ, commanding not only the reinstatement of the applicant, but also the issuance of a warrant for her salary, and the judgment was upheld by the Supreme Court.

In Ross v. Board of Education, supra, the plaintiff was discharged without cause before the expiration of his term of employment, and, after a careful review of the authorities, the court held that the writ of mandamus would lie to compel the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco to approve the plaintiff's demand for his salary for the full time. Therein is discussed the propriety of the ordinary action for damages, and the court, while holding that such action might have been brought, declared that:

"It cannot be said that the remedy at law is equally convenient, beneficial, and effective to the extent that it will supersede the remedy by mandamus. Fremont v. Crippen, 10 Cal. 211, 70 Am. Dec. 711; Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488; Raisch v. Board of Education, 81 Cal. 542, 22 Pac. 890; Robertson v. Trustees, 136 Cal. 403, 69 Pac. 88."

The foregoing cases constitute a sufficient answer to the contention of respondents that:

"Mandamus does not lie to enforce the obligations of a contract, but only to enforce the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins. In this case, it can go no further than to compel the board of education to revoke its suspension of appellant and restore him to his position as teacher."

It may be admitted that therein is correctly stated the general rule as to mandamus; but herein appellant was receiving, as before stated, a fixed salary, and it was the duty of the board of education under the law to direct a warrant to issue for its payment. We may add that the practice is for the board to issue an order or requisition on the county treasurer, which is subject to the approval of the auditor and county superintendent of schools before actual payment. In such cases it is uniformly held that upon refusal to act the writ of mandamus will compel the board to issue its warrant, it being its plain ministerial duty to do so. See, also, Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 Pac. 732.

Herein lies the distinction between this case and those cited by respondents. For instance, in the Weaver Case, supra, the board of health could not issue a warrant for the salary of plaintiff, and the only authority it had in the matter was to reinstate him. That relief having become impossible, for the reason stated in the opinion by the Supreme Court, manifestly there was no live question remaining. In Barber v. Mulford, 117 Cal. 356, 49 Pac. 206, the court held that mandate would lie to compel the board of education of the city of San Diego to issue its order for the amount of the audited claim, but not for interest, as the law did not require the board to include interest, but limited its action to the amount of the claim as audited. Howe v. Southrey, 144 Cal. 767, 78 Pac. 259, involved a similar situation wherein a writ of mandate was issued requiring the trustees of a school district to issue a requisition for the amount of a judgment and costs against said district, but it was held that, since the petition for the writ did not show that any interest was provided for in said judgment, it was not the office of the writ of mandate to determine whether the obligation rested upon the district to pay interest thereupon. It was properly decided that the writ could direct the board to issue a requisition for the exact amount of the judgment and no more. Sheehan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 188 Cal. 525, 206 Pac. 70, involved also the payment of interest, and it was held not to be the duty of said board to determine that question, and that the sole function of the writ of mandate is to require the inferior board or tribunal to perform its duty prescribed by the law.

As we understand it, the case may be substantially and decisively presented in a few words. The question is whether any judgment rendered herein may be of practical benefit to appellant. The answer to this depends upon whether the trial court can do any more than to restore appellant to his position. The period of suspension has long since expired, and that feature, of course, is eliminated. But if, upon the merits, the appellate court should reverse the judgment and remand the case for a new trial, it is within the authority of the trial court to direct the board of education to issue its warrant or requisition for the unpaid salary of appellant. This it can do, because such action is within the scope of the duty of the board of education, and is comprehended by the issues in the case. Of course, we do not mean to express any opinion as to the legal integrity of the judgment; but, as far as this matter is concerned, we must proceed as though it were certain to be reversed.

Some minor questions are discussed by the parties; but, while they may be pertinent to a consideration of the appeal upon its merits, they have no bearing upon this motion.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Application by Louis Silva, for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the superior court of Sacramento county, to secure release of petitioner after conviction of offering narcotics for sale. Petitioner remanded.

Jas. F. Galliano, of Oakland, and Chauncey H. Dunn, Jr., of Sacramento, for petitioner.

J. J. Henderson, of Sacramento, and J. H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The petitioner was convicted in the superior court of the state, in and for the county of Sacramento, of the crime of offering narcotics for sale, the punishment for which may exceed six months' imprisonment (Stats. 1921, p. 978).

It is conceded that the superior court would have jurisdiction over such a misdemeanor, unless that jurisdiction has been removed by the provisions of the city charter of the city of Sacramento. Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 556, 21 Pac. 307, 541; People v. Y. Wong (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 409. It is contended, however, that the Charter of Sacramento, section 143 of article XVII (Stats. 1921, p. 1963), confers such jurisdiction upon the police court of Sacramento and that by conferring such jurisdiction on the police court the superior court no longer has jurisdiction. That section reads as follows, with reference to the jurisdiction over misdemeanors:

"Jurisdiction.

"Sec. 143. Said police court shall have jurisdiction:

"(1) Of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws or by ordinances of the city and of all other crimes cognizable by justices' courts and courts of justices of the peace and police courts under the Constitution and laws of the state of California. * * *

It is contended that as the offense of which the petitioner was convicted was a misdemeanor "enumerated by the general laws" of the state, jurisdiction thereof was by the charter conferred upon the police court. The question involved is whether or not the phrase "cognizable by justices' courts and courts of justices of the peace and police courts under the Constitution and laws of the state of California" modifies the phrase "of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws."

Criminal law §90(5)—Superior court held to have jurisdiction of crime of offering narcotics for sale, notwithstanding jurisdiction of police court.

The superior court of Sacramento county has jurisdiction of the crime of offering narcotics for sale, the punishment for which may

The question is fairly debatable, but we think has been set at rest by the fact that the District Court of Appeal for the Third District determined that question in favor of the jurisdiction of the superior court, and against the jurisdiction of the police court in its decision in People v. T. Wah Hing, 47 Cal. App. 327, 333, 109 Pac. 662. This decision construed section 164 of the charter as adopted by the people of Sacramento, and ratified by the state Legislature in 1911 (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 305). A petition for a transfer of that case to the Supreme Court was denied, but an examination of the file shows that the question of jurisdiction was not raised in such petition. Even if we were now disposed to question the correctness of the decision of the Third District Court of Appeal, we think that the adoption in the new Sacramento charter of 1921 in section 143 of exactly the same language which was thus contained in the charter of 1911, section 164, interpreted and construed by the District Court of Appeal in People v. T. Wah Hing, supra, was an adoption by the people of Sacramento of that construction, thus leaving the jurisdiction of high-grade misdemeanors in the superior court. See Dalton v. Leland, 22 Cal. App. 481, 135 Pac. 54. Petitioner remanded.

FLETCHER et al. v. DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL, SECOND APPELLATE DISTRICT, STATE OF CALIFORNIA, DIVISION TWO, ETC., et al. (L. A. 7608.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1923.)

1. Eminent domain §187—Order authorizing state to take possession of right of way after commencement of proceedings and deposit of security for defendants unnecessary.

Under Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended in 1918, authorizing the state, after the commencement of condemnation proceedings, the making of an order therein fixing the amount to be paid or deposited as security for defendants, and the payment of such amount, to take possession of any right of way required, it is unnecessary that the court in such proceedings make any order authorizing the taking of such possession; that right being transferred by the Constitution itself.

2. Contempt §20—Writ of review held not to enjoin highway officers from improving highway, so as to render them liable for contempt for making such improvements.

A writ of review issued by the District Court of Appeal in eminent domain proceedings to condemn a highway requiring certification of the record by the superior court and containing the provision, "in the meantime we command and require the said respondents and all persons acting under said orders to desist from further proceedings in the matter so to be reviewed," did not enjoin the highway officers from improving the highway which they had taken and retained without question under authority of Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended in 1918, so as to render them liable for contempt where they proceeded with improvements.

3. Contempt §54(4)—Affidavit must state facts sufficient to constitute a contempt before court has jurisdiction to punish therefor.

In order to acquire jurisdiction to punish for contempt, it is essential that the affidavit charging contempt should state facts sufficient to constitute a contempt of court.

Petition by A. B. Fletcher and others for a writ of certiorari to annul an order of the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2, and others adjudging them guilty of contempt. Writ allowed, unless order adjudging guilt of contempt annulled.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, C. C. Carleton, of Sacramento, and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Newby & Palmer and Grant Jackson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. This is a petition for writ of certiorari to annul an order of the respondents adjudging the petitioners guilty of contempt in violating the provisions of a writ of certiorari issued by that court.

The people of the state of California initiated condemnation proceedings to open a highway to the Malibu ranch. The trial court fixed security in the way of money deposits, and the deposits were made in accordance with the order fixing the amount thereof. Thereupon the petitioners took possession of the proposed highway and proceeded to construct the highway. The Constitution of California as amended in 1918, art. 1, § 14, provides that where a condemnation proceeding is brought by the state, the state—

"may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposits as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto," etc.

The writ of review issued by the respondents was directed to the judge of the superior court before whom the proceedings were pending and to that court, and after requiring the certification of the record by the superior court, contained the following provision:

"And in the meantime, we command and require the said respondents, and all persons acting under said orders, to desist from further proceedings in the matter so to be reviewed."

Among the proceedings thus sought to be reviewed was an order of the trial court made after the deposits of $32,180 with the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank in accordance with the previous order of the court to the following effect:

"It is hereby ordered that the plaintiff, the State of California, may take immediate possession and use of the right of way described in the complaint and in said order. * * *"

In this connection it should be noted that the respondents do not claim that the effect of the writ of review was to require the petitioners to surrender the possession that they had obtained, before the issuance of the writ. In that regard the respondents state:

"It may be noted in passing that the owners are not claiming, and have not contended at any time, that the stay of proceedings in the writ here will divest the highway commission of the possession they took under the order of possession; they only claim that the writ operated to stay work on the road and maintain the status of the parties until the validity of the order shall have been determined."

[1] The question thus presented narrows itself to the inquiry of whether or not the highway commissioners, the petitioners here, were acting under and in pursuance of the order under review in continuing the improvement of the highway of which they had taken possession. In this connection it should be observed that while the court in fact made an order purporting to authorize the state to take possession of the proposed highway, the Constitution does not require any such order. It makes the right of possession dependent upon but two things, first, the institution of the condemnation proceedings, and, second, the making of an order therein fixing an amount to be paid or deposited as security to the defendants. Upon the payment of the amount so fixed, the right of possession was transferred by the Constitution itself to the state, and no order of court was necessary to effect that transfer.

[2] We need not concern ourselves upon this application with the question of whether or not the District Court of Appeal in the exercise of its authority to review the orders of the trial court could have required the state of California to surrender possession of the highway to the defendants in the condemnation proceeding pending the hearing of the proceeding for the review of the orders made by the trial court, nor need we consider whether or not the District Court of Appeal would have had authority in aid of its jurisdiction to review the proceedings to require the suspension of labor upon the proposed highway, if the order actually made required neither one of these things. That the mere retention of possession by the state and its officers was not a violation of the terms of the writ of review issued by the District Court of Appeal is conceded by the respondents here. Can it be fairly said that the order made by the District Court of Appeal in its writ of review had the effect to enjoin the highway officers of the state from improving the highway of which they had taken possession, their right to retain such possession being admitted? In this connection it should be stated that the orders under review made no provision whatever with reference to the improvement of the highway and did not purport to authorize the improvement thereof so that any work done for the purpose of improving the proposed highway was not in fact done under the terms of the orders made by the superior court. Nor do we think the question of the improvement of the highway was a matter germane to the proceedings before the superior court and under review by the District Court of Appeal. The only thing dealt with by the superior court was the right of possession pending in litigation to condemn the title for the state of California. The right to the possession of the property was transferred by the Constitution itself to the highway commissioners acting for the state of California upon the compliance with the terms fixed by the Constitution. If, as was subsequently held by the District Court of Appeal upon the review of the orders complained of, it was held that such orders were void, the right of possession by the state and its officers would at once terminate, because of the fact that there was no valid order fixing the amount to be deposited, and consequently the Constitution was not complied with.

We do not wish to be considered as relying wholly upon the admission of the respondents that the continuance by the highway commission of possession was not a violation of the injunctive feature of the writ of review. We think that the respondents are correct in their admission for the reason that the order does not purport to undo anything that has been done, but merely to enjoin the doing of anything further, and does not require that possession be surrendered by the state pending the termination of the proceedings for the review of the orders of the trial court. We are not dealing with a case where possession had not been taken at the time of the application for the writ of review, but with one where such possession had already been taken by the officers of the state.

We do not think it can fairly be said that the retention of the possession by the petitioners as members of the highway commission or the attempted improvement of the highway were violations of the terms of the injunctive order contained in the writ of review. It is therefore unnecessary for us to determine the extent of the jurisdiction or power of the District Court of Appeal had it endeavored to expressly prohibit such acts by the state or its officers. It is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that the injunctive order followed the provisions of the statute with reference to writs of review, and was in the usual form, and was not violated by the petitioners.

[3] The respondents claim that the only question that can be reviewed by this court upon these proceedings is the jurisdiction of the District Court of Appeal to punish for contempt. This is true. But it has been repeatedly held by this court that in order to acquire jurisdiction to punish for contempt of court it is essential that the affidavit charging contempt should state facts sufficient to constitute a contempt of court. Otis v. Superior Court, 148 Cal. 129, 82 Pac. 853; Hotaling v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 73. All the facts that we have stated are shown in the affidavits charging the petitioners with contempt, and such affidavits are not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to punish petitioners for contempt. The question before us arises on a demurrer interposed in response to an order to show cause why the writ of review should not be issued.

The demurrer is overruled, and the clerk is ordered to issue the writ of review petitioned for, unless within 30 days the respondents annul the order adjudging petitioners guilty of contempt, which they are hereby authorized and empowered to do.

Health 28—Permit for construction of sewer by contractor not required.

Public Health Act, § 3, requiring permit from state board of health for certain acts in connection with sewers and sewage, is restricted in its operation to the use of sewers after they are constructed, and has no application to construction of sewer by contractor, which is controlled by the Improvement Act, and hence complaint charging failure to obtain permit stated no cause of action.

Application of Joe Chutuk for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Petitioner discharged.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles (Hartley Shaw, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner.

Hugh McNary, of Los Angeles, and J. C. MacFarland, of Sacramento, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The petitioner is a subcontractor for the construction of sewers in the city of Watts, a city of the sixth class, under a contractor who had executed a contract for the construction of the sewers with the trustees of the city of Watts under and in virtue of proceedings instituted in accordance with the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730). A complaint was filed charging the petitioner with a misdemeanor, in that he had proceeded to excavate for the sewers in accordance with his contract with the city without having previously secured a permit from the state board of health. It was claimed that this was a violation of section 3 (Stats. 1917, p. 921) of an act of the Legislature for the preservation of public health, originally enacted in 1907 and amended in 1911 and 1913 (Stats. 1911, p. 565; Stats. 1913, p. 796; Stats. 1917, pp. 920, 921). The petitioner contends as follows:

"The proper construction of the Public Health Act, with reference to the Improvement Act of 1911 and the Municipal Corporation Act, is that the Improvement Act of 1911 should be construed as providing fully for the construction of sewers, and the Public Health Act is restricted in its application to the use of the sewers after they are constructed."

The attorneys representing the respondent, after due consideration, have concluded not to attack the petitioner's contention, and have expressed their concurrence therein. As we also concur in this view, we deem it unnecessary to further elaborate the reasons why in our judgment the complaint against the petitioner fails to state a cause of action.

3. Municipal corporations —706(7)—Contributory negligence of eight year old child killed by automobile at street crossing held for jury.

In an action for wrongful death of an eight year old child, struck by defendant's automobile on a street intersection over which the child was attempting to draw a little wagon, accompanied by his sister, the question of the child's contributory negligence was for the jury, notwithstanding that it might have done things which in an adult would be held contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George E. Cryer, Judge pro tem.

Action by Allen Sanders against C. E. Toberman, for damages for the wrongful death of an infant son. After verdict for defendant, a new trial was granted, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. J. Palmer and Lyle W. Rucker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial after a verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant in a case brought by the plaintiff to recover for the death of an infant son who was killed by an automobile operated by the defendant. The appellant presents two contentions, first, that the notice of intention to move for a new trial is defective because there are no specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence; and, second, that the evidence shows without conflict and as a matter of law that the child, Milo Wright Sanders, killed by the defendant's automobile, was guilty of contributory negligence.

[1] Before the amendment of 1915 to section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, it was required by that section that when a motion for a new trial was made upon the minutes of the court, and the ground of the motion is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, a notice of motion must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient. This provision was eliminated by the amendment of section 659 in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 201). The section now requires the moving party to designate the grounds upon which the motion will be made. The notice of motion in the case at bar was as follows:

"Take notice that plaintiff, Allen Sanders, intends to move the court to vacate and set aside the verdict rendered in the above cause, and to grant a new trial of said cause, upon the following grounds, to wit: I. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. Said motion will be made upon the minutes of the court in said cause."

This was a sufficient statement of the grounds of the motion for a new trial. It was unnecessary to specify in detail the respects in which it was claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict.

Appellant cites in support of his proposition that the amendment of 1915 did not abolish the requirement for specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence. Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 Pac. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184, and Williams v. Bullock Tractor Co., 186 Cal. 32, 39, 198 Pac. 780. The case of Millar v. Millar, supra, dealt with a motion for a new trial made upon a bill of exceptions, notice whereof was given January 6, 1915, before the amendment to section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure of that year became effective, consequently that decision has no application to the case at bar. The case of Williams v. Bullock Tractor Co., supra, dealt with an appeal from a judgment upon a bill of exceptions and has no application to the situation here.

[2] The appellant suggests rather than argues that "the common law and equity practice in this connection is a part of the substantive law of the state." There is no merit in this suggestion. The proceedings for a new trial are statutory.

[3] We deem it unnecessary to discuss the evidence which the appellant claims establishes that the deceased child was as a matter of law guilty of negligence. The question as to whether or not a child of eight years was guilty of negligence is ordinarily a question of fact to be determined by the jury, notwithstanding the fact that the child may have done things which in an adult would be held contributory negligence as a matter of law. Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 Pac. 690, and cases there cited. See, also, Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 139, 138 Pac. 712. It is sufficient for the purposes of this appeal to say that the accident occurred at the intersection of two streets on one of which the defendant was traveling with his automobile, and that the deceased child was attempting to draw a little wagon across the street, accompanied by his sister. The question of whether or not the child was negligent in failing to exercise due caution in observing the traffic at the street intersection was a question for the jury to determine under proper instructions.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

SLAYDEN v. O'DEA et al. (L. A. 7129.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1923.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 10, 1923.)

1. Highways ⇨113(1)—Advances made by creditor to contractor held not lien on certain bonds.

Where a creditor of a contractor has a lien on certain bonds for advances made to the contractor, a finding that further advances not indorsed upon the contract are not secured by the bonds, is sustained when the evidence shows no agreement that they should be secured, in view of the fact that all other advances were indorsed upon the contract.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)—Finding on question of fact is binding.

Where a question of fact is to be determined by the trial court from the evidence, its finding is binding upon the Supreme Court.

3. Judgment ⇨256(1)—Finding including an item which findings and conclusions of law and judgment do not include, held inadvertence.

A finding that the unpaid balance was $1,991.31 "together with the additional sum of $666.20," held an inadvertent statement as to $666.20, where the findings and conclusions of law and judgment limited the amount of recovery to $1,999.31, and failure to include such item in the judgment was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

Action by H. R. Slayden against M. F. O'Dea and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Crouch & Crouch, Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. W. Morin, of Pasadena, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is a second appeal from a judgment in this case, the first being reported in 182 Cal. 500, 189 Pac. 1066. Upon the first appeal it was held, that inasmuch as M. F. O'Dea did not participate in the agreement giving to the plaintiff a lien upon bonds 9 and 10 issued by the county of Los Angeles, that the claims of plaintiff were "subject and subordinate to the prior claims of the appellant [M. F. O'Dea] for reimbursement for the balance due him from the contractor." The only question that need be considered on this appeal is whether or not the finding of the trial court that two items, one of $232, and the other of $466.41, advanced by M. F. O'Dea to the contractor, were secured by the bonds here involved, and thus have priority over the claims of the plaintiff.

In this connection it should be observed that under the contract by which M. F. O'Dea agreed to furnish money to the contractor, a copy of which is set in the previous opinion of the court, the amount to be furnished by M. F. O'Dea to the contractor was limited to $6,000. Subsequently, by agreements made from time to time, the amount to be advanced was increased. With reference to the item of $232, the arrangement for the advance was made between Mr. Farmer, acting for the construction company, and Mr. O'Dea. In regard to the transaction Mr. Farmer was not called as a witness. Mr. O'Dea testified in that regard as follows:
